INTRODUCTION.

POSITION.

IRELAND is usually designated the second in extent of the British islands ; but, when viewed per se, it is seen to consist of a comparatively great continent, and a closely enviring cordon of little islands. Its geographical position is between $51^{\circ} 26'$ and $55^{\circ} 21'$ north latitude, and between $5^{\circ} 20'$ and $10^{\circ} 26'$ longitude west of Greenwich ; and its relative position is west of Great Britain, from the south of Argyleshire and the centre of Ayrshire in Scotland, to the north of Somersetshire in England or the south of Glamorganshire in Wales. It is bounded, on the north-east, by the North Channel ; on the east, by the Irish Sea ; on the south-east, by St. George's Channel ; and on the south, the west, and the north, by the Atlantic Ocean. The Blasquet Islands in the barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, are in the latitude of Charleton's Isle in Hudson's bay, and Bolus Head in the barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, is in the latitude of the Straits of Belleisle in North America. Malin Head and Culdaff bay on the north coast of co. Donegal, are in the latitude of respectively Campbelltown and the Mull of Kintyre in Scotland ; Bengore Head on the north coast of co. Antrim, is in the latitude of Girvan ; a point between Cushendun and Cushendall, on the east coast of Antrim, is in the latitude of Ballintra ; Glenarm is in the latitude of Newcastle-upon-Tyne ; the middle of Island-Magee lies opposite Portpatrick ; Black Head, at the north side of the entrance of Belfast Lough, is in the latitude of Durham ; Donaghadee lies opposite the Mull of Galloway ; Ballyferis Point lies nearly opposite Whitehaven ; Killyleagh on Lough Strangford, is in the latitude of Dantzic ; Dundalk is in the latitude of York ; Clogher Head is nearly in the latitude of Hull ; the town of Skerries is in the latitude of Hamburg ; Malahide lies opposite Liverpool ; Dublin lies nearly opposite Holyhead ; Bray is nearly in the latitude of Chester ; Black-Bull, a little north of Wicklow, is in the latitude of Petropowloekoi in Kamtschatka ; the Wolves, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Wicklow, are nearly in the latitude of Derby ; Kilmichael Point is nearly in the latitude of Shrewsbury ; the church of Donaghmore in the north-east of the barony of Ballaghkeen, is in the latitude of Norwich ; Glascarrick Point is in the latitude of Berlin ; Enniscorthy is in the latitude of Birmingham ; the extreme north of Wexford Harbour is in the latitude of Amsterdam ; the town of Wexford is in the latitude of Hanover ; Greenore Point is in the latitude of Warsaw ; the village of Broadway is in the latitude of Cambridge ; Carnsore Point is in the latitude of Worcester ; Bagenbon Head, near the south-west extremity of co. Wexford, is in the latitude of Stumble Head in South Wales ; Mine Head, in the barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, is in the latitude of St. David's ; the entrance of Youghal Harbour is in the latitude of Rotterdam ; Cork Head in co. Cork is nearly opposite the entrance of Milford Haven ; the town of Bandon is in the latitude of Oxford ; Skibbereen is nearly in the latitude of London ; Baltimore is opposite Bristol ; the southern part of the Sound between the mainland and Cape Clear Island is in the latitude of Bath ; and Cape Clear, or the southern extremity of Cape Clear Island, is in the latitude of Leipzig. The shortest distances between Ireland and Great Britain, are $13\frac{1}{2}$ statute miles from Tor Point in co. Antrim to the Mull of Kintyre ; 21 from Donaghadee in co. Down to Portpatrick in Galloway ; and about 47 from Carnsore Point in co. Wexford to St. David's Head in Wales. But the most facile lines of communication between Irish and British ports, or those distances which are either run by regularly-plying steam-vessels or constitute the shortest and easiest for sailing vessels, are 138 statute miles from Londonderry to Greenock, $35\frac{1}{2}$ from Larne to Cairn, 107 from Belfast to Greenock, 156 from Belfast to Liverpool, 33 from Bangor to Nessock, 21 from Donaghadee to Portpatrick, 23 from Donaghadee to Nessock, 143 from Dundalk to Liverpool, 138 from Drogheda to Liverpool, 130 from Dublin to Liverpool, 63 from Dublin to Holyhead, 70 from Dublin to Porth-duilleyn, 104 from Kingstown to Fishguard, 60 from Wicklow to Porth-duilleyn, 79 from Wicklow to Fishguard, 90 from Wexford to Porth-duilleyn, 69 from Wexford to Fishguard, 104 from Waterford to Fishguard, 112 from Waterford to Pembroke, 222 from Waterford to Bristol, and 268 from Cork to Bristol.

EXTENT.

The outline of continental Ireland is proximately that of a rhomboid; and, in a general view, is greatly more continuous or less indented and undulated by cuts and sweeps of the sea than the outline of continental Great Britain. The larger diagonal of the rhomboid extends from Tor Head in co. Antrim to Mizen Head in co. Cork, and measures 302 miles;* and the shorter extends from Carnsore Point in co. Wexford to Erris Head in co. Mayo, and measures 210 miles. The longest meridional line extends nearly from Bloody-Foreland in co. Donegal to the Old Head of Kinsale in co. Cork, and measures 237 miles; and the longest latitudinal line extends from Quintin Point at the mouth of Lough Strangford in co. Down to Emloagh-Rash on the west coast of co. Mayo, and measures about 182 miles. But the breadth of the country from Dundalk to Ballyshannon is only 85 miles; that from Belfast to Donegal is only 90; and that from Dublin to the head of Galway bay, not more than 108. No part of Ireland is farther than 50 or 55 miles from either the open sea or some marine inlet; and very few fertile or densely peopled portions of it are many miles distant from some seaward navigation. The area of the entire kingdom comprehends 13,464,300 acres of arable land, 6,295,735 of uncultivated land, 374,482 of plantations, 42,929 of towns, and 630,825 of fresh water,—in all, 20,808,271 acres.

COASTS AND HEADLANDS.

Malin Head, the most northerly ground of the county of Donegal and of the mainland of the kingdom, is situated in $55^{\circ} 22'$ north latitude, and $7^{\circ} 23' 30''$ longitude west of Greenwich, and terminates a bold-featured peninsula, whose sides are sea-walls, and whose highest ground, Salskin, has an altitude of 578 feet above sea-level. The coast from Malin Head to Innishowen Head, a distance of $21\frac{1}{2}$ miles, trends south-eastward, presents a slightly sinuous line of cliffs to the sea, and is overhung near the middle by the hills of Crocknamara and Latchet, whose altitudes above sea-level are 808 and 537 feet. The principal headlands on this stretch of coast are Glengad and Dunmore; and these are inconsiderable both in projection and in character. Innishowen Head bears aloft two lighthouses with fixed lights, and is overhung by Craignamaddy mountain, whose summit has an altitude of 1,034 feet. Magilligan Point, a comparatively small but magnificent headland, is situated on the east side of the entrance of Lough Foyle, about $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Innishowen Head. The coast thence to the vicinity of Port-Stewart, a distance of $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles, is low, flat, and sandy, destitute of character, and tamely cut in one place by the embouchure of the Bann. A straight line drawn from Port-Stewart to Tor Point, extends nearly due east, measures 26 miles, and places all the coast at a distance of from 2 or 3 furlongs to 4 miles to the north. This coast, followed round its sinuosities, measures at least 35 miles: it contains the far-famed and justly celebrated headlands of Skerries, Dnluce, Giant's Causeway, Plaiskins, Bengore, Kenbane, and Fair Head; it possesses a singular profusion of both columnar and amorphous basalt, piled, amassed, and soaringly edified in cliffs, escarpments, and colonnades of the noblest character; and it challenges comparison, for at once beauty, romance, brilliance, and power, with any similar extent of coast in the world. The highest grounds on its brink are one of 307 feet behind the Giant's Causeway, one of 395 feet at Bengore Head, and one of 636 feet at Fair Head; but a grand feature of its central part is Knocklade, rising to the altitude of 1,685 feet, immediately behind Ballycastle. A straight line, drawn from Tor Point to the west side of the entrance of Lough Lorne, extends south-south-eastward, measures 26 miles, and places very nearly the whole of the coast to the west at a maximum and a mean distance of $3\frac{1}{2}$ and about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles. The principal headlands on this stretch of coast are Garron Point a little north of its middle, and Ballygalley Head near its south end; and the almost immediate backgrounds of the bold and sometimes stupendous shores, are a chain of sublimely picturesque heights, whose skirts occasionally drop sheer down to the sea, whose escarpments often rise in mural yet broken cliffs of chalk, and whose acclivities and summits frown impressively in a deep black cap of basalt. The chief summits of the chain are one near the north of 1,013 feet in altitude, Trostan 1,810 feet, Slieveaneer 1,782 feet, Nachore 1,179 feet, Collin 1,419 feet, one a little south of Collin 1,321 feet, Craigy-Hill 1,055 feet, Loughduff 1,262 feet, and Agnew's-Hill 1,558 feet. The north end of Island-Magee, at the east side of the entrance of Lough Lorne, has a lighthouse with a fixed light. Skeenaghan Point is situated nearly 2 miles east of the west side of the entrance of Lough Lorne; and the coast thence to Black Head at the north side of the entrance of Belfast Lough, trends south by eastward, measures 7 miles, presents a bluff and unindented face to the sea, and is overhung by one high ground of 465 feet a little south of the middle of Island-Magee, and another of 431 feet on the crown or immediately behind the extremity of Black Head.

* The measurements throughout this article are in statute miles.

Nout Head, at the south side of the entrance of Belfast Lough, is situated $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east by south of Black Head; and is a headland remarkable only for screening the Lough, and confronting the Copeland Islands. The coast thence to the point opposite Burial Island, in the southern vicinity of Ballyhalbert, trends south-south-eastward, measures $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is marked by numerous tiny headlands, the chief of which are Foreland Point and Ballyferis Point. The coast, from the vicinity of Ballyhalbert to Ballyquintin at the north-east side of the entrance of Lough Strangford, trends south by westward, measures $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is marked by Slanes Point, Black Neb, and several other small headlands. Killard Point, at the south-west side of the entrance of Lough Strangford, is the termination of a tiny peninsula, and lies $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Ballyquintin Point; and the coast thence to St. John's Point, at the east side of the entrance of Dundrum bay, trends south-south-westward, measures $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is marked by Phennick Point and some other small abutments. The whole line of coast within these three stretches, or from Nout Head to St. John's Point, is low and prevalingly rocky, fringed and guarded with rocky islets and skerries, constantly sinuous yet nowhere considerably undulated, and overlooked by no loftier summits than two of respectively 330 and 414 feet, and even these situated about 4 miles distant in the interior. A line drawn from St. John's Point to the west side of the entrance of Dundrum bay, in the southern vicinity of the village of Newcastle, extends west-south-westward, measures $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and cuts off to the north a shallow sweep of marine water, screened with various but generally low and sandy shores. The coast, from the southern vicinity of Newcastle to Mullartown Point, trends southward and measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and, from Mullartown Point to Cranfield Point, at the north-east side of the entrance of Lough Carlingford, it trends south-westward, and measures $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles. Over the whole of these two distances, its outline consists very nearly of straight lines, being broken only by the small headland of Leestone midway between Mullartown and Cranfield; over the distance north of Mullartown, it soars sheer and sternly up from the water's edge to the cloud-cleaving summits of Slieve-Donard, Slieve-Bingan, and Slieve Nagiogle, respectively 2,796, 2,449, and 1,450 feet above sea-level; and over the distance south-west of Mullartown, it boasts a small and widening belt of beautiful low ground, yet is overhung immediately behind by a continuation of the frontier masses of the Mourne mountains, rising from 1,013 to 1,868 feet above sea-level. Bellagan Point, at the south-west side of the entrance of Lough Carlingford, is situated $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Cranfield Point; Cooley Point, at the north side of the entrance of Dundalk bay, 2 miles south-west of Bellagan Point; and Dunany Point, at the south side of the entrance of Dundalk bay, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Cooley Point. The ground between the entrance of Lough Carlingford and Dundalk bay, forms the termination of the great peninsula of Carlingford, eventually low and characterless, but interiorly grand and soaring; and the shore around the whole sweep of Dundalk bay is low and level, and glides off into a very broad sheet of sandy beach. The coast, from Dunany Point to the boundary between the counties of Meath and Dublin, trends nearly south, or half a point to the east of south; and, except where briefly and rather feebly interrupted by Clogher Head, whose summit has an altitude of 181 feet, it is almost uniformly a straight line of sandy beach and low shore. From a small headland $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east by south of the division-line between the counties of Meath and Dublin to Rush Point, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Lambay Island, the coast prevalingly trends south-east by south, yet makes a small sweep seaward in the vicinity of Skerries; and over this distance—extending 9 miles in a straight line—it is all comparatively low, yet presents to the billows a general breastwork of bluff rock. From Rush Point to the isthmus of Howth, the coast trends southward, continues low, and is dentated and discovered by small estuaries; and from the isthmus of Howth, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-eastward, the peninsula of Howth picturesquely screens the north side of the lower part of Dublin bay, climbing to the summit of the Hill of Howth 563 feet above sea-level, and terminating in the steep escarpments and grand sea-bulwarks of Howth Head.

The small headland at the south side of the entrance of Dublin bay, and directly opposite Dalkey Island, is situated $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of the Bailey Light on Howth Head; and the coast thence to Wicklow Head trends south by eastward, measures $21\frac{1}{2}$ miles, departs but trivially and gently from the straight line, is nearly all a face of low bluff shore overlooked by grandly tumulated or rapidly ascending hills, and presents on its margin, a little south of the boundary-line between the counties of Dublin and Meath, the magnificent promontory of Bray Head, whose summit, at an altitude of 791 feet above sea-level, commands a superb view of ocean, coast, and seaboard. From Wicklow Head to Raven Point at the north side of the entrance of Wexford Harbour, the coast trends south-south-westward, measures 45 miles, has few and small projections and indentations, and over the northern half resembles the coast between Wicklow Head and Dublin bay, while over the southern half, it consists of the soft and beachy termination of a great expanse of champagne country. The principal headlands are Maugher Point, 84 feet above sea-level,—Mizen Head, 41 feet,—Arklow Rock, 411 feet,—Kilmichael Point,—Brenoge Point,—Pool-shone Head,—Glascarrick Point,—and Cahore Point; and the principal heights on or near the margin of the seaboard are Collon Hill, 782 feet,—Bola Hill, 804 feet,—Buckrone, 917 feet,—Knockaurey, 860 feet,—Lamberton Hill, 410 feet,—Croghan-Kinsheela Mountain, 1,985 feet,—and Tara Hill, 825 feet,—all, except the last, within the county of Wicklow, and north of Kilmichael Point. Rosclare Point, at the south side of the entrance of Wexford Harbour, is situated 2 miles south of Raven Point, and has an altitude of 58 feet above sea-level. A straight line from Rosclare Point to Greenore Point extends south-south-eastward, measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and cuts off from the sea the open and slenderly penetrating bay of Greenore; a straight line from Greenore Point to Carnsore Point, at the south-eastern extremity of the mainland of the kingdom, extends south-south-westward, measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is very nearly coincident with the shore; a straight line from Carnsore Point to Crossfarnogue Point, extends half a point south of westward, measures $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and places all the shore at the mean distance of about half-a-mile to the north; and a straight line from Crossfarnogue Point to Hook Head, at the east side of the entrance of Waterford Harbour, extends in the direction of south-west by west, measures $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and lies across the entrance of the series of bays or large sweep of waters which wash the east side of the long peninsula of Hook, and whose principal section bears the name of Ballyteigue. Very nearly the whole coast, from the entrance of Wexford Harbour round to the isthmus of Hook peninsula, is low and beachy, and consists of the tardy slope into the sea of a low flat region of rich arable lands; and the coast of Hook peninsula, though forming the breastwork of likewise a low country, presents to the waves a bold face of defiance, and shoots out the headlands of Inguard Point, Bagenbon Head, and Nord Point, and several minor projections. Swiney Head, at the west side of the entrance of Waterford Harbour, is situated $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by north of Hook Head; a straight line thence to Brownstown Head extends west by southward, measures $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and places to the north the open, iron-bound, slightly penetrating bay of Allands; a straight line from Brownstown Head to Newtown Head extends west by northward, measures $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and places to the north the imminently dangerous bay of Tramore; a straight line from Newtown Head to Bonmahon Head extends westward, measures $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is nearly coincident with the coast; and a straight line from Bonmahon Head to Ballyvoile Head extends in the direction of south-west by west, measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and places the coast-line at the mean distance of about half-a-mile to the north. The whole of the coast from Waterford Harbour to Ballyvoile Head terminates or bounds a low seaboard; yet, excepting a brief space within Tramore bay, it is all bluff and menacing, and maintains a fierce conflict with the billows. A line from Ballyvoile Head to Helwick Head extends south-south-westward, measures 4 miles, and passes across the entrance of Clonea bay and Dungarvan Harbour; a straight line from Helwick Head to Mine Head extends south-south-westward, measures $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes a very little to seaward of the slightly undulating coast; a straight line from Mine Head to Ballymacart Head extends in the direction of south-west by west, measures $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is identical with the coast; a straight line from Ballymacart Head to Ram Head extends south-westward, measures $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of Ardmore bay, placing Ardmore Head a little to the north; a straight line from Ram Head to East Point extends westward, measures $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and, placing Arigna Head a little to the north, passes across the entrance of Whiting bay; and a straight line from East Point to Cable Island extends in the direction of south by west, measures $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of Youghal bay or the estuary of the Blackwater. The whole coast from Dungarvan Harbour to Youghal bay, presents a prevailing bluff face to the sea, and is overlooked by the heavy, lumpish, prolonged mass of the Drum or Slievegrain mountain, whose summits are about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant from the shore, and possess an altitude of from 700 to nearly 1,000 feet above sea-level. The coast from Cable Island, or from the small point of the mainland near it and directly opposite, away west-south-westward to Roche's Point at the east side of the entrance to Cork Harbour, has in general a flowing outline, and variously follows, passes $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile beyond, or recedes half-a-mile within, a straight line of $17\frac{1}{2}$ miles in extent. About one-third of this coast, or to the west side of the entrance of Ballycotton bay, is a beach of sand upon bog; the remainder is in general a low bluff breastwork; the whole bounds a large and fertile sheet of comparatively champaign country; and one place, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Roche's Point, runs out into the promontory of Poor Head.

A straight line from Poor Head to Cork Head extends in the direction of south-west by west, measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of the Outer Harbour of Cork; a line from Cork Head to Robert's Head extends south by westward, measures $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is nearly coincident with the shore; a line from Robert's Head to the west side of the entrance of Kinsale Harbour extends in the direction of south-west by west, measures $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles, places Reany's Point, Barry Point, and two other headlands, to the south-east, and coincides with about the mean outline of the undulating shore ; a line from the west side of the entrance of Kinsale Harbour to the Old Head of Kinsale, at the termination of a narrow and comparatively long peninsula, extends south by westward, measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and places the east coast of the peninsula, with its small headlands, at the mean distance of about three-fourths of a mile to the west ; a line from the Old Head of Kinsale to the Seven Heads extends west-south-westward, measures $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of Courtmaacherry bay, placing Kinahernsey Point, Barry Point, and other small headlands within the bay to the north-west ; a line from the Seven Heads to Gally Head extends west-south-westward, measures $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of Clonakilly bay ; a line from Gally Head to Toe Head extends west-south-westward, measures $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of the large exterior bay whose ramifications, or interior parts, constitute the bays of Ross, Glandore, and Castlehaven ; a line from Toe Head to the east side of the entrance of Baltimore Harbour extends in the direction of west by south, measures $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is partly coincident with the shore, but chiefly passes across the entrance of the twin bays of Toe and Barlog ; and a line from the east side of the entrance of Baltimore Harbour to Mizen Head at the south-west extremity of the mainland, extends in the direction of half a point south of west, measures $19\frac{1}{2}$ miles, passes through the middle of Innisherkin, places the centre of Cape Clear Island $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the south, places to the north the intricate archipelago terminating in Roaring-Water bay, and coincides over only a mile or two with either the shore itself or its immediate vicinity. The whole coast from Cork Harbour to Baltimore is exceedingly diversified, abounds in pleasant and brilliant scenery, and, in a general view, presents a bluff breastwork to the sea, has soft and gentle shores in the upper parts of its bays or other recesses, and terminates a seaboard of prevalingly undulating and tumulated surface. The coast westward of Baltimore, or rather on the west flank of the archipelago terminating in Roaring-Water bay, consists of the steep face of lofty declivities, overlooked by the mountain-summits of Knockmadden and Mount-Gabriel, at the altitude of respectively 1,029 and 1,335 feet above sea-level ; and even Mizen Head itself exhibits the rapid dive into the sea of a hill whose summit has an altitude of 759 feet. A straight line from Mizen Head to Sheep's Head extends in the direction of north by west, measures 6½ miles, and nearly coincides with the shore to Three Castle Head, and then passes across the entrance of Dunmanus bay ; a line from Sheep's Head to Blackbull Head extends west-north-westward, measures $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of Bantry bay ; a line from Blackbull Head to Crow Head extends westward, measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and places the shore at the mean distance of about three-fourths of a mile to the north ; a line from Crow Head to Lamb Head extends in the direction of north by east half east, measures 11 miles, traverses a small part of Dursey Island, nearly coincides with Garrinish Point, places Cod's Head $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the east, and then passes across the entrance of the Kenmare estuary ; and a line from Lamb Head to Bolus Head extends west-north-westward, measures $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles, places the shore to Hogg Head at the mean distance of $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the north, and then passes across the entrance of Ballinaskelligs bay. The shore and the seaboard, over all the distance from Mizen Head to Bolus Head, even including by far the greater portion of the far-extending inroads of the sea, are lofty, rugged, and impressive, affording shelter from the winds chiefly or almost only among curves of cliffs and between spurs of mountains ; and Bolus Head itself lifts its summit to the altitude of no less than 1,331 feet above sea-level. The coast from Bolus Head to Bray Head, at the western extremity of Valentia Island, prevalingly trends north-north-westward, is defined by a straight line of $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles in extent, but lies to the east of that line at the mean distance of about a mile ; and it maintains the same character as the coast south-east of Bolus Head, and is immediately overhung by the summits of Knockagalisky, Lateeve Hill, Coraghmore, and Corraghbeg. Valentia Island lies so compactly with the mainland, and in a general view so much and curvingly within the mainland's prevailing coast-line, that it cannot be very easily treated as possessing an insular situation. Straight lines from Bray Head to Mount-Eagle, from Bray Head to Douglas Head, and from Douglas Head to Mount-Eagle, measure and extend respectively 14 miles north by half-westward, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-eastward, and $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-westward ; and both the first and the third of them may be regarded as passing across the entrance of Dingle bay. The south-west base or spur of Mount-Eagle, forming the real screen of the north side of the entrance of Dingle bay, is situated $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of Dunmore Head, the reputed screen ; and a straight line from the latter to Cape Sybil extends northward, measures 5 miles, and is nearly coincident with the bold and mountain-laden shore. The coast from Cape Sybil to Brandon Head trends north-eastward, measures $15\frac{1}{2}$ miles, is marked by Dunourlin and Ballydavid Heads and indented with Smerwick Harbour, and exhibits surpassing wildness and loftiness on its immediate seaboard, a chief and far-spreading feature being the sea-washed mountain of Brandon, whose summit soars to the altitude of 3,126 feet above sea-level. A straight line from Brandon Head to Kerry Head extends north-eastward, measures $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles, passes $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the north-west of the termination of the low flat peninsula between Brandon bay and Tralee bay, and respectively $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the north of the head of Brandon bay, $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the north-north-west of the head of Tralee bay, and 8 miles to the west of the head of Ballyheigue bay. The shores around these bays are in themselves low and softly featured, though over nearly half of their extent they are flanked at a brief distance by loftily ascending acclivities; and Kerry Head, as well as a small portion of shore on the peninsula which it terminates, is bold and comparatively high. A straight line from Kerry Head to Loop Head extends northward, measures $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of the estuary of the Shannon; and a straight line from Loop Head to Black Head, at the south side of the entrance of Galway bay, extends in the direction of north-east by north, measures $48\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is very nearly coincident with the whole of the oceanward shore of the county of Clare,—a shore somewhat infrequently and slightly indented by the sea, but slenderly variegated with the headlands of Ballard Point, Killard Point, Spanish Point, Faugh Point, Hagg's Head, and Fanore Point, and remarkable for its almost uniform character of stern rocky escarpment, its fencing-line of huge boulders torn down from it by the ocean, and especially its magnificent and far-famed cliffs of Mohar.

Two straight lines from Black Head to respectively the headland between Cashleah bay and Greatman's bay, and Goulin Head or the exterior point of a group of islands seaward of Greatman's bay, may both be regarded as passing across the entrance of Galway bay; and the former extends in the direction of north-west by west, and measures 16 miles, while the latter extends west-north-westward, and measures 23 miles. A line from the headland between Cashleah and Greatman's bays to Slyne Head extends in the direction of north-west by west, measures $26\frac{1}{2}$ miles, traverses Garomna Island and Ardcastle Point, passes along nearly the middle of a comparatively large archipelago, and places the shore of the mainland at the mean distance of probably about 5 miles to the north-east; a line from Slyne Head to Achris Point extends northward, measures 10 miles, places the head of Ardhear Harbour $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the east, and stretches at the mean distance of about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles seaward from the shore of the mainland; and a line from Achris Point to Devlin Point extends north-eastward, measures $26\frac{1}{2}$ miles, is coincident with about two miles of the shore and with Claggan and Renvyle Points, and passes across the entrance of Claggan bay and Ballinakill and Killery Harbours. The whole coast from Galway bay to Killery is exceedingly broken, intricate, and wild, consisting of a labyrinth of peninsule, islands, and intervening waters, presenting to the sea an absolute melee of frowning headlands and heights, backed on the immediate seaboard with stern hills or soaring mountains, and possessing a very near aggregate resemblance to the western or Deucalionian coast of Scotland, and even to a considerable portion of the coast of Norway. A straight line from Devlin Point to Emloagh Point, extends in the direction of north by west, measures $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and places the shore at the mean distance of about half-a-mile to the east; a line from Emloagh Point to the south-west extremity of Achillbeg extends in the direction of north by west, measures $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles, places Clare Island immediately to the west, and passes across the entrance of Clew bay; a line from the south-west extremity of Achillbeg to Achill Head extends north-westward, measures 15 miles, and places the shore at the mean distance of from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile to the north-east; and a line from Achill Head to the south-west extremity of the peninsula of the Mullet extends in the direction of north-east by half north, measures 10 miles, and first coincides with Saddle Head, and then passes across the entrance of Blacksod bay. Both Achillbeg and Achill lie so compactly with the mainland, or are separated from it by such narrow and shallow sounds, and blend with it in such close admixture of view, that they cannot be treated apart from it in an exhibition of the coast-line; and the latter, along the whole of both its seaward sides, flings down stupendous declivities to the ocean, and, in the vicinity of Achill Head, stoops precipitously to the water's edge in the awful cliff of Croghan, from a summit above sea-level of 2,222 feet. The coast from the south-west extremity of the Mullet to Annagh Head trends north by eastward, measures $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is low, featureless, and but slightly undulated; and the coast from Annagh Head to Erris Head trends in the direction of north-east by north, measures 6 miles, and is bold but not very high, the loftiest ground on or near its margin having an altitude above sea-level of 286 feet. A straight line from Erris Head to Benwee Head extends east-north-eastward, measures $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of Broad Haven. The coast from Benwee Head to Downpatrick Head trends in the direction of east by south, lies all from a furlong to $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of a straight line of $18\frac{1}{2}$ miles in extent,—is everywhere bold, rugged, and grand,—presents in some places the most romantic and sublime sea-cliffs, torn by cavernous openings or dissevered into ravines, fissures, and high natural arches,—and possessing, either on its very margin or on the near part of its seaboard, the summits of Pollagh, Clinsk, Tannymore, Glencolry, Maumakeogh, Keadochmeel, Knocknadurave, Aughaleague, and Knockbohe, four of which have altitudes above sea-level of respectively 1,002, 1,117, 1,155, and 1,243 feet. A straight line from Downpatrick Head to Benwee-Givraun extends in the direction of south-east by east, measures 6 miles, and first nearly coincides with $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles of coast and with Benmore, and then passes across the entrance of the bay of Lackan ; a line from Benwee-Givraun to Kinnasharragh Point extends east by northward, measures $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of Killalla bay ; a line from Kinnasharragh Point to Aughris Head, extends east by southward, measures 12 miles, coincides with $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles of low, bluff, unindented coast, and then places the remainder of the shore, all of the same character, at the mean distance of about a mile to the south ; a line from Aughris Head to Lackmeeltan Point, extends north-eastward, measures $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and passes across the entrance of Sligo bay ; and two lines from Lackmeeltan Point to respectively Carrigan Head and Teelin Head may both be regarded as passing across the entrance of Donegal bay,—the former extending $17\frac{1}{2}$ miles in the direction of due north, and the latter $21\frac{1}{2}$ miles in that of north by west.

The coast from Carrigan Head to Teelin Head trends in the direction of north-west by west, measures $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and presents to the sea a series of stupendous mountain cliffs or precipitous declivities,—the three mountains of Teelin, Sleeve-League, and Lehan, flinging their skirts almost sheer down to the shore, and lifting their summits to the altitudes of respectively 1,018, 1,964, and 1,415 feet above sea-level. The coast from Teelin Head to Rossan Point trends north by westward, measures 3 miles, and possesses the same sublime character as the coast from Carrigan. A straight line from Rossan Point to Dawros Head extends north-eastward, measures $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and first very nearly coincides over $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles with the shore, and then passes across the entrance of the bays of Loughrusbeg and Loughrusmore ; and the coast between Rossan Point and these bays is everywhere very bold and lofty, presenting in two places cliffs or summits to the sea of 803 and 878 feet in altitude, and immediately overhanging on its seaboard with summits of 911, 1,231, 1,513, and 1,684 feet in altitude. A straight line from Dawros Head to Bloody Foreland extends in the direction of north-east by north, measures $25\frac{1}{2}$ miles, cuts off to seaward Arran Island, various smaller islands, and 6 or 8 square miles of the mainland, and places the greater part of the main shore at the mean distance of about 2 miles to the south-east. The coast, over this stretch, is intricate, low, rocky, sterile, and repulsive ; but at Bloody Foreland it presents to the sea a cliff of 198 feet in altitude, forming the skirt of a hill whose summit has an altitude of 1,033 feet. A straight line from Bloody Foreland to Horn Head extends in the direction of north-east by east, measures 13 miles, and places the head of Ballyness bay and the mean distance of the general shore respectively $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to the south-east. Horn Head, though crowned with a summit of only 833 feet, and therefore very much lower than several other of the promontories which frown defiance on the Atlantic, is an object of great scenic power, and much natural curiosity ; and it possesses the singular and astounding phenomenon popularly called MacSwain's Gun. A straight line from Horn Head to Fannat Head extends east-north-eastward, measures $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles, passes across the entrance of Sheephaven and Tranarossan bay to near the extremity of Pointahomash, and then passes across the entrance of Mulroy bay, and places the remainder of the shore at the mean distance of about half-a-mile to the south-east. A straight line from Fannat Head to Dunaff Head extends in the direction of east by north, measures 47 miles, and passes across the entrance of Lough Swilly ; and a summit of 506 feet in altitude above sea-level, overhangs at once Fannat Head, and the west side of the mouth of Lough Swilly, while the summit of Raghtinmore, soaring to the altitude of 1,656 feet, overhangs Dunaff Head and the east side of the mouth of the Lough. A straight line from Dunaff Head to Malin Head extends north-north-eastward, measures 8 miles, and forms the chord of a semicircular sweep of marine indentation upon the land, whose shores are bold, and have in one place an altitude of 818 feet, and whose extremity ramifies far inland in the irregular but flaunting inlet of Strathbreaga bay.

MARINE WATERS.

The tides rush up against the whole of the west coast from their race across the Atlantic ; and, in consequence of their meeting resistance at some points many miles and even leagues before they meet it in places adjacent, they produce a great number of various and sometimes opposite local currents. The great prolongation of many of the bays and estuaries, combined with their comparative narrowness, and with the exposure of their mouths to the west, occasions also a very wide variety of currents and of times of high water within the range of the prevailing coast-line. The seas which sweep the north and the south may in a general view be regarded as simply washing the coasts in the regular progress and retrocession of their tides ; yet even they are so materially affected by the configuration of the shores, as to be periodically flung into discrepant, conflicting, and seemingly anomalous conditions of local current. The tides which fill the seas between Ireland and Great Britain enter partly by the North Channel and partly by St. George's Channel, so as necessarily to run foul of each other, and occasion a watery tumult ; and, in consequence of the northern entrance being very much narrower than the southern, they effect their collision so far north as between the barony of Ardes and the Mull of Galloway,—and there, even in the calmest weather, they produce for miles such a swelling, tumbling, troughy sea, and such rapid changes and singular phenomena of current, as are fitted to perplex and confound an observer ignorant of their cause. We shall, in a general manner, indicate the various tidal currents round the coast, and other local peculiarities of the waters of the sea; and shall rapidly notice, in the order of their occurrence from north round by east and south, the principal channels, sounds, bays, and estuaries. We must refer, however, for all lengthened description, to particular articles in the alphabetical arrangement of the body of our Work.

Ireland has been computed to possess 14 harbours for the largest ships, 17 for frigates, from 30 to 40 for medium-sized merchant vessels, upwards of 24 good summer roadsteads, and a very large number of harbours for fishing-boats or small sailing craft.—The principal of the few coves and small bays which occur between Malin Head and Innishowen Head are the bays of Culdaff, Tremone, and Kennagoe; but they are very confined, quite open, and not very serviceable even to yawls. From Malin Head, along a line at the mean distance of about 2 miles from the shore, to a point off Innishowen Head, the true streams of tide run six hours each way; but within the line, at half-flood the stream turns to the west, and at half-ebb to the east. Lough Loyle enters between Magilligan Point and the main shore of Innishowen, is less than a mile wide at the entrance, penetrates the land 15 miles south-south-westward, has an extreme interior breadth of 8 miles, forms a large triangular basin with low shores on two of the sides, but is navigable only in a narrow channel along the Innishowen shore, the rest being occupied by extensive shoals and sand-banks. The mouth of the Bann, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of Magilligan Point, is narrow, highly barred, and ill-suited for either shelter or navigation; and one of two tiny harbours, situated on the main coast near the boundary between the counties of Londonderry and Antrim, possesses more an apparent than a real importance from being the call-harbour of the Londonderry and Glasgow steamers for the town of Coleraine. Most of the little bays upon the north coast of Antrim are as useless for commerce as they are wonderful for scenery; but Ballycastle bay, between Kenbane Head and Fair Head, possesses capacity and shelter for small vessels. North of a line from Innistrahul, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Malin Head, to the entrance of Ballycastle bay, the flood sets to the east six hours, and the ebb the contrary; and south of the line, at half-flood by the shore, the stream sets to the west till half-ebb by the shore, and the contrary. The sound or strait of Rathlin, between Fair Head and Rathlin Island, is 3 miles wide, has so rapid a current as to be called the Race of Rathlin, and sometimes exhibits the phenomenon of the mirage, similar to the fata morgana. At $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Fair Head, spring and neap tides have a current of respectively 3 and $2\frac{1}{2}$ knots; and at $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Fair Head, they have a current of respectively 3 and $1\frac{1}{2}$ knots. A current $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Rathlin is called the Race of Skerrinoe, breaks heavily in blowing weather, and is said to have only 15 fathoms and a rocky bottom. The principal bays and marine inlets of the east coast of Antrim are Murlough bay, Cushendun bay, Red bay, Glenarum bay, and Lough Lorne; but only the last of these is a good harbour, or even comparatively valuable for navigation. Spring tides off these bays rise 9 feet; and neap tides, from 4 to 5. From Tor Point to Cushendun, the tides run true six hours each way, except within a cable's-length of the shore; from Garron Point to Cushendun, the ebb stream runs three hours to the north after low water by the shore, making nine hours ebb and three hours flood or southern stream in Red bay; within $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile of the shore, along a line from Garron Point to Ballygalley Head, there is a counter stream from half-flood to half-ebb; and the current of spring tides, off Ballygalley Head, runs $2\frac{1}{2}$ knots.

Belfast Lough penetrates the land 14 miles south-westward between co. Antrim and co. Down; it is of easy access, has a current at the mouth of $2\frac{1}{2}$ knots in spring tides, and possesses several interior small harbours, particularly at Carrickfergus and Bangor; it was formerly so encumbered with shoals near the head as to be navigated with difficulty by large vessels to Belfast, but it has of late been rendered practicable by the cutting of a long artificial channel; and its shores and seaboard are beautiful and expressive in their scenic features, and compose one of the richest and most powerful landscapes in the kingdom. Donaghadee Harbour, 3 miles south-south-east of Nout Head, was naturally very small and very indifferent, but it has been artificially improved at an enormous cost, and is now a pretty good pier harbour,—distinguished for being the mail-packet station for all the north of Ireland. The current, off Ballyferis Point, runs 3 knots in spring tides; and the stream in shore, 5 miles south of Ballyhalbert, turns at half-flood to the north. The largest bays between Ballyhalbert and Ballyquintin Point, are the bays of Cloghy, Quintin, and Millin; but they are mere open coves, of value only to fishing-boats. Lough Strangford is, in some respects, the most curious piece of marine water in the kingdom: its entrance is a narrow channel, extending north by westward, and not less than $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length; the Lough itself extends 15 miles northward, with an extreme breadth of $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is profusely studded with islets, and richly furnished with good harbours and anchoring-grounds; an exceedingly, rapid tide sweeps the whole of its entrance, and, together with some sunken rocks, occasions it to be shunned by all strangers; the seaward end of the entrance, though exhibited in the Admiralty Charts as having a bar with only 12 feet of water at ebb-tide, was proved in 1824 to have, on the very line of the alleged bar, a depth of 5 fathoms; and so powerfully do the tides set in from the adjacent sea to fill up the great interior space of the Lough, that there is a frequent indraught at even so great a distance as $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the entrance. Ardglass and Killough Harbours, immediately north of St. John's Point, are small but useful; Dundrum bay, though large, is unsheltered, and has only some fishing havens; and all the other harbours of co. Down are fit only for fishing craft, or very small trading vessels. Lough Carlingford penetrates between co. Down and co. Louth $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-westward to Narrow Water at Warrenpoint; it has a bar with only 9 feet of water at low spring ebbs, so that it can be entered by large vessels only in certain states of the tide; and it is justly celebrated for the brilliance and sublimity of the scenic character of its shores. The tidal current off the mouth of Lough Carlingford runs $3\frac{1}{2}$ knots in spring tides. Dundalk bay, of very wide entrance and sweeping scope of interior, penetrates the land to the extreme extent of only 9 miles, and is all shallow, and over much of its space dry at low water. Between Dundalk bay and Howth occur several good tide havens, but no tolerable permanent harbour, except the mouth of the Boyne between co. Louth and co. Meath, carrying up large steamers and other heavy vessels to Drogheda, and connecting the interior Boyne navigation with the ocean. Howth Harbour, on the north side of the peninsula of Howth, naturally consists of the narrow sound between that peninsula and the island of Ireland's Eye, and it has, at an enormous expense, been artificially improved to serve as the mail-packet station to Holyhead; but it has grievously baffled the efforts of engineers, stultified the calculations of economists, and disappointed the expectations of the public.

Dublin bay—famous for the exquisite beauty of its shores and the dazzling brilliance of its seaboard—penetrates the land 7 miles westward, has ordinary tides of 9 feet, and spring tides of 13 feet; and, though highly barred and of troublesome navigation at the head, possesses on its south side the fine artificial harbour of Kingstown. The principal harbours between Dublin bay and Wexford Harbour, are those of Wicklow and Arklow; but the latter is bad, the former is indifferent, and every minor one is subordinated at best to the precarious accommodation of fishing craft. Off the middle of the coast of Wicklow, the tidal stream sets from north to north-east, and spring and neap tides rise respectively 12 and 7 feet; 10 miles off Cahore Point, the stream sets north by east half-east, and spring and neap tides rise respectively 14 and 7 feet, and 15 miles off the entrance of Wexford Harbour, the stream sets north-north-east, and spring tides rise 13 feet. Wexford Harbour, though narrow at the entrance, penetrates the land $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles westward, and expands interiorly to an extreme breadth of 8 miles; but it has a bar at the mouth, and is everywhere shallow, and encumbered with shifting sands. At 20 miles south-east of Carnsore Point, the stream sets north-north-east half-east, and spring and neap tides rise respectively 17 and 9 feet; and at 8 miles south-south-east of Carnsore Point, the stream sets north-east by north to east, and spring and neap tides rise respectively 14 and $6\frac{1}{2}$ feet. Tacumshane Lough, immediately west of Carnsore Point, and the waters of Ballyteigue and other bays between Crossfernogue Point and Hook Head, are so shallow that they can scarcely boast the dignity of even very minor havens. Waterford Harbour enters between co. Wexford and co. Waterford, attains an extreme interior breadth of $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles, extends $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles northward to the confluence of the Suir and the Barrow, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles farther up the Suir to the city of Waterford; and, besides connecting the valuable navigation of the Barrow and the Suir with the ocean, it is so deep as to carry vessels of 600 tons up to the city, and also possesses on its west side and near its entrance the pretty and convenient mail-packet station of Dunmore. Alland's bay, between Swiney Head and Brownstown Head, is a mere open sweep, walled round with bluff shores. The tidal current, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of the entrance of this bay, runs at the rate of three miles in the hour. Tramore bay, immediately west of Brownstown Head, penetrates the land to the extent of 2 miles; but it is quite open,—it has foul and rocky ground,—it is swept by a very rapid tidal current,—it becomes trembling and tempestuous in any wind between the south-south-east and the west-south-west; and, being often mistaken in hazy weather for the entrance to Waterford Harbour, it is one of the most dangerous pieces of water within the whole circle of the Irish coast. The chief marine indentations between Tramore bay and Dungarvan Harbour, are Bonmahon bay, Ballydowan bay, Blind Cove, and Clonea bay; but all are unsheltered, and of comparatively small value. Dungarvan Harbour measures 5 miles across the entrance, and penetrates the land to the extent of 5 miles; but it is all shallow, principally dry at low water, and not deeper at the town than 9 feet in spring tides. The principal marine indentations between Dungarvan bay and the estuary of the Blackwater, are Muggort's bay, Ardmore bay, and Whiting bay; but, in a general view, they are small, open, and iron-bound. The estuary of the Blackwater or Youghal Harbour, suddenly contracts from 4 miles to less than 1 mile, and prolongs itself with estuarial width to a little distance above the town of Youghal; and, though having only 4 feet of water on the bar at ebb tide, it carries vessels of 12 feet draught to the town, and connects the navigations of the Blackwater and the Bride with the ocean. Ballycotton bay and Croneen bay occur between Youghal Harbour and Cork Harbour, but they are open, slenderly penetrating, and of little practical utility, the former with a low beach, and the latter with a bluff shore.

Cork Harbour—exclusive of an outer and open seaward sweep, which may be regarded as a sort of outer harbour—enters by a narrow channel of 2 miles in length, and suddenly expands into one of the finest landlocked basins in the world,—a basin capacious enough to accommodate the entire navy of England, and zoned all round with a singularly picturesque though close panorama. Ringabella creek opens on the west side of the outer harbour of Cork, a little north of Cork Head, and possesses a small estuarial character. Robert's Cove, Rocky bay, Oyster haven, and the other indentations between Cork Head and Kinsale Harbour, are generally unsheltered, or afford but slight accommodation. Kinsale Harbour, consisting of the estuary of the Bandon river, is not capacious, and has a bar across its entrance with 12 feet of water at ebb tide; yet it is a safe and excellent port, and, but for the nearness to it of the superb harbour of Cork, could hardly fail to be extensively known to fame. Courtmacsherry bay, Clonakilty bay, Ross Harbour, Glendore Harbour, Toe bay, and Barlog bay, between the Old Head of Kinsale and the peninsula at the east side of Baltimore Harbour, have aggregately great expanse, and contain some good coves and tolerable anchoring grounds, and possess great scope and value for the fisheries, yet are of only second and third rate importance for the purposes of general navigation and traffic. Baltimore Harbour, and the large and intricate series of straits, sounds, and coves, which alternate with islands and peninsulæ in the archipelago to the west of it, afford complete shelter and comparatively excellent accommodation. Skull Harbour, Ballydelvin bay, Crookhaven, and Barley cove, on the east side of the large peninsula which terminates in Mizen Head, have all considerable claims upon notice; and Dr. Campbell has remarked upon Crookhaven in particular, that, in any other country than Ireland, or even on any coast except that of the county of Cork, it would be esteemed an admirable port. Dunmanus bay penetrates the land 16 miles north-eastward, is easily entered, and has almost everywhere deep water and good anchorage; and though exposed across its mouth to the westerly gales, it contains some shelter from them behind some tiny headlands in its interior; yet, in consequence of the immediate vicinity of Bantry bay, it is practically treated as of no value except for the uses of fishermen. Bantry bay penetrates the land 24 miles north-eastward, is one of the finest and most capacious harbours in Europe, contains the singularly excellent asylum of Berhaven, besides an absolute profusion of good anchoring ground, and boasts a seaboard of exquisite beauty, opulent grandeur, and most imposing power. The small bays in the near vicinity of Crow Head afford little or no shelter; yet, the narrow sound between the peninsula which it terminates and Dursey Island, contains tolerably good anchoring ground. The Kenmare estuary penetrates the land 29 miles north-eastward to the mouth of the Ruaghty rivulet; it has almost everywhere clean ground and deep water; and it contains at least four good coves or harbours,—one about the middle of its north-west side, one near its head, and two near respectively the middle and the seaward end of its south-east side. The tidal current into the mouth of the Kenmare estuary has a rate of only about a mile in the hour; but at 10 or 12 miles off the mouth, or about 4 miles west of Dursey Island, it runs southward, and has a rate in springs of 3 miles in the hour. Ballinaskelligs bay measures $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles across the entrance, and has nearly a circular outline of about $4\frac{1}{2}$ or $4\frac{3}{4}$ miles in diameter; but it lies open to the south-west; and, in spite of partial shelter off the mouth, affords little refuge or protection, and is remarkable chiefly for the wild grandeur of its scenery. St. Finnan's bay, immediately north-north-west of Bolus Head, is an altogether open and iron-bound sweep of the sea. Valentia Harbour consists in a larger sense of the whole semicircular and comparatively narrow sound between Valentia Island and the mainland, and in a smaller sense of a branch of that sound extending between the islands of Valentia and Inchbeg; and while, in either sense, it is justly celebrated for its landlocked anchorage, the best in Kerry, it has of late years become very favourably known in its smaller sense as a proposed terminus of railway from Dublin, and mail-packet station for communicating with New Brunswick. Dingle bay penetrates the land 22 miles east-north-eastward, and is, in a general view, open and dangerous; yet Ventry Harbour, 5 miles from the seaward end of its north side, is of easy access, and can accommodate the largest ships, but is swept by heavy squalls from the west,—Dingle Harbour, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the entrance, and on the same side of the bay, accommodates small coasting-vessels, but places them aground on soft mud at low water,—and Castlemaine Harbour, at the head of the bay, extends 6 miles eastward, has a bar with only 9 feet of water across its mouth, is entered by a circuitous, narrow, and intricate channel, and contains well-sheltered interior anchoring ground. The sound between Dunmore Head and the Blasquet Islands is from 1½ to 1½ mile wide, has great depth of water, and is swept by a careering tidal current; and on its west side, between the Great Blasquet and Innisbeg, occurs an anchoring ground. Smerwick Harbour measures 2½ miles across the entrance, penetrates the land to the extent of 3½ miles, and contains an anchoring ground which is safe in most winds. Brandon bay measures 4½ miles across the entrance, penetrates the land to the extent of 6½ miles, and forms a semicircular sweep quite open to the north. Tralee bay and harbour are shallow, and afford but indifferent anchorage; and the navigation to the town of Tralee is in a great measure artificial. Ballyheigue bay—very nearly identical with the entrance-part of Tralee bay, and extending thence to Kerry Head—is a shallow, open, inhospitable sweep, liable to be mistaken for the estuary of the Shannon, just as Tramore bay is for the entrance of Waterford Harbour, and constituting a theatre of perils on the west coast of Ireland similar to that which Tramore bay constitutes in the south. The estuary of the Shannon is not only a singularly large and safe series of asylums for shipping, but constitutes a facile far-extending stretch of inland tidal navigation, and also connects with the ocean the exceedingly prolonged fresh water navigation of the Shannon, together with artificial ramifications by the Grand and Royal Canals. The marine indentations from Loop Head to Black Head, or along the whole oceanward face of the county of Clare, are all small and mostly ironbound and dangerous; and those, in particular, which occur in what is called Mal bay, or between Ballard Point and Hagg's Head, are so very inhospitable that vessels embayed in or near them are exposed to imminent peril of shipwreck.

Galway bay, as measured from respectively Black Head, the middle of the Arran Islands, and the uttermost of the flanking islets on the north side of the entrance, penetrates the land to the extent of 16, of 31, and of 42 miles; it has, within Black Head, a mean breadth of about 7½ miles; it abounds in useful inlets on the south and across the head; it has recently acquired a very superior artificial harbour at the town of Galway; and, though low and tame on the northern seaboard, and unindented in outline along a large proportion of the north side, it possesses, in its southern and eastern shores, in the Arran islands across its entrance, in part of its northern seaboard, and in the intricate intermixture of islets and peninsulae near its head, a very large amount of opulent landscape. Spring and neap tides rise in the bay respectively 16½ and 7 feet; and the tidal current near the north shore and opposite Black Head flows at the rate of about a mile in the hour. The bays, sounds, and estuaries of a character eminently adapted to usefulness, from Cashlee bay on the north side of Galway bay opposite to the Arran Islands, round to Killery Harbour, on the boundary between co. Galway and co. Mayo, are so numerous, so ramified, and in fact of such incessant occurrence, that we had not space for a due general notice of them even in the article CUNEMARA [which see]; yet eminently good though these harbours are, particularly those of Kilkerrin, Birtterbuy, Roundstone, and Ardabear, they are rarely visited by any craft except fishing vessels, turf-boats, a few small coasting vessels, and occasional revenue cutters. Most of the Cunnemara marine inlets, and especially the wondrous inlet of Killery between Galway and Mayo, present the most powerful and gorgeous combinations of Highland landscape,—such as, with few exceptions, rivals the best and excels a large proportion on the western and northern coasts of Scotland. Clew bay measures 7½ miles across the entrance, and penetrates the land to the extent of 17½ miles; it is protected across the mouth by Clare Island, and multitudinously sprinkled, over a space of 35 or 37 square miles at the head, with small fertile green islands; it possesses in the sounds among these islands, and in small inlets at its head, some good harbours; and, in the scenery of its shores and surface, it combines the savage, the sublime, and the softly beautiful with more richness and effect than probably any other sheet of either salt or fresh water in the three kingdoms, excepting the celebrated Loch Lomond in Scotland. The tidal stream off Clew bay, and over a great extent of the adjacent coast, sets due north; and the current, at the distance of 16 miles due west from Achill Head, runs at the rate of 3½ miles in the hour. Blacksod bay, with its ramifications of Blacksod Harbour, Tulloghaan bay, and Achill Sound, has aggregately a great extent, considerable ramifications, important fishing-harbours, and good deep anchoring grounds; but it wants sufficiency of shelter, and washes too poor shores, to be ever of much subsergency to commerce. The tidal current, in setting northward across the mouth of Blacksod bay, runs at the rate of only one mile in the hour. Broadhaven, between Erris Head and Benwee Head, is capacious but open to the north over one-half of its extent, and narrow and shallow over the other half; yet it contains sheltered anchoring ground, and might be made of great value in a less poor and remote country. The marine indentations between Benwee Head and Downpatrick Head are so small and ironbound as hardly, in any other instances than those of Bealderrig and Bunatrahah, to afford even the most slender shelter to fishing-boats. Killalla bay, or the estuary of the Moy, is capacious but shallow and encumbered with sandbanks; yet it carries up a comparatively large amount of shipping toward Ballina, and has been proposed as one of three great marine outlets for a system of interior and very ramified navigation, whose other marine outlets are Clew bay at Westport, Galway bay at Galway, the estuary of the Shannon, and the bay of Dublin. The outer part of Sligo bay measures 7 miles across the entrance, and though capacious is very much exposed; the two inner parts, called Ardnaglass Harbour and Drumcliffe bay, are large and sheltered but very shallow; and the central inner part, constituting Sligo Harbour proper, is furnished outside of the bar with a pier which, though of rather troublesome access, possesses very important adaptation to an already considerable and a prospectively great trade. Ballyshannon and Donegal harbours, at respectively the south side and the head of Donegal bay, are estuarial and of small capacity and not much depth; yet both are valuable; and the former, in particular, might, with the help of a canal or a railway to Lower Lough Erne, become a marine outlet to all the internal navigations of the west and north-west of Ireland. The principal inlets on the north side of Donegal bay are Inver bay, MacSwine's bay, Killybegs Harbour, and Fintragh bay; and the third of these—Killybegs Harbour—though narrow in the entrance, has a well-sheltered anchorage in from 6 to 8 fathoms of water, and can accommodate vessels of any burden. Donegal bay itself, apart from the inlets upon its shores, is a mere miniature gulf, quite open to the west, and often tossed into tremendous tumult by gales from the Atlantic. The larger bays and estuaries between Teelin Head and Horn Head, are Loughrusbeg and Loughrusmore south of Dawras Head, Guibarra bay north of Dawras Head, Innisfere and Guidore bays several miles south of Bloody Foreland, and Ballyness bay several miles east of Bloody Foreland; and the smaller bays and harbours of noticeable character are Malin bay between Teelin Head and Rossan Point, Glen bay immediately north of Rossan Point, Dawras bay between Loughrusmore and Dawras Head, Trawenagh bay an arm of Guibarra bay, Maghera bay north of Trawenagh, Dunglo Harbour north-east of Maghera bay, Rutland Harbour between Rutland Island and the mainland, and Curran's Port between Bloody Foreland and Ballyness bay; but—estimating the two classes jointly—some of the bays are destitute of shelter, others are shallow, intricate, and foul, others afford good shelter and accommodation to fishing craft, and only one or two are fit for the uses of coasting vessels. The tidal current between Bloody Foreland and Horn Head a little to seaward, or through the sound between Tory Island and the mainland, runs at the rate of 2 knots in spring tides, and three-fourths of a mile in neap tides. Sheephaven, immediately east of the Horn Head peninsula, measures $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles across the entrance, penetrates the land $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles southward, sends off a small ramification to the town of Dunfanaghy, and, though exposed over the greater part of its surface, is hindered from subordination to extensive trade only by the remoteness and poverty of the upland country which surrounds it. Mulroy bay sinuously penetrates the land in a prevalingly southern direction to the extent of 14 miles, but has an extreme breadth of $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and is aggregately shallow, intricate, and unsuited to general navigation. Lough Swilly measures $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles across the entrance, penetrates the land $25\frac{1}{2}$ miles southward, contains some excellent interior harbours, possesses perfectly safe anchoring ground for the largest man-of-war, is capable of sheltering and accommodating half the fleets of Europe, and boasts a series of highly diversified and strongly picturesque shores; yet it is frequented by comparatively very few trading vessels, and is shamefully little known either to merchants or to men of taste. Strathbreaga bay, which washes the south-west side of the peninsula of Malin, is a shallow and intricate inlet, of no value whatever to navigation. From Horn Head east-north-eastward to Malin Head, the true stream of tide sets along a line at the mean distance of about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the intervening headlands, six hours each way; but within else of the line, the stream turns at half-flood to the west, and at half-ebb to the east.

ISLANDS.

The coast islands belonging to Ireland lie for the most part so near the shore, that they might, with a very few exceptions, be placed within a general view of the prevailing coast-line from point to point of the mainland; and in a considerable aggregate of instances, they are separated from one another and from the mainland by such narrow and sinuous channels, as occasions them and adjoining peninsulæ to be intricately blended in series of alternations. Those of the north, the east, and the south-east are few and generally small; and those of the south-west and the west usually abound in number and expand in area nearly in the proportion of the indentedness and brokenness of the adjacent coasts of the mainland. The inhabited islands of Ulster amount to 27, with a population of about 5,000; those of Leinster to 2, with a population of about 50; those of Munster to 50, with a population of about 23,000; and those of Connaught to 60, with a population of about 16,000. The principal uninhabited islands of Ulster amount to 13; of Leinster, to 4; of Munster, to 20; and of Connaught, to about 20. But in indicating the islands, in the order in which they occur from the north round by the east and south, we must notice also such islets, rocks, and even shoals or sandbanks as are remarkable for either individual feature or relative connection.

The Garvan Isles are a tiny group of tiny islets, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by north of Malin Head. Ennistrahull, or Innistrahull, the most northerly ground belonging to Ireland, and the site of a light-house, lies $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Malin Head and $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of the Garvan Isles. The Tuns are a dangerous shoal, 2 miles in length, immediately off the mouth of Lough Foyle, and between Innishowen Head and Magilligan Point. The Skerries are a cluster of rocks half-a-mile east of Portrush. Rathlin, remarkable for its singularly romantic and beautiful basaltic structure, measuring about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length and the same distance in breadth, and belonging at one period to the kingdom of the Isles or Hebrides, lies 3 miles north-north-west of Fair Head. The Maidens are a group of two islets and a number of rocks $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Ballygalley Head. The Copeland Islands are a group of chiefly three isles, lying from $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east and east-north-east of the south side of the entrance of Belfast Lough. A chain or cordon of islets and rocks, lying from a few yards to $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles from the shore, fences nearly the whole coast from Ballyferis Point to Ballyquintin Point; the chief of them, named from north to south, are Black Rock, Long Rock, Skullmartin, Round Rock, Burial Island, Rock MacCammon, Little Plough Rock, Plough Rock, the Feathers, North Rocks, the Scotchman, and South Rock; and of these, Skullmartin and North Rocks are covered at half-tide. Angus Rock lies off the north-east side of the entrance of Lough Strangford; St. Patrick's Rock and Collet's Rock lie off the south-west side of that entrance; and a multitude of islets and rocks sprinkle the Lough's interior,—the chief of which, named from north to south, are MacCully's Rock, Rough Island, North Rock, South Rock, Boretree Island, Chapel Island, Mid Island, South Island, Beagh Island, Mahee Island, Innishanier, Bird Island, Drummond Island, Little Minnis, Great Minnis, Green Island, Dunsy Island, Island-More, Sconce Rock, Paul Island, Long Island, Round Island, Island-Paggart, Dunnynell Island, Salt Island, Gore's Island, and Castle Island. Gun's Island lies 1 mile south-south-west of Killard Point, and almost quite close to the nearest part of the mainland. Blockhouse Island and Green Island are two islets a little within the entrance of Lough Carlingford. The Cargee Rocks lie $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Balbriggan and within half-a-mile of the nearest part of the mainland. Four isles, called Colt's, St. Patrick's, Shennick's, and Rockabill Islands, lie from half-a-mile to $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of the town of Skerries. Lambay Island, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in diameter and 418 feet in height, lies $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Rush Point. Ireland's Eye, an isle of bold and romantic features, lies 1 mile north of the town of Howth, and forms the natural cover of Howth Harbour.

Dalkey Island screens the south side of the entrance of Dublin bay. A chain of shoals or banks fences by far the greater part of the coast from the vicinity of Ireland's Eye to the vicinity of Carnore Point, and nearly all the members of the chain extend in a prevailing southern direction,—so that, in indicating their relative position to the coast, we may be understood as pointing out the north end of each. The North Ground, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, lies $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Ireland's Eye; Bennet's Ground, 2 miles long, lies $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Howth Head; Burford Bank, 2 miles long, lies 2 miles south-south-east of Howth Head; Kish Bank, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, lies $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Dalkey Island; Bray Bank, 2 miles long, lies 8 miles east-south-east of Bray Head; the Codling Ridges, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, lie $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Bray Head; the South Ridge, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, lies $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by north of Wicklow Head; the India Grounds, 2 miles long, lie $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Wicklow Head; the Horse Shoe, one mile long, lies 5 furlongs south-east of Wicklow Head; the Arklow Banks, 12 miles long, lie $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Wicklow Head; Glasgorman's Bank, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, lies $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-north-east of Kilmichael Point; the Rush Bank, 4 miles long, lies immediately south-east of Cahore Point; Blackwater Bank, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, lies $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Cahore Point; Dogger Bank, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, lies $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east by south of Rosclare Point; Holden's Bank, 3 miles long, lies $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by south of Dogger Bank; the Bailies, 3 miles long, lie $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Holden's Bank; and a shoal, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles long, lies 2 miles east-south-east of Greenore Point. Several islets, the chief of which bear the names of Great, Brest, and Mud Islands, lie within Wexford Harbour. The Tuscar Rock, a remarkable mass of stone elevated 20 feet above high-water sea-level, and surrounded by a belt of dangerous sunk rocks, lies $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by north of Carnore Point. A series of rocks, the chief of which are called Carricks, Pollock, Whilkeen, Collough, and Findale, and all at a distance of from 4 to 6 furlongs from the shore, lie between Greenore Point and Carnore Point. Three tiny clusters of rock, called Black Rock, the Barrels, and the Tuns, lie respectively $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west, $3\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-west, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ south-west by west of Carnore Point. The Saltee Islands lie from $2\frac{1}{2}$ to $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Crossfarnogue Point; the Lesser Saltee, nearer the shore, measures 1 mile in length, and the Greater Saltee $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; a chain of rocks connects the former with the shore; and a group of rocks, many and perilous, lie round the south skirts of the latter, and extend $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles southward,—the two largest and remotest bearing the names of Coningmore and Coningbeg. The Keroe Islands are a mimic group in Ballyteigue bay; and the Selaker Rock lies immediately off the entrance of Bannow Harbour. Icaene Island, a mere pendicle of land, lies immediately adjacent to the coast, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Bonmahon Head. Gull's Island, a sheer spot of land, lies close to the coast, 4 miles south-west by west of Bonmahon Head. Cable Island screens the south-west side of the entrance of Youghal bay. Ballycotton Islands are a tiny cluster of islets at the south-west side of the entrance of Ballycotton bay.

Great Island, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length; Little Island, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length; Foaty Island, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length; Hawiboline Island, and Spike Island, lie within Cork Harbour. The Sovereign Islands are a mimic group across the mouth of Oyster haven. The Barrels are a little cluster of rocks in Courtmacsherry bay. A series of islets, the chief of which are Adam's Island, Squince Island, Low Island, High Island, Ragged Island, Skiddy Island, and Horse Island, closely flank the coast between Ross Harbour and Toe Head. The Stags of Castlehaven are a cluster of bold, beetling rocks, one mile south of Toe Head. Kedge Island is a pendicle of insulated ground, 2 miles east-south-east of the entrance of Baltimore Harbour. Cape Clear Island, terminating 7 miles south-west of the entrance of Baltimore Harbour, measuring $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-westward, and possessing an extreme altitude of 436 feet above sea-level, forms—with the exception of the Fastnet Rock, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of it—the most southerly ground in Ireland, and is the point whence most vessels sailing out to the Atlantic take their leave of British soil. Sherkin Island is separated from the north-east end of Cape Clear Island by an islet-sprinkled sound of a mile in breadth, and extends $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length north-north-eastward, so as to screen the west side of both the entrance and the interior of Baltimore Harbour. Within a straight line drawn due west from the middle of Sherkin Island to Mizen Head, lies a crowded archipelago, whose chief islands are Innismore $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, Innisbeg $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, Innisdriscoll $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, Castle Island $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, Horse Island $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile, Long Island $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles, East Calf, Mid Calf, West Calf, Mutton Island, Scheme Island, Carty's Island, Moan Island, Coney Island, and Goat Island. The chief of a number of islets sprinkled athwart Dunmanus bay, are Mannin, Owen, Bulge, Cold, Cabergy, Furze, Horse, Leek, and Bird Islands. Bere Island, 6 miles in length in the direction of east by north, and possessing an extreme altitude of 894 feet above sea-level, lies within Bantry bay 5 miles north of Sheep's Head, and screens the whole of the curved sound of from half-a-mile to a mile in breadth, which constitutes the noble harbour of Berehaven. Whiddy Island, extending $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length north-eastward, lies $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of the town of Bantry, and screens the whole of the west side of Bantry Harbour or anchoring ground. The islands in Bantry bay, additional to Bere and Whiddy, are all small; and the chief of them bear the names of Garrinish, Stuke, Horse, and Sheelbane Islands. The Grelogh Rocks and the Leek Rock lie respectively $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south and $9\frac{1}{2}$ south-west of Crow Head. Dursley Island measures 4 miles in length south-westward, and is separated by a narrow sound from Crow Head and the adjacent parts of the peninsula which that promontory terminates. The three islets called the Calf, the Cow, and the Bull, lie respectively $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south by west, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Dursley Island; and the Cow is $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile distant from the Calf, and the Bull 1 mile from the Cow. The principal islands in the Kenmare estuary, within a line drawn from the north end of Dursley Island to Lamb Head, are Rosmore, Dunkerrin, Cappanush, Sheep, Pigeon, and Green Island, and Illansloe, Illansharkey, Inniskellig, Illanleagh, Illanrane, Illanslane, and Inishfinard; and the first and second of these—Rosmore and Dunkerrin—measure respectively $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile and 1 mile in length. Two Head Island, 1 mile in length, lies half-a-mile south-west of Lamb Head. Hog and Scara Islands lie respectively $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south and $3\frac{1}{2}$ south by west of Hog Head. Horse Island, a mere dot of land, yet of some local note, lies close to the west side of Ballinaskelligs bay. The Great Skellig and the Little Skellig Rocks—the former soaring to an altitude of 707 feet above sea-level, and both possessing a character of singular power and wildness—lie respectively $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south and $7\frac{1}{2}$ due west of Bolus Head. The Lemon Rock lies $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Little Skellig, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west half-west of Bolus Head. Puffin Island, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length south-westward, screens the west side of St. Finnan's bay, and approaches within about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile of the mainland. Valentia Island measures $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-westward, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-westward, screens the whole of the curved sound of Valentia Harbour, and is diversified in its surface by the hills of Carramore, Carrabeg, and Fohilly, the last of which has an altitude of 686 feet above sea-level. The islets called Long Island and Church Island lie at the south entrance to Valentia Harbour; and Innisbeg and Lamb Island—the former upwards of a mile in length—lie within the north entrance. The Blasquet Islands—consisting of Inishtuiskero, Inishbeg, the Great Blasquet, Tiraght, Inishnubro, Inishmakillaan, the Foze Rock, and a number of skerries—lie from 1 mile to 10 miles seaward of Dunmore Head, chiefly in the direction of south-west; and the Great Blasquet, by much the largest island of the group, measures $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length. A sprinkling of islets and rocks, the principal of which are Illanemcil, Illanamoyne, and Garraha Island, lie nearly under a straight line between Brandon Head and Kerry Head; and the Mucklagh Rock and Samphire Island lie respectively in Ballyheigue bay and Tralee bay. The principal islands within the estuary of the Shannon are Innispikie, off Corless Point; Hog and Scatterry Islands—the latter famous for its pillar tower and ecclesiastical ruins—opposite Kilrush; Carrigafoyle, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, and close to the Kerry shore, direct south of Scatterry; Tarbert Rock, off Tarbert; Foynes Island, 1 mile in length, and opposite Shanagolden; Dear Island, Dynish, Rat Island, Innishadrain, Fynish, Low Island, Illanagranock, and others in the estuary of the Fergus; Beeve Rocks and Tramore Island opposite Askeaton; and Key Island, Gross Island, Greg Island, and the Whelps, between Pallaskerry and Limerick. The Inniskerry Islands and Mutton Island—the latter about a mile long, and all forming one small group 2 miles north-north-west of the north side of the entrance of Dunbeg bay—are the only noticeable islands on the west coast of co. Clare.

The Arran Islands—forming a tolerably compact group of 16 miles in length and 3 in extreme breadth, and consisting of a tiny sub-group called the Branach isles in the north-west, Arranmore or Illanmore, $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and two other islands respectively 3 miles and 2 miles in length—extend north-westward right across the entrance of Galway bay, lifting their highest ground 460 feet above sea-level and forming a strong natural protection to the bay against the furious western surges of the Atlantic. Numerous islets are sprinkled in intricacy athwart the head of Galway bay; and the chief of them are called Mutton, Hare, and Tawna Islands, Meenish, and Elaneddy. The principal islands and islets in the crowded archipelago, between Cashleh bay and Slyn Head, are Garomna $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, Littermore $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, Littermullen 2 miles in length, Innisbaraha 1 mile in length, Innistravin 1 mile in length, Annaghvaan 1 mile in length, Illanrura, Illankin, Illanirach, Birr, Dynish, Furnish, Innisherik, Knappogh, Carricketra, Tynish $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, Mynish $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, Innisnooskery, Carrickmashin, Skird Rocks, Mason Island, Toneyall, Myle Rocks, Crunakarra, Crunakeel, Smith's Rock, Floor Rock, Fruhillan, Innishtrech, Innislackan, Innishnee 3 miles in length, Carrickcauly, Little Bellows, the Bellows Rocks, Carrickirk, Innisdaury, Fox Island, Hanora, and Duck Island. Innisboffin, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles long and $2\frac{1}{2}$ broad, lies $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by north of Renvyle Point, or the extreme southern screen of the entrance of Killery Harbour; and Innishark, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, lies $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile west-south-west of Innisboffin. The principal islands between Slyn Head on the south and Innisboffin and Innishark on the north, are Lyin, Innisdoogan, Clarks, Breakers, Knockatoorish, Tonterry, Muingeruton, Tarbert, Innisturk, Eshall, Grua, Omev $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, Hligh Island, Friar Island, Cudda, Frughillaan, Innisbrooan, Black Rock, Glassillaan, and Innisgort. Several islets and many rocks lie close to the shore of Innisboffin. Innisbruan and a tiny group called the Cramp Islands lie adjacent to Renvyle Point. Another tiny group, called the Innistegil Islands, lie in the mouth, or rather throat, of Killery Harbour. Freehill Island lies $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of the Innistegil Islands. Innisturk, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and $1\frac{1}{2}$ in breadth, lies 5 miles north-north-east of Innisboffin, and 7 miles west of Devlin Point. Innisdalla, Ballybeg Island, and Cahir Island, lie respectively $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east, 2 east, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ east by north of Innisturk. Clare Island, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ in breadth, and 1,457 feet in extreme altitude above sea-level, lies $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Emloagh Point, and forms a strong natural breakwater at the entrance of Clew bay. Even the chief of the multitudinous isles and islets at the head of Clew bay are so many, that we must refer for the enumeration of them to the article on Clew bay in the body of our Work. Achillbeg, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, lies closely adjacent to the south-eastern extremity of Achill, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Clare Island. Achill—separated from the mainland partly by a very narrow and shallow strait, and partly by Achill Sound or the south-eastern limb of Blacksod bay—measures $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles in the direction of west by south, and $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles in the direction of north-north-west, and lifts the four principal summits of its wild and upland surface, Knockmore, Minnaun, Slieve-more, and Croghan, to the altitude of respectively 1,119, 1,530, 2,217, and 2,222 feet above sea-level. Annagh Island and Innisbegil, respectively 2 miles and $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, lie in Achill Sound. Davillaun, 1 mile in length, lies 2 miles south-south-west of the south-western extremity of the Mullet peninsula; and Davillaunbeg, Gaughta, and Leamarcha Islands, lie between it and the mainland. A cluster of Skerries, called the Black Rock, lies $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Davillaun; and a comparatively wide sprinkling of rocks, the chief of which is called Carricklaven, occurs between Davillaun and South Inniskea. The southern extremity of South Inniskea lies 3 miles north-west of Davillaun; the east shores of South and North Inniskea lie from 2 miles to $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of the Mullet; and these two islands are mutually separated by a very narrow strait, and measure each 2 miles in length. The islets of Carrigea, Duffer, Inniskeeragh, Innisglora, 1 mile in length, and David's Island, lie between North Inniskea and Erris Head. Kid Island, the Stags of Broadhaven, Muck Island, and several other islets and rocks, lie in the vicinity of Benwee Head. Illanmaster and Horse Island lie near the shore between Benwee Head and Downpatrick Head. Bartragh, a low and narrow island, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, lies in Killalla bay, opposite the town of Killalla. Derrinch islet lies in Ardnaglass harbour. Magain's Island, Coney Island 1 mile in length, Black Rock, the site of a lighthouse, the Wheten Rocks, seen only in spring tides, and Bird Rock, lie

In Sligo bay. Seal Rock, Horse Island, and Ardboline Island, lie a little south-west of Lackmeeltan Point. Innismurray, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, and curious in its social condition, lies $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Lackmeeltan Point. Dernish and Hugh Islands lie close to the south shore of Donegal bay; and Innisduff close to the north shore. A mimic group, called the Rathlin O'Byrne Islands, lie $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of Teelin Head. The islets of Toralaydan and Tormore lie close to the shore, 6 miles north-east of Rossan Point. Innisbarnog lies off the mouth of Loughrusmore. Roaninish and Inniskeel—the latter 1 mile in length—lie in Guibarra bay. Arran Island, or North Arran, measures 4 miles southward and 3 westward; and lies $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of the nearest part of the mainland, $3\frac{1}{2}$ north-west of the north side of the entrance of Maghery bay, and $9\frac{1}{2}$ north by east of Dawros Head. The islands, enclosed in an imaginary triangle formed by lines from Maghery bay to Arran, from Arran to Dunglo, and from Dunglo to Maghery, are Illancrone, Inniskeeragh, Innisheane, Innishall, and Upper Innisfree,—the last about 1 mile in diameter. The islands in the Sound between Arran and the mainland, are Rutland 1 mile in length, Eighter, Laghan, and Innishenny. The islands between Arran and Bloody Foreland are Cruit $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, Owey 1 mile in length, Torglass, the Stage of Arranmore, Gola 1 mile in length and 228 feet in altitude, Inniamcane, and Inniserran $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length. On the outer side of Tory Sound, 7 miles north-north-east of Bloody Foreland, and $8\frac{1}{2}$ west by north of Horn Head, lies Tory Island, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and 281 feet in altitude. The Islands in Tory Sound are Innisbeg, Innisdoeey 1 mile in length, and Innisboffin $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length and 110 feet in altitude. Clonmas islet lies in Sheephaven. The Frenchman's Rock lies 3 miles north of Pointahomash. Inch Island, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ in breadth, and 737 feet in extreme altitude, lies in Lough Swilly, $14\frac{1}{2}$ miles from its entrance. Glashedy isle lies $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile west of the south side of the entrance of Strathbreaga bay.

COAST-LIGHTS.

The coast-lights of Ireland, as to site and general character, are the following: A lighthouse, with revolving light, on Innistrathull; two lighthouses, with fixed lights, at Innishowen Head; two lighthouses, with fixed lights, on two of the Maiden Islands; a lighthouse at Larne; a lighthouse, with fixed light, on Lighthouse Island, one of the Copeland group; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at Donaghadee; a lighthouse, with revolving light, on the South Rock north-east of Quintin bay; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at Ardglass; a lighthouse, with double fixed lights, at the north side of the entrance of Lough Carlingford; a lighthouse, with revolving light, on the point of a tiny peninsula on the south-west of Lough Carlingford, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles within the Lough's entrance; a lighthouse at Drogheda; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at Balbriggan; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at Howth, opposite Ireland's Eye; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at the Bailey of Howth, or south-eastern termination of Howth peninsula; a lighthouse, with double fixed lights, at the Pigeon House in Dublin bay; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at the east end of the North Wall in Dublin Harbour; a lighthouse, with revolving light, at Kingstown; a light-ship, with triangular lights, at the north end of Kishbank; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at Wicklow Head; a light-ship, at the south end of Arklow bank; a lighthouse, with revolving light, on the Tuscar Rock; a light-ship, with double lights fixed, 4 miles south by west of the Greater Saltee Island; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at Hook Head; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at Dunmore in Waterford Harbour; a lighthouse, with double lights fixed, at Duncannon, in Waterford Harbour; a lighthouse at Duncannon Fort; a lighthouse, with fixed light, on Roches Point, at the east side of the entrance of Cork Harbour; a lighthouse, with fixed light, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile within the entrance of Kinsale Harbour; a lighthouse, with fixed light, on the east side of the Old Head of Kinsale; a lighthouse, with revolving light, on the south-east side of Cape Clear Island; a lighthouse at Crookhaven; a lighthouse at Berehaven; a lighthouse, with fixed light, on the Great Skellig Island; a lighthouse at Valentia; a lighthouse, with fixed light, on Kileadrane Point, on the north side of the estuary of the Shannon; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at Tarbert, on the south side of the estuary of the Shannon; a lighthouse, with fixed light, on Loop Head; a lighthouse, with revolving light, in the centre of Illammore, or the largest island of the South Arran group; a lighthouse, with a fixed light, on Mutton Island, in Galway bay, off the entrance of Galway Harbour; a lighthouse, with two lights, the one fixed and the other revolving, on Slyne Head; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at the northern extremity of Clare Island; a lighthouse, with fixed light, on Inisigort, near the head of Clew bay; two lighthouses, with fixed lights, on Eagle Island, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by west of Erris Head; three lighthouses, with fixed lights, on islets in Sligo bay; a lighthouse, with fixed light, on St. John's Point, at the termination of a long and slender peninsula on the north side of Donegal bay; a lighthouse, with fixed light, on the headland between Killybegs Harbour and Macswines bay; a lighthouse within Killybegs Harbour; a lighthouse on North Arran Island; a lighthouse, with fixed light, at the north-west extremity of Tory Island; and a lighthouse, with fixed light, on Fannat Point, at the west side of the entrance of Lough Swilly.

In 1810, when the coast-lights of Ireland were transferred by act of parliament from the care of the Commissioners of Customs to that of the Corporation for preserving and improving the port of Dublin, only fifteen lighthouses were in existence on the Irish coasts; eight of these were either in such bad repair or upon such unsuitable sites as to require to be rebuilt; and the whole were lighted either by candles or by oil in ill-constructed lanterns and lamps. Against 1833, the eight defective lighthouses were rebuilt; twenty-one entirely new lighthouses were erected; three light-ships were established; the apparatus of lighting was in every instance of the most approved construction; alarm-bells were attached to the lighthouses and the light-ships, to be rung during the prevalence of dense fogs; and various beacon-towers, perches, and buoys were provided at the most needful localities around the greater part of the coast. In 1841, the lighthouse sites were forty-one in number; the lighthouses themselves were as much more numerous as there were instances of two and three in a locality of one designation; the light-ships were three; and the lighthouses in the course of erection were five. The cost of erecting a small lighthouse averages about £5,000; and recommendations for the erection of one usually emanates from shipowners or from persons interested in a particular place. A charge is made of one farthing per ton on British vessels, and one halfpenny per ton on foreign vessels, for each light passed; and is collected by the collectors of customs in every port in Great Britain and Ireland. In 1833, the average annual expenditure on account of the lighthouses and light-ships was about £16,000 a-year; and the annual amount of dues collected at the ports of Ireland and at those of Great Britain was computed at respectively £9,000 and £30,000. During the year ending Dec. 31, 1840, the total cost of existing lighthouses was £30,803 6s. 6d., of lighthouses in the course of erection £6,116 5s. 9d., of lighthouse tenders and lighthouse stores £1,686 16s. 9d., of light-ships £3,767 2s. 3d., of beacons, buoys, and perches £1,531 13s. 1d., of contingencies £5,133 4s. 4d.,—in all £49,038 8s. 8d.; and the receipts from ports in England amounted to £32,198 14s. 7d., from ports in Scotland £5,721 13s. 7d., from ports in Ireland £12,593 9s. 9d., from old lighthouses at Newport £50,—in all £50,563 17s. 11d.

GENERAL SURFACE.

Compared to Scotland and Wales, Ireland is a rather flat country; and compared to England, it is decidedly hilly and mountainous. A considerable proportion of its surface resembles in character the Scottish and the Welsh Highlands; a large proportion is similar in conformation to the English plains; and a still larger proportion possesses various features and appearances either peculiar to itself or more or less unlike those of any noticeably large district of Great Britain. Notwithstanding an enormous aggregate of brown bog on both plain and mountain, and in spite also of a large amount of naked rock and shallow, hungry, moorish soil, the prevailing aspect is one of verdure and fertility, such as instantly suggests and indicates to a stranger the fondly encomiastic epithets of 'green' and 'emerald' Isle. The naturally arable land bears an exceedingly larger proportion to the entire than that of Scotland and Wales; and the pasture land figures more prominently than that of England, and aggregately possesses a far richer greenness and a more luxuriant vegetation. Wood—that gorgeous feature of landscape, which enters almost as much into the composition of picturesqueness in either hill or dale as plumage does into the beauty of birds—is far from being so meagre in amount throughout Ireland as tourists and topographers have usually affirmed; but, except in the environs of Dublin, in portions of Armagh and Down, and in some other limited districts, it is generally amassed into demesnes and groves, and utterly fails to relieve any great expanse of country from an appearance of having been stripped and peeled into a state of shivering nakedness. "Perhaps," says MacCulloch, in his 'Statistical Account of the British Empire,' "there is nothing that makes a deeper impression on an Englishman or a Scotchman, visiting Ireland for the first time, than the contrast between what are called the demesnes (parks) of the nobility and gentry, and the immediately contiguous parts of their estates. In Britain, it is frequently very difficult, when one cannot see the wall or fence, to discriminate between what is and what is not park. But in Ireland this is a matter about which there can be no mistake. They differ as widely as light and darkness. Within the park, we have wood, neat cottages, good farming, good teams, fine pasture land, and perhaps deer; but the instant we cross its boundary, we seem to be in a totally different region; and in nine cases out of ten, not a tree is to be seen, and we meet only with hovels, the vilest management, miserable teams, and the most unequivocal symptoms of a want of capital and enterprise. The fields in Ireland are generally smaller than even the smallest of those in England; and, if they be divided at all, it is usually with what are called turf dykes, which neither make good fences nor afford shelter, at the same time that they have a poor miserable look." This, as a whole, is too true a picture of nearly all those parts of Ireland which have not been renovated and beautified by modern georgic improvement; but though it also, as regards the disposition of wood, correctly depicts a large proportion of even the improved districts, it practically misrepresents and even foully caricatures most of the best lands of Ulster, a great part of Leinster, a considerable amount of Munster, and even some penderies of villipended Connaught. Even MacCulloch's 'statistical' writer accordingly adds that, "in various parts, the aspect of the country is such as would do no discredit even to the best districts of England;" and any person even slenderly acquainted with the country can name tracts of nearly an hundred miles in length, and traversed by the most public roads of the kingdom, such as those between Belfast and Enniskillen, between Belfast and Dublin, and between Limerick and Waterford, in which a candid Briton will observe, if not the uniform opulence of the richest English scenery, at least an ample equivalent for it,—excellencies and beauties peculiarly Irish abundantly compensating for the want or the paucity of any pleasing features which predominate in England.

Ireland, as to general configuration of surface, possesses the singular character of a vast central plain, surrounded by a seaboard of mountains. Theoretic topography—or that which loves to fuse detached hills into ranges, to combine dispersed heights into systems, and to trace imaginary concatenations of mountain across valley and sea—is familiar with the idea of a great central upland falling off on all sides to the ocean, and with that of a grand interior tableau abutting downward upon encompassing plains, and with that of a prolonged 'back-bone' of country whose ribs decline laterally to opposite shores, and with that of a curved or fitful summit-line of mountain overlooking on one side a precipitous descent, and on another a long shelving declination to the sea; but it may study upon the face of Ireland the unique phenomenon of mountain masses forming a stupendous bulwark round the greater part of the circuit of the coast, and enclosing an enormous expanse of plain, comparatively low and undiversified, and aggregately far below the level of even the spurs or lower declivities of the environing mountains. A systematizing topographer who should approach Ireland in ignorance of its superficial configuration, and who should permit his fancy to be stimulated by the grandeur and loftiness of the country's seaboard, would possibly anticipate an interior as sublime and mighty as the Apennines or the central Alps, and would certainly be confounded by a journey of 133 miles from Dublin to Galway, or from side to side of the kingdom, across a surface so low as to attain a summit-altitude of less than 300 feet above sea-level, and so flat and uniform as nowhere to possess a hill of more than 200 feet of altitude above the surrounding or prevailing elevation.

The mountains of Donegal, Londonderry, and Antrim occupy nearly all the northern seaboard; the mountains of Antrim, Louth, and Dublin, and the alpine masses of Down and Wicklow, occupy about two-thirds of all the east; the mountains of Waterford and Cork occupy the greater part of the south; and the alternate alpine uplands and lofty hills of Kerry, Clare, Galway, Mayo, Sligo, and Donegal, occupy very nearly the whole of the west. These mountain tracts rarely extend more than 20 miles inland; and, excepting some unimportant extensions of the northern Cork congeries into Limerick and Tipperary, the Blackstairs or Mount-Leinster range between Wexford and Carlow, and the Slievebloom range between King's county and Queen's county, they are the only heights of considerable greatness in Ireland. The south-western and the western congeries, in consequence of their exposure to the prevailing winds of the country and the fierce assaults of the Atlantic, are, to a large extent, cut into a deep and rugged alternation of steep promontory and far-invading bay; and, in most of these alternations, they present the interesting phenomenon, that the bed or bottom of the bays consists of secondary or carboniferous limestone, while the promontories are composed of either primitive or transition rocks, particularly of granite, mica slate, quartz rock, greywacke, and old red sandstone conglomerate. All the mountains nearest the coast, most of those on the interior or landward side of the seaboard, and even some of the few which occur toward the central districts of the kingdom, are in a great measure destitute of naturally systematic arrangement, consisting not so much of ranges or groups as of utterly irregular amassments, and occasionally of isolated heights; and the principal series which present an elongated and continuous character of the form of a ridge in any part of the country are the Carlingford mountains in Louth, the Mount-Leinster or Blackstairs mountains between Wexford and Carlow, the Cumberagh mountains across Waterford, the Knockmeledown mountains between Waterford and Tipperary, the Galtee mountains in Tipperary, Cork, and Limerick, the Nagles mountains in Cork, and the Slievebloom mountains between Queen's county and King's county. Some of the congeries or amassments of mountains, as those of Donegal and Galway, are a singular combination of irksomeness and romance, of hoyden tameness and piquant interest; some, as those of Mayo, eastern Tyrone, northern Kilkenny, and eastern and western Clare, are dingily and drearily moorish; some, as those of Antrim, combine the featureless tableau in surface with the most varied and powerful escarpment in declivity; some, as those of northern Clare and southern Tipperary, particularly the Galtees, unite the finest curvatures of outline with the deepest verdure in colour; and some, as those of Wicklow, Kerry, and south-western Cork, exquisitely unite the grand, the savage, and even the terrible in themselves, with the beautiful and the brilliant in their intersecting glens and lakes.

The low or champaign country of Ireland can, to a very small extent, be regarded as a series of valleys like the low surface of England, and still less as an alternation of vales with hills as in the low grounds of Scotland; but on the contrary, is for the most part either such an expanse of apparently dead level, or such a sheet of fitful undulations, or such a labyrinth of diluvial hills and winding hollows, that the stranger who scans it with the most practised eye is rarely able to conjecture the direction of any one prevailing declination. A very large proportion of the low country of Ulster, particularly in Down and Armagh, is such a continuous, vast, and mazy series of low, curved, fertile hills, cut into individual isolation by sinuous dells and dingles and mimic vales, that a Briton who travels among them during only a few hours begins to feel bewilderment with their close scenes of beauty; a considerable proportion of the entire low grounds of the kingdom, particularly the carcasses of Clare and Limerick, "the golden vale" in Limerick and Tipperary, and the great grazing district of Dublin and Meath, present the appearance of the most luxuriant steppe or prairie, cut into small sections and sprinkled with human dwellings; another considerable or even large proportion, as the great district called the Bog of Allen, is a dismal level of brown bog, a horrible chaos of peat and morass, occasionally broken and relieved by edgings of wood and intervening tracts of flat arable land; another considerable proportion, as most of the county of Longford and of the great plain of Connaught, combines the characters or interweaves the texture of the grazing flats and the level bogs; a smaller proportion, as the remainder of the plain of Connaught and a part of the north of Clare, is a verdant plain profusely encumbered with enormous blocks of naked rock, and forming the "Arabia Petrea" of Ireland; another smaller proportion, or most of the county of Cavan, presents a prevailingly low surface, broken and marred with the tilting up and the cropping out of rock, just as if it had in some degree been shaken and disturbed by an earthquake; and multitudes of pendicles and tiny districts dispersed throughout the greater part of the otherwise level country, are sheets of horizontal strata lying upon horizontal carboniferous limestone, and tumulated with hillocky accumulations of limestone diluvium. "The peculiar flatness of the interior of Ireland," observes Mr. Griffith, "has been the probable cause of those vast accumulations of alluvial matter, composed of clay and limestone gravel, which, in the form of low but steep ridges of hill, occur so abundantly throughout the middle districts, and which are generally known by the name of Eskers. These ridges of limestone gravel probably originated at a period when the country was either wholly or partially submerged, from eddies formed by undulations in the surface. That the surface of the country was exposed to the action of rapid currents of water, is evidenced by the deep parallel scratches, sometimes amounting to furrows, which may be frequently observed on the surface of solid rocks, when the diluvial soil has been removed. It is probable, also, that the gravel hills were rapidly deposited from water in violent action, from their frequently consisting of an intermixture of large masses of rock partially rounded, with small gravel, and even with clay and sand. The origin of those immense tracts of bog which are everywhere spread over the interior of the flat country may also be attributed to the stagnant water pent up, as we now find it, above the level of the dry country, by gravel hills which form a continuous ridge, though not of equal height, round the bog edge.* Thus we find Eskers surrounding the several divisions of the great Bog of Allen, and the whole of the bogs contained in the valleys of the rivers Shannon, Suck, Brusna, Camlin, Inny, and the Barrow, and of its several tributary streams. In many parts of Ireland, the study of the gravel hills becomes highly interesting and instructive, as throwing a light on the direction of the current of the waters. Thus in the county of Mayo, to the eastward of the town of Westport, the whole of the numerous gravel hills with which the country is studded are extremely narrow in a north and south direction, and very long in an east and west direction, having bluff faces at the eastern extremity, and deep and lengthened valleys between them. This fact shows that, in this place, the direction of the current was westward towards Clew bay; and it may be remarked that the whole of the limestone gravel islands in that bay partake of the appearance and character of inland gravel hills. In the northern part of the county of Mayo, near to Lough Conn and Killalla bay, the direction of the gravel hills is north and south, having their bluff heads to the south; hence it may be argued, that in the vicinity this current took a northerly course."

MOUNTAINS.

In the preceding section, we have indicated the general arrangement and the distinctive character of the mountains of Ireland; in the articles on Ulster, Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, we have noticed with comparative minuteness their mutual collocations or several positions; and in the articles on the counties, we have, for the most part, described them in detail, and fully exhibited them both in their own features and in their connection with the low countries at their bases. In the present section, therefore, we require to do little more than to take a comprehensive and connected glance at them, first in their grand circuit round the seaboard, and next in their detached members in the interior. As those of Donegal, Londonderry, Tyrone, and eastern Fermanagh are to a certain extent connected into one vast congeries, we ought probably to commence our view at the embouchure and basin of the Erne; but we will spare some elaboration of thought to both our readers and ourselves, and will at the same time obtain equally distinct perceptions, by availing ourselves of the subdivisive lines drawn through this congeries by the Swilly and the Foyle, and so commencing our sketch, in this section as in former ones, at Malin Head, the extreme north of the mainland of the kingdom.

* The bottom of the bog is always lower than the present outlet for the water.

The isthmus of Innishowen, from Lough Swilly at Inch Island eastward to the head of Lough Foyle, is low ground; and the whole of the great peninsula, terminating in Malin Head in the north-west and Innishowen Head in the north-east, may be regarded as one congeries of upland, falling off on all sides from the central summit of Slievesnaught, whose altitude above sea-level is 2,019 feet. The heights to the north of this central one lift their summits principally in the close or near vicinity of the sea, and are Sheekin 578 feet, Crockraw 637 feet, Crocknamara 808, Latchet 537, a height 3 miles south-east of Carndonagh 816, and Craignamaddy 1,054; those to the east of Slievesnaught are chiefly Squire's Carn 1,058 feet, and Crockglass 1,309; those to the south are Eskahen 1,377 feet, the Scalp 1,589, Craig 749, and Clonglash 853; and those to the west are Slievemain 1,557, Aghaweel 1,106, Milltown 1,373, Raghtennore 1,656, and a height $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile west of Ballyliffin 818. The Donegal or western part of the grand north-west Ulster congeries of mountains is very distinctly separated from the rest by the valley of the Foyle up to Lifford, and may thence be sectioned off by the river Mourne up to the vicinity of Newtown-Stewart, and by the rivulet Derg thence to Lough Derg, in the immediate vicinity of the great basis of the Erne, and within $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the northern extremity of Lower Lough Erne. The mountainous district east of these boundaries is bounded on the east by the valley of the Bann and the plain of Lough Neagh,—on the south-east, by a line drawn from the western vicinity of Dungannon south-south-westward to the north-western vicinity of Clones,—and on the south-west, by the valley of the middle and lower Erne; and though, in a loose sense, it is one great region of uplands, and measures no less an extreme distance southward than 60 miles from the northern coast, yet it really consists of a number of nearly separate series of heights, and places all the more crowded and lofty portions of its surface within about 23 miles of the northern coast, and each of all except three or four of even its remotest summits within 25 miles of either the northern coast or the western.* The principal summits within and along the culminating-line, or within 23 miles of the northern coast, are Slievebuck 823 feet, Legavannon 1,289, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Legavannon 842, Nedd-top 986, Brown Mountain 973, Dullerton 516, Slievekirk 1,225, a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Slievekirk 970, Knockivee 969, a height $3\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-east by east of Strabane 1,094, a height $5\frac{1}{4}$ miles east by south of Strabane 1,343, Crockdoish 1,037, Slieveboy 854, Mullaghmeash 797, Mullaghoarb 1,890, Straw Mountain 2,085, Dart Mountain 1,612, a height $1\frac{1}{4}$ mile east of Dart Mountain 2,037, Sawel 2,236, Munard 1,550, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Munard 2,064, Streeve 1,280, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Streeve 980, White Mountain 1,996, Benbradagh 1,490, Carntogher 1,521, a height 2 miles north of Carntogher 1,242, Donald's Hill 1,315, Keady 1,101, a height 3 miles north of Keady 1,072, Benyevenagh 1,260, and Giant's Sconce 797; and the principal summits south of the culminating-line, or farther than 23 miles from the northern coast, are Croagh 1,260, Altamullen 939, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Altamullen 641, Ardbarren 628, Meaghy 808, Bessy Bell 1,366, Mary Grey 826, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Mary Grey 1,370, Slievemore 1,262, Munterlony 1,432, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Munterlony 1,096, Broughderg, 1,068, Bellevenamore 1,261, Fir Mountain 1,188, Slievegullion 1,730, Mullfya 808, a height 4 miles south-west of Mullfya 857, Crockennagoe 1,199, Knockadrin 752, Clenvannan 730, a height 3 miles east of Clenvannan 870, a height $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Clenvannan 1,117, Dooish 1,110, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Dooish 980, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Pomeroy 993, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Pomeroy 771, Knockadrin 752, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Lowtherstown 590, Shantavany 1,035, a height 3 miles south-south-east of Fintona 706, a height 2 miles north of Fintona 401, a height 5 miles west of Ballygawley 690, a height 3 miles east of Shantavany 863, Barrack Mountain 946, Topped 809, a height 3 miles north-west of Topped 643, Cole 920, a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Cole 1,046, a height 2 miles west-north-west of Cole 1,031, a height 4 miles south-east of Shantavany

* Lough Derg being only 9 miles from the head of Donegal bay, the portions of the district most remote from the northern coast are comparatively near the western.

690; a height 3 miles south-east of Five-mile-Town 683, a height 6 miles south-east of Five-mile-Town 1,255, a height 5 miles south-east of Clogher 752, Listersee 892, Tully 874, Carnmore, 1,032, and a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Carnmore 683.

The mountains of Antrim are, for the most part, either the summits of a culminating line very near the eastern shore or the tumulations of a slowly gradated descent toward the west; they are bounded on the west by the vale of the Main and the plain of Lough Neagh,—and on the south by Belfast Lough and the valley of the Lagan; and in no instance are they farther than 12 miles from the sea,—in the majority of instances, not more than 6 miles. Their principal summits in the north are a height 1 mile south of Ballintoy 672 feet, Knocklade 1,685, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Knocklade 1,036, and a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Cushendall 1,013; the principal in the east are Slieveanorra 1,676, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Slieveanorra 1,013, Trostan 1,810, Slieveanee 1,782, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Clough 987, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Trostan 1,359, Carn-cormack 1,431, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-south-east of Carn-cormack 1,165, Nachore 1,179, Collin 1,419, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Collin 1,321, Slemish 1,437, Craigh Hill 1,055, a height 4 miles west of Craigh Hill 938, Loughduff 1,262, a height 4 miles west of Loughduff 1,236, Agnew's Hill 1,558, a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Agnew's Hill 1,098, Wee Collin 1,006, Big Collin 1,159, a height 4 miles south-south-west of Larne 707, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Larne 598, and a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Larne 465; and the principal in the south are a height behind Black Head 431, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Carrickfergus 745, a height 4 miles west of Carrickfergus 1,025, a height half-a-mile east of Carnmoney 788, Cave Hill 1,185, Devis 1,567, a height 3 miles south-south-west of Devis 1,081, and a height 3 miles north of Lisburn 820.—The mountains on the north coast of Down are a small chain behind Hollymount, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles from Belfast Lough, and 720 feet in extreme altitude; and those in the south-east form two groups,—the Slievecroob mountains 10 miles from the sea, and the Mourne mountains occupying all the peninsula between the sea and Lough Carlingford, and extending 13 miles into the interior. The chief summits of Slievecroob are only three of respectively 1,755, 893, and 880 feet in altitude; and the principal summits of the Mourne mountains are Knockleagh 785, a height 3 miles south-west of Hilltown 1,196, Eagle mountain 2,081, Pigeon mountain 1,735, Hen mountain 1,187, Cock mountain 1,667, Slievenaman 1,053, Slievemuck 2,198, Slievenaglorry 1,450, Slieve Bingian 2,449, Slievebig 2,384, Butter mountain 2,137, Slievemore 2,443, Slievedonard 2,796, Finlieve 1,868, St. Bane 1,595, and a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Killeel 1,013.—The North Louth and the Armagh mountains extend north-westward from near the point of Carlingford peninsula, attain an extreme distance of 19 miles from the head of Dundalk bay, are cut into two sections by the deep narrow valley through which passes the great north road from Dublin to Belfast, and have an extreme breadth in their north-west section of $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and in their south-east section of 5. Their principal summits north-west of the Dublin and Belfast road are Mullyash 1,034 feet, Armagh-Breague 1,200, Derrygry 1,093, Dead-man's Hill 1,178, a height 1 mile east of Newtown-Hamilton 870, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Newtown-Hamilton 838, Newry mountain 1,383, Slievegullion 1,893, and a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-east of Forkhill 896; and the principal in the section south-east of the Dublin and Belfast road are a height 2 miles north-east of Flurry Bridge 796, a height 3 miles south-east of Flurry Bridge 1,674, Carlingford mountain 1,935, and Slievena-Gloagh 1,024.—The South Louth mountains are a small and scattered series at the distance of from $5\frac{1}{2}$ to 16 miles from the sea; and their principal summits are a height 3 miles south of Dunleer 435 feet, a height 4 miles east-south-east of Collon 676, Belpatrick 789, a height 3 miles north by east of Belpatrick 517, Slievebreh 753, and Mount Inver 563.

The Dublin, Wicklow, Kildare, and Wexford mountains, form a belt across the south of co. Dublin, occupy the whole of co. Wicklow, send down a few western declivities within the eastern boundary of co. Kildare, and form a narrow and interrupted belt across the north end of co. Wexford; they extend 40 miles from north to south, and have a mean breadth of about 19 miles, and a maximum breadth of $29\frac{1}{2}$; and they may, in a general view, be regarded as one great congeries falling off on all sides from the stupendous central mass of Lugnaquilla. A district of about 120 square miles to the north of Lugnaquilla is so wildly upland and irreclaimably waste as to be quite uninhabited, and might probably claim to be, in one sense, the nucleus of the entire congeries; yet Lugnaquilla itself is not only the highest ground, having an altitude of 3,039 feet above sea-level, but occupies the most central position, and, in a large sense, is surrounded by most of the wild and waste tracts. The principal summits between the southern environs of Dublin and a line drawn from Wicklow Head through Lugnaquilla, are Slievethout 1,308, Tallaght 1,306, a height 1 mile north-west of Tallaght 1,008, a height 4 miles east of Tallaght 1,008, Three Rock mountain 1,763, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Three Rock mountain 1,340, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Enniskerry 1,927, a height 3 miles north-west of Enniskerry 1,825, a height 2 miles west by north of Enniskerry 1,482, a height $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Enniskerry 1,607, Kippure mountain 2,473, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Kippure 1,716, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-north-west of Kippure 2,364, Butter mountain 1,459, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Butter mountain 1,532, a height 3 miles east-north-east of Butter mountain 2,033, Slieveroe 1,093, Sorrel Hill 1,975, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Sorrel Hill 926, a height 2 miles south-west of the village of Sranamuck 2,364, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-south-east of Sranamuck 1,631, Djouce mountain 2,384, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Djouce 1,056, Sugarloaf mountain 1,651, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of Sugarloaf 1,073, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Sorrel Hill 1,551, Thonelagee 2,683, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Thonelagee 2,307, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Thonelagee 2,364, Trooperstown Hill 1,407, a height $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Trooperstown Hill 1,581, a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Ashford 1,183, Slievecradoe 1,791, a height 4 miles south-east of Slievecradoe 2,095, a height 4 miles west-north-west of Slievecradoe 703, a height 5 miles south-west of Slievecradoe 861, a height 5 miles south of Slievecradoe 1,037, Comaderry 2,296, a height 3 miles north-west of Comaderry 1,930, a height 3 miles north by west of Comaderry 981, Lugduff 2,148, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Lugduff 1,833, Carrickmore 1,252, and a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Carrickmore 653; and the principal summits south of a line drawn from Wicklow Head through Lugnaquilla, are Timorin 1,023, a height 3 miles east of Timorin 1,256, Mount Caldeen 2,143, Knockreagh 1,559, a height 3 miles south-east of Knockreagh 474, Knockpatrick 851, Slievenamow 1,478, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Slievenamow 865, Croghan 2,175, Bola Hill 894, a height 1 mile west by south of Rathdrum 704, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-north-west of Rathdrum 759, Collon 782, Knockreagh $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-south-east of Rathvilly 593, Eagle Hill 973, Cushlawn 1,318, a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Eagle Hill 1,416, a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Slievenamow 1,279, a height 2 miles south of Cushlawn 744, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Bola Hill 860, Croghan-Kinshela 1,985, a height 3 miles west of Arklow 410, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Arklow 411, a height $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Tinnehely 1,381, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Tinnehely 1,171, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of Tinnehely 1,312, Conna Hill 1,491, Kilkevin Hill 1,063, Slieveboy 1,384, and Tara Hill 825.—The Mount Leinster and Blackstairs mountains, between co. Wexford and co. Carlow, are strictly an interior range, and extend parallel with the coast at the mean distance from it of 22 miles; and their principal summits are Mount Leinster 2,604 feet, Blackstairs mountain 2,411, and White mountain 1,627. A congeries west and south-west of New Ross, and from $10\frac{1}{2}$ to $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant from the sea, have for their chief summits Cammeross Hill 598 feet, Carrickburn 766, Killegney 537, Lackan 628, and Slievekelter 887. The Forth mountain, a little west of the town of Wexford, has an altitude of 774 feet.

The Cummeragh or Monavullagh mountains in co. Waterford, form a continuous range, with some offshoots and partial disseverments, from the vicinity of the head of Dungarvan Harbour, northward to the southern vicinity of the town of Clonmel; they lie at the distance of from $4\frac{1}{2}$ to 18 miles from the sea; and their principal summits are a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of the town of Dungarvan 608 feet, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by north of Dungarvan 966, a height 4 miles north-north-east of Dungarvan 1,039, a height $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Dungarvan 1,321, a height 7 miles west-south-west of Kilmacthomas 1,952, Seefin 2,387, a height 2 miles east-north-east of Seefin 2,180, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Seefin 1,248, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Seefin 1,321, a height 3 miles north-east of Seefin 2,597, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Seefin 2,504, a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Seefin 864, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Seefin 867, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Seefin 2,028, a height $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by east of Seefin 1,285, Knockanaffrin 2,478, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-west of Knockanaffrin 2,181, a height 2 miles north-north-west of Knockanaffrin 1,751, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by west of Knockanaffrin 1,225, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Clonmel 1,875, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Clonmel 1,081, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Clonmel 1,225, a height 4 miles south-south-west of Clonmel 1,071, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Clonmel 721, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north by west of Kilmacthomas 400, and a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Kilmacthomas 540. The north-western mountains of Mayo are bounded on the south by Clew bay, and on the east by Lough Conn and the lower valley of the Moy; they occupy a space of nearly 28 miles by 28, yet are in no instance further than 14 miles from either the open ocean or some great inlet of it; and their principal summits are Knockletteragh 1,509 feet, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Knockletteragh 1,786, Benmore 791, Slieveglory 937, Knocknatin-tree 1,646, Cushcuncurragh 2,262, Slieveturk 1,322, Nephinbeg 2,012, Slievealp 1,084, Slievecar 2,368, Croghan 802, Knocklettercass 1,208, Buckogh 1,922, Berreenecorrough 2,295, Laplagh 462, Knockmore 1,239, Spinkanilra 1,290, a height 3 miles north-east of Spinkanilra 1,655, a height 2 miles north-north-east of Spinkanilra 420, Nephin 2,646, Knockshandrim 430, Trista Hill 430, Slievemore 439, Glencastle Hill 760, Gortmore 790, Knocknaloer 613, Cullbin 876, Garraphuill 891, a height 5 miles north-east of Garraphuill 1,092, Clinsk 1,002, Tannymore 1,117, Glencolry 1,155, Maumakeogh 1,243, Keadochmuel 776, Knocknadurave 667, a height 3 miles south of Knocknadurave 861, Aughaleague 788, and Knockbohe 472. Slievecarina, an isolated height, 20 miles due east of the middle of the head of Clew bay, has an altitude of 855 feet. A small interior range commences $10\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Slievecarina, extends $12\frac{1}{2}$ miles east by northward to the vicinity of Lough Cara, is situated at the mean distance of 23 miles from the north-east, and has for its principal summits Kilgarrow 693 feet, Mullaghnoe 775, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Mullaghnoe 635, and Bockagh 745. The Lurgan hills or Slieve-Gamph mountains, commence 9 miles south of the head of Killalla bay and 12 miles north by east of Slievecarna; they and the Ox mountains, which are a close continuation of them, extend north-eastward to the vicinity of Ardnaglass Harbour, and are situated at the distance of from $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles to 10 miles from the sea; and the principal summits of the joint series are Knockacleevaan 912 feet, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Knockacleevaan 1,095, Croghan 741, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Croghan 1,096, Knocknasheegaun 1,168, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of Knocknasheegaun 1,321, Knockwarder 1,338, Sessuagarry 1,047, Screebo 1,208, Millan 1,446, a height 1 mile north-east of Millan 1,464, Long Hill 1,611, a height 4 miles west-south-west of Long Hill 1,078, a height 1 mile east-south-east of Long Hill 1,516, Carrowmurry 1,238, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Carrowmurry 903, Knockalongy 1,778, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west by south of Knockalongy 1,604, and a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Knockalongy 654. The Curlew mountains are a small series between Lough Cara and Lough Arrow; they are not far from being connected with Bockagh mountain on the south-west and the Braulieve mountains on the north-east; and their principal summits are Curlew proper 863 feet, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-west of Curlew proper 431, Keshcorrigan 1,183, and Carrowkeel 1,062. The Braulieve, Slieve-an-Erin, Lurgankyle, North Leitrim, Cabery, Tullaghagh, Glenawley, and Magheraboy mountains are an irregular assemblage of congeries, partly maritime and partly inland, dispersed over an area of 35 miles by 36, and bounded on the north-west by Sligo and Donegal bays, on the north-east by the valley of the Erne, on the south-east by a line from nearly the head of Upper Lough Erne to nearly the foot of Lough Allen, and on the south-west by the valleys of the Arrow and the Union; and their principal summits are Mulrath 740 feet, Dromore 650, Claura 526, Carrow 1,396, Cashel 1,377, a height 3 miles south-south-west of Cashel 1,098, Slieve-an-Erin 1,922, Bencroy 1,707, Bartonny 1,301, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by west of Ballyconnel 1,281, a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Swanlinbar 1,279, Benbrack 1,648, Slievenakilla 1,703, Kiltinhane 1,949, Guilcagh 2,188, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Benbrack 632, Cratty 1,213, Knockinny 528, a height 2 miles south-east of Red Lion 733, Oramore 854, Belmore 1,312, Shean 1,033, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Shean 875, Glenalong 1,033, Aghabohad 1,340, a height 3 miles east of Aghabohad 1,712, Truskmore 2,072, Bruckavillan 1,408, Saddle Hill 1,245, Dooley 1,511, Mullaghmatire 1,275, a height 1 mile north by west of Mullaghmatire 1,422, a height 4 miles south of Mullaghmatire 1,388, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Mullaghmatire 419, a height 3 miles north of Mullaghmatire 485, Benbo 1,365, a height 5 miles south-east of Benbo 1,448, a height 3 miles south-east of Benbo 1,066, Gullogeaboy 1,430, King's mountain 1,527, Benbulbin 1,722, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Gullogeaboy 1,044, Knocknare 1,078, Slievedreane 900, Slish 967, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Slievedreane 651, and a height 3 miles west of the village of Drumkeeran 1,117. The great western section of the vast congeries of Donegal, Tyrone, and Londonderry mountains is bounded on the south by Donegal bay and the valley of the Erne, and on the east by a line drawn from the northern extremity of Lower Lough Erne to Lough Derg, and thence along the rivulet Derg, the river Mourne, the river Foyle, the isthmus of Innishowen, and Lough Swilly; it occupies an area of 61 miles in extreme length and 40 miles in extreme breadth, yet is nowhere farther than 22 miles from either the ocean or some of its great inlets; and its principal summits are Breesy 852 feet, Ballinacarrick 412, a height 2 miles north of Ballyshannon 434, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Ballyshannon 464, Benbane 1,490, Blue Stack 2,213, Croagh-na-geer 1,793, Knockroe 2,202, Silver Hill 1,967, Mulmosog 1,156, Roehcrow 1,649, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Ardara 1,291, Slieveleague 1,964, a height immediately behind Carrigan Head, 1,018, Lehan 1,415, Ballard 911, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-north-east of Ballard 1,231, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Ballard 813, Clerfough 1,513, Slieve-Altocoy 1,683, Knockraver 1,475, Aghla 1,953, Scraigs 1,406, Shuroughy 1,264, a height $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Dunglo 980, Blue Hill 771, Crockatarrive 1,627, Crovohy 1,033, Glendowan 1,770, West Slieve-Snaught 2,232, Dooish 2,143, Errigal 2,462, North Aghla 1,854, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of North Aghla 1,913, Carrtreena 1,396, Bloody Foreland 1,035, Maam 1,549, Muckish 2,190, a height 1 mile south of the village of Elagh 506, a height 3 miles south of Elagh 751, Knockalla 1,196, Crockalee 961, Losset 1,180, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Losset 1,157, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Losset 835, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south of Losset 834, a height 4 miles south by east of Losset 1,456, Gregory Hill 1,106, Mass Hill 1,132, Croaghan 1,007, a height 5 miles south of Rathmelton 572, Cronaglack 1,127, Cronamuck 1,132, Cark 1,198, Three Tops 1,177, Herd's Seat 781, Mullaghfin 934, a height 3 miles west by north of St. Johnston 888, Dullerton 416, Binnion 629, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Three Tops 707, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Stranorlar 634, Altinapaste 1,199, White Horse 997, Iron Hill 902, Lismullyduff 867, Brandy Hill 601, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Clady 640, a height 3 miles north by east of Brandy Hill 603, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Brandy Hill 541, Altamullan 939, Croagh 1,200, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Croagh 1,223, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Croagh

1,725, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Croagh 1,489, Mullyfa 808, Oughtnadrin 1,037, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Oughtnadrin 857, and Liegafania 1,325.

We have included so large a proportion of the interior mountains of Ireland in our view of the seaboard uplands round the circuit of the coast, that very few remain to be noticed. A scattered series, rendered conspicuous chiefly by its central position and the prevailing lowness of the intersecting and surrounding country, is bounded on the north by a line drawn from Sootshouse to Castle-Blaney, on the east by a line from Castle-Blaney to Nobber, on the south by a line from Nobber to Castle-Pollard, and on the west by a line from Castle-Pollard to Sootshouse; and its principal summits are Knocklade 795 feet, Slievenacallagh 1,904, Ballybrusk 651, Scriboge 618, Carricleck 599, Kinan 629, Carrickaveilly 886, Knockawallis 709, Gola 691, a height $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Carricleck 629, a height 5 miles north-east of Virginia 713, a height $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Virginia 535, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Stradone 712, a height 3 miles north-west of Newbridge 857, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east-north-east of Drum 448, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Stradone 509, a height 3 miles north-west of Stradone 515, Ard-Kilmore 767, and Slieveglagow 1,050. In the central tracts of Leinster are a few isolated heights, whose summits figure conspicuously in the great expanse of flat country; particularly Knockdomney 515 feet high and 6 miles east of Athlone, Knockasha 660 feet high and 5 miles north-east of Monte-Grenogue, a height of 488 feet in altitude and $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Ballymore, a height of 602 feet in altitude and 4 miles east-north-east of Ballymore, a height of 416 feet in altitude and 5 miles north-east of Ballymore, a height of 496 feet in altitude and $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-north-west of Mullingar, a height of 418 feet in altitude and $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Castletowndelvin, Sion Hill 497 feet high and 4 miles south-south-east of Castletowndelvin, Tyfarnham 486 feet high and $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Mullingar, Croghan 769 feet high and 4 miles south-east of Tyrrel's Pass, Red Hills 656 feet high and 4 miles south-south-east of Rathangan, a height of 769 feet in altitude and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Rathangan, and the Hill of Allen 676 feet high and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Robertstown. The Slievemargy or Castle-Comer mountains occupy a space of 26 miles by 15, between the rivers Barrow and Nore, and around the junction-point of Queen's county and the counties of Carlow and Kilkenny; and their principal summits are Carrickusheen, the Rocky Hills, Slieveogh, Scotland Hill 1,079 feet, Cullenagh 1,045 feet, Ardagh, Knocknacath, Cloghagrenan 1,032 feet, Anager 993, a height of 1,027 feet $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Ballinakill, a height of 1,001 feet $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of Ballinakill, and a height of 836 feet 2 miles south-east of Ballyragget. The Slievebloom mountains are a continuous range of $16\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length; they extend south-westward along the mutual boundary and border of Queen's county and King's county to the northern vicinity of Roscrea; and their principal summits are the Ridge of Cappard 1,677 feet in altitude, the Conies 1,676, Slievebloom 1,691, Arderin 1,733, a height 3 miles north of Arderin 1,113, a height 3 miles south-west of Arderin 1,411, and a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Roscrea 756. The Devil's Bit mountains form a ridge nearly continuous with the Slievebloom mountains; they extend about 12 miles south-south-westward from the southern vicinity of Roscrea; and they lift their principal summit to the altitude of 1,572 feet, but are in general very considerably lower. Three isolated heights are situated between the north end of the Devil's Bit mountains and the Slievemargy mountains; one of them 649 feet in altitude and $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Roscrea, Knockaha 659 feet in altitude and $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles west west by south of Rathdowney, and Culla Hill 914 feet in altitude, and $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Durrow. The Galmoy mountains in the north-west of the county of Kilkenny have six summits of respectively 1,156, 437, 445, 1,000, 635, and 1,156 feet in altitude; the Brandon mountains on the eastern border of the county of Kilkenny have four summits of respectively 1,008, 1,304, 1,694, and 655 feet in altitude; and the Booley mountains in the south of the county of Kilkenny have eight summits of respectively 677, 700, 882, 599, 509, 457, 458, and 490 feet in altitude. The south-eastern mountains of Tipperary are a small but lofty group in the eastern district of East Iffa and Offa; and their principal summits are Slievenaman 2,364 feet, Carrickabrock 1,859, Knockclunna 1,654, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Knockclunna 1,088, and a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east of Knockclunna 852. The Bilboa or Kilnemanagh and the Keeper mountains are a sort of double congeries in the south-west of Tipperary; they extend over a district of 16 miles by 11; and their principal summits are Knockbane 1,188, Knockavillage 1,216, Foilnaman 1,205, Knocknascreggan 1,296, Knockteogue 1,312, Moher-Slieve 1,783, Keeper mountain 2,278, Moher 987, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by west of Knockbane 1,295, a height $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Knockbane 1,501, a height 2 miles north-east of Knocknascreggan 1,218, a height $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Knockteogue 1,543, a height $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-north-west of Keeper mountain 1,607, and a height 4 miles south-south-west of Keeper mountain 1,204. The Slievephelim mountains in the north-east corner of the county of Limerick are a conjoint mass with both the Bilboa and the Keeper series; they occupy an area of 13 miles by 5; and their principal summit is Croghan. The chief interior summits of the county of Limerick are Knockdirk, Pallas Hill, Knockfennel, Kilmeedy, and Knockfeereva,—the last 907 feet in altitude. The Arra mountains are a small but lofty and conspicuous group on the Tipperary side of the lower part of Lough Derg; and they raise their principal summits to the altitudes of 1,083, 1,127, 1,517, and 1,206 feet above sea-level.

BOGS.

Ireland is proverbial for the number and extent of its bogs, and seems to be absurdly imagined by multitudes of Britons as, in a great degree, a sheer morassy wilderness; yet, except within the limits of a district 52 miles in mean breadth, and extending from the Irish Sea to the Atlantic, the country is scarcely more encumbered with bogs than Scotland or England, and, even within the greater portion of the excepted district, it now presents great tracts comparatively free from bog, and now exhibits such mixations of bog, meadow, arable land, and esker, as possess less of dreariness of aspect than of picturesqueness and novelty. The bogs are exceedingly variable in depth, wetness, and consistency; but a very large proportion of them are completely saturated with water, spouty, fennish, and intermixed with quagmires. By far the larger proportion are champaign bogs, or expanses of morass either quite level or very slightly sloped, and generally situated in low plains or athwart the far-spread summits of low table-lands; and most of these are reddish in colour, spongy in consistency, and distinctively known as "red bogs." So many as about 90 flat bogs in the county of Cavan are each of less extent than 500 acres, and yet aggregately comprise an area of at least 17,000 acres; and probably about 900 bogs of similar character and extent lie dispersed throughout the other counties. Even the great, we might almost say the greatest, expanses of flat bog, are either so considerably intersected by peninsulating eskers and arable grounds, or so completely dis severed into sections by intervening and alternating tracts of sound land, as to be largely freed from both the irksomeness and the inconveniences which strict continuousness would occasion. Mountain bogs lie at nearly all altitudes above sea-level,—from the skirts of the mere hills to the higher acclivities of the loftiest summits; and they consist, for the most part, of thin sheets or strata of peaty soil, dry, firm, easily reclaimed, and of very different appearance from the red bogs.

The Commissioners appointed to inquire into the nature and extent of the several Bogs in Ireland, say, in their first Report, "A portion of Ireland, of little more than one-fourth of its entire superficial extent, and included between a line drawn from Wicklow Head to Galway, and another drawn from Howth Head to Sligo, comprises within it about six-sevenths of the bogs in the island, exclusive of mere mountain bogs, and bogs of less extent than 500 acres, in its form resembling a broad belt drawn across the centre of Ireland, with its narrowest end nearest to the capital, and gradually extending in breadth as it approaches to the western ocean. This great division of the island extending from east to west, is traversed by the Shannon from north to south, and is thus divided into two parts; of these the division to the westward of the river contains more than double the extent of the bogs which are to be found in the division to the eastward; so that if we suppose the whole of the bogs of Ireland, exclusive of mere mountain bog and of bogs under 500 acres, to be divided into 20 parts, we shall find about 17 of them comprised within the great division we have now described, 12 to the westward and 5 to the eastward of the Shannon, and of the remaining 3 parts, about two are to the south and one to the north of this division. * * Most of the bogs which lie to the eastward of the Shannon, and which occupy a considerable portion of the King's county and county of Kildare, are generally known by the name of the Bog of Allen; it must not, however, be supposed that this name is applied to any one great morass; on the contrary, the bogs to which it is applied are perfectly distinct from each other, often separated by high ridges of dry country, and inclining towards different rivers, as their natural directions for drainage, and so intersected by dry and cultivated land, that it may be affirmed generally there is no spot of these bogs to the eastward of the Shannon so much as two Irish miles distant from the upland and cultivated districts." Twenty-five great districts were minutely surveyed, and fully reported on, by ten engineers, appointed by the Commissioners; and these, together with their acreable contents, are the eastern extremity of the Bog of Allen in co. Kildare, 36,430 acres; the district of the river Barrow in co. Kildare, 41,075 acres; the district of the river Boyne, in counties Meath and Westmeath, 42,370 acres; the district of the river Brusna, in King's co., 44,594 acres; the district of the river Shannon, in counties Westmeath and Longford and King's co., 34,500 acres; the district of the river Inny and Lough Ree, in counties Longford and Westmeath, 34,569 acres; the district of Lough Gara, in counties Roscommon, Sligo, and Mayo, 83,689 acres; a district lying between Roscrea and Killenale in the counties of Tipperary and Kilkenny and Queen's co., 36,025 acres; a district lying to the west of Maryborough, Queen's co., 14,754 acres; the western extremity of co. Clare, 22,340 acres; a small district on the banks of the Barrow, in co. Kildare and King's co., 7,459 acres; the district of Lough Corrib, in counties Galway and Mayo, 83,724 acres; three districts in co. Mayo, 161,962 acres; a great district surrounding Lough Neagh, and extending to the mouth of the Bann, in counties Down, Armagh, Tyrone, Londonderry, and Antrim, 64,855 acres;* the district of Iveragh, in co. Kerry, 43,567 acres; the district of the Kenmare river, in co. Kerry, 14,605 acres; the district of the rivers Lane and Lower Maine, in co. Kerry, 17,990 acres; the district of the Upper Maine, in co. Kerry, 8,566 acres; the district of Slieve Logher, in counties Cork and Kerry, 32,902 acres; the district of the river Cashen, in co. Kerry, 31,514 acres; a second district contiguous to Lough Ree, in counties Longford, Leitrim, and Roscommon, 26,630 acres; the southern district of the river Suck, in counties Galway and Roscommon, 76,848 acres; and the northern district of the river Suck, 52,390 acres. The total area of these twenty-five districts is 1,013,358 acres. Three other surveys of less minuteness exhibited the mountain district of Erris as containing 170,090 acres of red bog, and 155,500 acres of thin and easily reclaimable peat soil; the mountain district of Cunnemara as containing 120,000 acres of red bog, and about 200,000 acres of peat soil; and the mountain district of Wicklow as containing 97,000 acres of red bog, and a very considerable but unascertained extent of peat soil. The mountains of Slieve-Logher, Slieve-Mish, and Corkaguiney, likewise contain about 500,000 acres of upland bog; and the mountains of Donegal, Tyrone, and Fermanagh, not less than 400,000 acres of peat soil. The total extent of red bog, including an estimated amount of bogs of smaller extent than each 500 acres, is 1,576,000 acres; and the total extent of peat soil, forming the covering of mountains, is 1,255,000 acres.

The highly important and interesting question of the reclamation of the bogs has been so much debated, that we shall simply quote the opinion of the Commissioners, and a brief critique upon that opinion in MacCulloch's Statistical Account of the British Empire. "It may naturally be expected," say the Commissioners, "that we should express our opinion whether any, and what general measure should be adopted to further the reclamation of this great extent of land, at present so unprofitable, and which the concurrent testimony of every person, except one, whom we have employed, represents as not merely susceptible of improvement, but as promising to afford a greater profit on the operation than perhaps any other application of agricultural skill and capital. Various as are the modes of improvement, and the estimate proposed by our different engineers, we consider that the fair average of their opinions, that by an expenditure of from £1 to £20 per acre, the reclamation would secure to the improver a permanent rent of from 10 to 15 per cent. on the expenditure. Some of them on whose judgment we place great reliance, are even of opinion, that the whole of the capital employed would be returned by the produce of the first crops which effected the improvement. Supposing, then, the capital employed to be finally lost, still the rent obtained would abundantly compensate for its application; but on the other supposition, of the capital itself being repaid, it would follow that the rent would finally become the reward merely of the skill and labour of the improver. Nor is it on mere theoretical speculation that these premises are rested. Our engineers uniformly adduce the example of hundreds of acres actually improved within their respective districts, to justify their estimates. It may, perhaps, then be inquired, why all these bogs have not long since been improved? or it may be asserted, that their present desolation in the midst of so much apparent inducement, is in itself a sufficient proof that such premises must be practically fallacious. We are convinced, however, that this circumstance may be otherwise accounted for, and that it is not to physical obstacles that the present situation of these wastes is principally to be ascribed. The arable lands around the extremities of each bog, belong, pretty generally, to a great variety of proprietors, the mearings of whose estates, it is generally admitted, must be contained within the area of the interior bog, but the precise situation of which is seldom ascertained. The external boundary of the bog forms a turf bank; the interior is a quagmire, in its present state inapplicable to any other purpose than the affording a very scanty summer pasture to a few wandering cattle, who are turned in to seek for it, at the risk of being lost. The cultivators who occupy the contiguous farms have usually annexed to the enjoyment of the lands a right of turning in their cattle on the part of the bog adjoining to their respective farms; and when these are tempted by hunger to wander further, reciprocal convenience forbids its being considered as a trespass. These farmers have usually terms of lives or years in their holdings, too short to tempt them, even if possessed of capital and of skill, to enter on the permanent improvement of the bog, while they are yet abundantly sufficient to render such an operation impracticable for the landlord. The landlord has demised to the tenant a vague possession of what he considered of little or no value; the shortness of the tenure obliges the tenant to leave his holding in its unprofitable state; but were the landlord to propose to improve it, the tenant having a present right to prevent him, that right would become valuable just in proportion to the intended exertions of the landlord, and would inevitably be set up by the tenant." So far the Commissioners; but the writer in MacCulloch's Account observes: "The bogs are generally, indeed, at such an elevation above the sea as to allow of drains being cut to a depth sufficient to permit the escape even of the bottom water. But the Commissioners observe, that 'the bogs partake of the nature of a sponge, and are completely saturated with water.' Although, therefore, a vent were made for the bottom water, it does not follow that the water held in suspension by the bog could also be carried off. On the contrary, experience shows that, when drains are cut through a bog, though at no considerable distance from each other, the intermediate portion continues nearly as wet as ever. But supposing that this apparently insuperable difficulty were overcome, and that the bogs were completely drained, still we have to inquire whether any advantageous result would follow. According to Mr. Wakefield, the drainage of the bogs would render them 'masses of dry inert vegetable matter; and unless some means were discovered of bringing it into a state of putrefaction, one might as well attempt to cultivate an immense wool-pack.' The fact is, that, in the present state of the bogs, nothing but a covering of earth, clay, marl, or limestone and gravel, will do any good; and this can be applied better without large surface drains (recommended by the Commissioners) than with them. The elaborate estimates given in the reports of the engineers employed by the Commissioners of the expense of draining and improving bogs, are altogether hypothetical, and are entitled to very little weight. Had a single extensive bog been drained by speculators, and brought into a state of profitable cultivation, there would have been some foundation to go upon. This, however, has not been done; and, till it be done, there are plainly no data to refer to in relation to this subject on which any reliance can be safely placed. We do not mean to insinuate that we look upon the cultivation of the bogs of Ireland as impracticable; should the wealth of the country increase, they will, no doubt, be gradually, though we believe very slowly, reclaimed. At present, however, we confess it appears to us that there are no grounds for thinking that their cultivation, if undertaken upon a great scale, would be otherwise than ruinous. Even in Great Britain, most of those who have distinguished themselves by attempts at bog improvement have been heavy losers. Blair Drummond moss, in Perthshire, has not been improved but exterminated. And it is abundantly obvious that, in Ireland, the chances of loss from any public improvement would be incomparably greater."

The use of the bogs as turbary has very often been urged as a reason against every attempt to improve them; but, if properly viewed, may be seen to recommend, in the strongest manner, the reclamation of at least all large bogs. Fuel can at present be obtained from only the edges of these bogs, the excessive wetness of their interior rendering every effort to use it as turbary quite abortive; but, were they reclaimed, turf might be cut from reserved belts and pendicles in any part of them, and in consequence obtained in an hundredfold or even thousandfold greater quantity. The subject of bog-fuel affects all Ireland, and possesses a degree of economical interest of which the inhabitants of coal countries can form little conception. Mr. Bicheno remarks, in reference to this subject, that "the rainy climate of Ireland, and the wet occupations of the people, with the nature of their food, make a fire more important to them than to most others; and, in fact, is frequently the substitute for clothing, bedding, and, in part, shelter. Had it not been for the bog, the measures taken in former times to extirpate the nation might probably have succeeded; but the bog gave them a degree of comfort upon easy terms, and enabled them to live under severe privations of another kind." The specific gravity of light surface turf is about 400, water being 1000; and a cubic yard of good turf, closely packed, weighs about 900 pounds; of dense turf, 1100 pounds; and of the lighter turf, 500 pounds. Light turf yields about 74 parts volatile matter, 23 pure charcoal, and 3 ashes; dense turf yields about 71 volatile matter, 21 charcoal, and 8 ashes. Dr. Kane observes that the characteristic fault of turf is its want of density; that while it yields a vast body of volatile inflammable ingredients, in no one point is the heat intense; but that when compressed—in which state it may be sold at from 6s. to 8s. per ton—it appears to have a calorific power little inferior to coal; and when carbonized, yields about 30 per cent. of a fine coherent coke, of a greater density than that of wood charcoal, and at a cost not exceeding 20s. per ton. Some of the steamers now plying on the Shannon use turf very advantageously in place of coal.

The following table shows the elevation, depth, declination, proprietorship, and cost of drainage of the districts of bog reported on by the Commissioners:—

RIVERS.

The river Foyle is formed by the Finn and the Mourne, both voluminous streams, at the bridge of Lifford; drains large sections of the counties of Donegal, Tyrone, and Londonderry; and, over the lower part of its course, is identified with the shallow but wide marine expansion of Lough Foyle. It is tidal from Magilligan Point to Castle-Finn, a distance of 35 miles; and navigable for sea-borne vessels to the bridge of Londonderry, a distance of 20 miles,—and for small craft or lighters to the canal at Strabane, and to Castle-Finn, distances above Londonderry of respectively 8 and 17 miles. Its tributaries are the Roe and the Faughan, flowing into the Londonderry side of Lough Foyle; the Dermot, the Ballymagorry, the Soolyburn, and the Burndale, the two former on the east bank, and the two latter on the west bank, between Londonderry and Lifford; the Derg, joining the Mourne, 5 miles above Strabane; the Mournebeg, joining the Derg, 2 miles above Castle-Derg; the Killinburn, the Glenderagin burn, and the Leheny burn, joining the Derg; the Moyle, the Monterlony, and the Strule, which unite in the vicinity of Newtown-Stewart to form the Mourne; and the Drumnakilly, Berach, Braen, Ballinahally, Whiggery, Fintona, Glenelly, and Owenreagh, burns and rivulets, falling into the great head streams.—The river Bann drains large portions of the counties of Down, Armagh, Tyrone, Londonderry, and Antrim, rises on the south side of the Mourne mountains, traverses Lough Neagh, and falls into the sea 5 miles west-south-west of the boundary between Antrim and Londonderry. It is tidal and navigable to the Salmon-Leap at Coleraine, a distance of 4 miles; and its tributaries are the Ballymoney, on its right bank, 4 miles above Coleraine,—the Roe, or Macaskin, on its left bank, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles above Coleraine,—the Agivey, on its left bank, 5 miles above Coleraine,—the Clady, on its left bank, a little below the bridge of Portglenone,—the Ballinderry, on the west side of Lough Neagh,—the Blackwater, at the south-west corner of Lough Neagh,—the Six-mile-Water, at the north-east corner of Lough Neagh,—and the Maine Water, east of the middle of the north end of Lough Neagh.—The Bush river, on the north coast of co. Antrim, runs only 10 miles, and is occasionally very shallow. The Glenariff and the Glenarm rivulets, on the east coast of Antrim, are tidal over a distance of respectively about 100 perches and about 500 yards; and all the other rivulets of the north and east of Antrim, have a brief run, are unnavigable, and are very slenderly affected by the tides.—The Lagan rises among the Slieve-Croob mountains, drains a large part of co. Down, and a considerable part of co. Antrim, and falls into the head of Belfast Lough at the town of Belfast; and it is naturally navigable to the vicinity of Lisburn, and is connected by an artificial navigation with Lough Neagh. The Blackwater and the Ballinahinch rivulets fall into the west side of Lough Strangford; and the latter forms a small estuarial harbour in the vicinity of Downpatrick. The Blackstaff, the Slidderford, the Kilkeel, and the other rivulets which flow down the east side of co. Down to the Irish sea, are all very inconsiderable. The Newry river flows into the head of Lough Carlingford; and, though of comparatively small length and volume, is navigable to Newry, and connected, by artificial navigation, with the Upper Bann and Lough Neagh.—The Flurry and the Castletown or Dundalk rivulets drain most of the southern district of co. Armagh, and the northern district of co. Louth, and fall into Dundalk Harbour, at the head of Dundalk bay; the Fane rivulet drains portions of counties Armagh, Monaghan, and Louth, and falls into Dundalk bay in the vicinity of Lurgan-Green; and the Glyde and the Dee drain portions of co. Monaghan and co. Meath, and a large portion of co. Louth, and have a joint embouchure at the south side of Dundalk bay.—The Boyne rises in the north-west of co. Kildare, drains small portions of King's co., and counties Westmeath, Cavan, and Louth, and bisects and drains the greater part of co. Meath; it is navigable by sea-borne vessels to Drogheda, tidal to Oldbridge $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles above Drogheda, and navigable, with artificial aid, and by river craft, to Navan; and its principal tributaries are the Yellow river from King's co., the Blackwater from co. Kildare, the Stonyford river from co. Westmeath, and the Blackwater and its affluent the Moynalty from co. Cavan.—Nanny Water drains most of the coast district of co. Meath; but it is of little practical note. A stream along the boundary between co. Meath and co. Dublin, and four or five streams in the division of co. Dublin north of the city, have all a brief run and comparatively small importance.

The Liffey is a stream of brilliant beauty, and acquires fame from washing and bisecting the metropolis; it rises on very lofty ground among the northern Wicklow mountains, describes a singularly circuitous course, and drains large districts of counties Wicklow, Kildare, and Dublin, and a small portion of co. Meath; it is navigable for sea-borne vessels to Carlisle Bridge in Dublin, and for boats over a distance of $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles; and its principal tributaries are the Poddle, the Bradoque, the Camoe, and the Rye into its own current, and the Tolka and the Dodder into its estuary, the upper part of the bay of Dublin.—The Bray river possesses an entire basin of magnificent, grand, and romantic landscape; it drains a small part of co. Wicklow, and a smaller one of co. Dublin, and is occasionally navigable over $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile to the town of Bray; and its principal tributaries are the Enniskerry, the Powerscourt, and the Glencree rivulets.—The Vartry drains the larger part of the north-eastern section of co. Wicklow, but is remarkable chiefly for the wild grandeur of a portion of its scenery.—The Ovoca is celebrated for the exquisite combination of power with beauty in its richly wooded mountain vale; it drains the central and south-eastern districts of co. Wicklow, and forms at its embouchure a very indifferent harbour for the town of Arklow; and its principal tributaries, or rather head streams, are the Avonmore, the Avonbeg, and the Derry or Aughrim.—The Slaney drains considerable portions of counties Wicklow and Carlow, and about one-half of co. Wexford; it is navigable by sea-borne vessels up its estuary to the town of Wexford, and by small vessels up its own stream to Enniscorthy; and its principal tributaries are the Little Slaney, the Derreen, the Derry, the Low, the Boro, the Win, the Bann, and the Cloady. The chief of several rivulets on the south of co. Wexford, is the Corug, to the head of Bannow Harbour.—The river Barrow, and its main tributary the Nore, drain a pendicle of co. Tipperary, a large part of King's co., very nearly the whole of Queen's co., large districts of counties Kildare and Carlow, the larger part of co. Kilkenny, and a considerable part of co. Wexford; their united stream is navigable by sea-borne vessels of large burden to New Ross; the Barrow itself is tidal and naturally navigable to St. Malins, and navigable, with artificial aid, to Athy, whence it is connected by canal with Dublin, and its principal tributaries are the Ownass, the Feagile, the Little Barrow, the Douglas, the Fishoge, and the Burren; and the Nore is tidal to Innistiogue, and navigable by boats to Thomastown, and has for its principal tributaries the King's river, the Dinane river, and the Ballyduff, Dobbin's Mill, Jerpoint, and Thomastown rivulets.—The Suir drains very nearly the whole of co. Tipperary, a large part of co. Waterford and a considerable part of co. Kilkenny; it is navigable for large sea-borne vessels to Waterford, and for river craft to Clonmel; and its principal tributaries are the Black river, the Aherlow, the Far, the Nier, the Honour, the Linane, the Blackwater, and the Barrow. The rivulets of co. Waterford east of Dungarvan Harbour, the chief of which are the Maghan and the Tay, are neither long nor large. The Colligan and the Brickey jointly form an estuarial harbour at Dungarvan. The Blackwater is one of the largest and most beautiful rivers of Ireland; it drains small parts of counties Limerick and Kerry, a very large proportion of co. Cork, and a considerable proportion of co. Waterford; it is navigable for barges 12 miles, or to the mouth of the Bride, and navigable for lighters, as well as tidal, 20 miles, or to Lismore Canal; and its principal tributaries are the Allua, the Awbeg, the Funcheon, the Arraglin, the Ounashade, the Finisk, the Bride, and the Lickey. The Castlemartyr and the Fenis rivulets possess no consequence. The Middleton river, which enters the north-east corner of Cork Harbour, is navigable 3 miles from the East Ferry to the town of Middleton; and it receives the waters of the Ballinasloe, the Lisgoold, the Gurtarue, and the Dungourney. The Lee drains a large part of co. Cork; is navigable for large sea-borne vessels to Cork, 12 miles from the mouth of Cork Harbour, and for boats 2 miles above Cork; and its principal tributaries are the Dripsey, the Perrot, the Bride, the Blarney, and the Glanmire. The Carrigaline river forms a small but snug estuarial harbour within the west side of Cork Harbour. The Bandon river washes the towns of Dunmanway, Enniskeen, Bandon, Innishannon, and Kinsale; and forms the fine, prolonged, estuarial harbour of Kinsale; and its tributaries are the Cahir, the Black Cascades, and the Blackwater. The Arigadeen river is tidal about 4 miles from Courtmacsherry, and navigable for craft of 30 or 40 tons to Timoleague, about 3 miles above Courtmacsherry. The Ilen washes Skibbereen, and forms the estuarial harbour of Baltimore; and is navigable for boats and tidal one mile above Skibbereen, and navigable for vessels of burden to within 3 miles of the town. The Roaring-Water, the Skull, and the Four-mile-Water, are all trifling, except in connection with their large estuaries. The Dunemark, the Moyalt, and the Comhola, which flow into the head of Bantry bay, are small mountain rivers; and the first has, close to its mouth, a somewhat celebrated waterfall. The Ruaghty or Roughty, which flows into the head of the Kenmare estuary, is navigable for large hookers to Roughty Bridge; and it receives the waters of the Aughberg and the Cleadly. The Blackwater, on the north side of the Kenmare estuary, is a romantic mountain rivulet. The Currane and the Inny, which enter Ballinaskelligs bay, and the Fartin, which flows into Valentia Harbour, are of small note. The Carra or Tingariff, which enters the lower part of Castlemaine Harbour, descends from a grandly romantic glen, and traverses the powerfully picturesque lakes of Carra. The Laune or Lane carries off the superfluent waters of the celebrated lakes of Killarney, and enters Castlemaine Harbour near its head; and its principal tributaries are the Fleak and the Deangh into the Lower Lake, and the Giddagh, the Lishadan, and the Anagarry, into its own current. The Maine enters the head of Castlemaine Harbour, and is navigable from the Inch bar to the bridge of Castlemaine, a distance of about 12 miles; and its principal tributaries are the Fleakroe, the Aunahity, the Keelbredagh, and the Castle river. The Cashen river is formed by the Feale, the Gale, and the Brick; it drains small parts of counties Limerick and Cork, and a large proportion of the north of co. Kerry; it is tidal, and navigable for vessels of 10 tons, over a distance of 6 miles; and the principal tributaries of its forming streams are the Shannaw into the Brick, and the Brenagh, the Owenbeg, the Ullahan, the Ulla, and the Smearla, into the Feale. The river Shannon drains a small part of co. Cavan, a large part of co. Leitrim, very nearly the whole of co. Roscommon, very nearly the whole of co. Longford, a pendicle of co. Meath, a large part of co. Westmeath, the larger part of King's co., a considerable part of co. Galway, a large part of co. Tipperary, the greater part of co. Clare, very nearly the whole of co. Limerick, and a considerable part of co. Kerry; its principal tributaries are the Arigna, the Foerus, the Boyle, the Owenure, and the Cronagh in Roscommon, the Clonard, the Camlin, the Kenagh, and the Inny in Longford, the Suck between Roscommon and Galway, the Blackwater and the Brosna in King's co., the Little Brosna between King's co. and Tipperary, the Ballyshruel and the Rosmore in Galway, the Borris-o'-kane, the Nenagh, and the Kilmastulla in Tipperary, the Scarriff, the Blackwater, the Ougarnee, and the Fergus in Clare, and the Mulken, the Groody, the Maig, the Deel, and the Ovan in Limerick; it is tidal, deeply navigable, and in a certain sense estuarial, all the way to the city of Limerick; it sends off the estuary of the Fergus from its north side, and has a series of small harbours on both the north side and the south, particularly at Clare, Kildysert, the mouth of the Maig, the mouth of the Deel, Glynn, Tarbert, and Kilrush, between the city and the ocean; it is navigable for river craft, partly up its own channel and partly by canal, from Limerick to Killaloe; it is navigated by steam-vessels from Killaloe to Athlone, and by river craft from Athlone to Lough Allen; and it commands all the ramifications of inland navigation in the centre, east, and west, of Ireland, and is proposed to be connected also with the basin of the Erne, and thence with all the inland navigation of the north and north-east of Ireland. The Dunbeg and the Ennistymon rivers possess considerable volume; but the other streams of the west side of Clare are of no note.

The Gurtinamartin and the Carnamart, which flow into the head or east end of Galway bay, are of large size among rivulets; and the former is curious and wonderful for the number and mysteriousness of its subterraneous dives and runs. The Galway or Corrib river, which enters Galway bay at the town of Galway, carries off the superfluent waters of Loughs Carra, Mask, and Corrib, and drains a pendicle of co. Roscommon, and very large districts of counties Mayo and Galway; it is proposed to be connected by artificial navigation with Lough Corrib, and to open Galway bay to an extensive and ramified navigation through Connaught to Clew bay, Killallua bay, and the Shannon; and its principal tributaries are the Aile and the Robe into Lough Mask, the Bealnabrack and the Fuogh into the west side of Lough Corrib, and the Black river and the Clare, both sinking streams, into the east side of Lough Corrib. The Owenmore or Ballinahinch river to the head of Birturbuy bay, the Gowla to the side of Birturbuy bay, the Dowrus to the bay of Ballinakill, the Culphin between Renvyle Point and the Little Killery, and the Bunowen, the Errive, and the Bandurra, to Killery Harbour, are all inconsiderable streams. The Lewisburgh, the Bunowen, the Westport, the Glendahurk, the Glenthomas, and the other rivulets which flow into Clew bay, with the exception of the Newport river, are all very inconsiderable; and even the Newport river is navigable for boats over a distance of only $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile, but its tributaries are the Skudagh, the Buckadon, the Glenisland, and the Beltra. The Gulamore, the Munree, the Owenmore, and the other rivulets of north-western and northern Mayo, are chiefly mountain torrents. The Moy drains a large part of Mayo and a considerable part of Sligo, and enters the head of Killallua bay between these counties; it is tidal to Ballina, and navigable by sea-borne vessels to within a mile of that town; and its tributaries are the Bunree-Deel, the Yellow river, the Loughardone, the Turlough, the Guishden, the Troomony, the Coarre, the Aclare, and several other streams. The Torvod and the Pulloching are small rivulets. The Easkey is navigable over about $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile by boats of 5 tons; and it receives the waters of the Croagh. The Uncion, which enters the head of Ardnaglass Harbour, is formed by the Arrow, the Owenmore, and the Colloony, and makes a fine cataract at Ballysadere. The Sligo river forms the estuarial harbour of Sligo, carries off the superfluent waters of Lough Gill, and is fed or formed, through that lake, by the Bonnet, the Glenboy, the Benbo, and the Shanvoe. The Bunroes river carries off the superfluent waters of Lough Melvin, and is fed or formed, through that lake, by the Garisson, the Ballagh, and the Glen rivulets. The Erne drains a small part of co. Longford, a large part of co. Leitrim, a considerable part of co. Monaghan, very nearly the whole of co. Fermanagh, a small part of co. Tyrone, and a considerable part of co. Donegal; it expands into the large and exquisitely beautiful sheets of Lough Oughter, Upper Lough Erne and Lower Lough Erne; it connects through the Ulster canal with all the north-eastern navigations of Ireland, is proposed to be connected by canal with the Shannon, and is naturally navigable between Belturbet a few miles above the Upper Lake and Belleek a little below the lower lake, but is hindered by a grand cascade at Ballyshannon from being navigable to the sea; and its principal tributaries are the Croghan, the Woodford, and the Annalee in co. Cavan, the Clodagh, the Arney, and the Drumany or Colebrook into Upper Lough Erne, the Sillier into the Middle Erne above Enniskillen, and the Ballinamallard and the Bonnahigh into Lower Lough Erne. The Esk forms the small estuarial harbour of Donegal, at the head of Donegal bay; and it carries off the superfluent waters of Lough Esk, and receives the tribute of the Driming. The Enny river, which flows into the head of Inver bay, is navigable for boats over about a mile. The Bunlaghy to the west side of Inver bay, the Corker to MacSwine's bay, the Bungasteen to Killybegs harbour, and the Ballydoo and the Glen to Muckross bay, are all small rivulets. The Owenea and the Owentocher unite at the village of Ardara, to form the estuary of Loughrusmore. The Guibarra to Guibarra bay, the Trawenagh to Trawenagh bay, the Guidore and the Clady to Guidore bay, the Ballyness to Ballyness bay, and the Raye in the vicinity of the Ballyness, are all small streams. The Lackagh, which flows into the head of Sheephaven, is navigable for vessels drawing 10 feet of water to a point about 500 yards above Lackagh bridge; and its chief tributaries are the Owencarry and the Clune. The Lennon or Lannan falls into the west side of Lough Swilly, and is tidal and navigable to Rathmelton. The Swilly falls into the head of Lough Swilly, and forms the small tidal harbour of Letterkenny. The streams of Innishowen are all small; and the chief of them are the Owenkillew and Owencrana to Lough Swilly in the vicinity of Buncrana, the Carnadonagh to Streathbreaga bay, and the Culdaff to the head of Culdaff bay.

LAKES.

Lough Neagh, on the boundaries of counties Antrim, Down, Armagh, Tyrone, and Londonderry, is not only the largest lake in the United Kingdom, but one of the largest in Europe; it is a characterless inland sea, surrounded by low shores and a generally flat country; it possesses extensive, but, in a great measure, factitious fame, for its power of petrification; and though comparatively shallow, it boasts important subordination to the ramified inland navigation of the whole of Ulster. Loughs Erne, Upper and Lower, partly in counties Cavan and Donegal, but chiefly in co. Fermanagh, are multitudinously studded with beautiful islands, and completely environed with diversified, rich, and picturesque shores, and mutually connected, as well as partly flanked, by chains of meadow-encinctured loughlets, and possessed of far more extent, power, and character, than the Winandermere of England; and they serve, not only as a great navigable series of waters in themselves, but as the counterpart of Lough Neagh in the system of navigations for Ulster and by the Ulster canal. Lough Corrib, partly on the boundary between Mayo and Galway, but chiefly within the latter county, is a large lacustrine expanse, very variable in width, depth, and scenery, but, to a large extent, gemmed with green islands, and either bounded by luxuriant grounds or overhung by wild and lofty mountains; and it forms a main part of the chain of natural inland navigation in what have been termed the Lakes of Connaught. Lough Mask, situated in the counties of Galway and Mayo, a little north of Lough Corrib, displays wooded isles and luscious beauty, pours its great volume of superfluent waters down a wondrous subterranean channel to Lough Corrib, and is also an important part of the navigable series of Connaught Lakes. Lough Carra, situated within Mayo very near the head of Lough Mask, is much inferior in size to the latter, but considerably similar in character. An intricate and rather numerous series of lakes and loughlets, in the vicinity of Castlebar, and chiefly between that town and Westport, are in some instances sheets of beauty, in others huge bogholes, and in others of diversified appearance; and they often bear the aggregate name of the Castlebar Lakes, and are, to some extent, identified with the proposed ramification of inland Connaught navigations. Lough Conn, in the north of co. Mayo, has a few islets, and is partly overhung by Mount Nephin, partly bounded by pleasant shores, and partly screened with heathy moors; it is divided into Lough Conn proper in the north, and Lough Cullen in the south, by a brief strait of river-width, spanned by the Pontoon bridge; and it belongs to the river-system of the Moy, and holds a place, though a subordinate one, in the proposed series of inland navigations. The Lakes of Killarney, Upper, Middle, and Lower, in co. Kerry, the first and second small, and the third large, are known either by inspection or by fame, to almost every person of taste in the United Kingdom, and to many a cultivated mind throughout America and continental Europe, for their exquisitely rich and powerful scenery. Lough Allen, situated partly on the boundary between Roscommon, but chiefly within the latter county, is traversed by the young Shannon, and forms the inner end or commencement of the Shannon navigation; and, though not remarkable for either force or picturesqueness of landscape, possesses a considerable amount of scenic interest. Lough Ree, situated between co. Roscommon on the west, and counties Longford and Westmeath on the east, is a large and long expansion of the Shannon; but, in spite of several pleasant islands, of varied ramifications and somewhat intricate outline, and of an aggregately large amount of wood and artificial embellishment upon its shores, it is, for the most part, feeble in character, and poor in interest. Lough Derg, situated between co. Tipperary on the east, and counties Galway and Clare on the west, is the largest and longest expansion of the Shannon, and possesses a picturesquely varied outline, agreeable islets, alternately bold and soft shores, and a large amount, as well as considerable variety, of rich and imposing landscape. Other lacustrine expansions of the Shannon than Loughs Allen, Ree, and Derg, are situated chiefly within co. Roscommon, or on its boundary, and are comparatively small and devoid of interest.

Lough Melvin, on the mutual borders of counties Leitrim and Fermanagh, is partly overhung by the Darty mountains, and partly bounded by low, rocky, moorish grounds; and, with the aid of a few wooded islets, it presents, on the whole, an agreeable appearance. Loughs Macnean, Upper and Lower, on the mutual borders of counties Leitrim, Cavan, and Fermanagh, are wild sheets of water, cradled amidst a region of brilliant highland scenery. Lough Oughter, in co. Cavan, and in the channel or river-course of the Upper Erne, is a singularly intricate and almost labyrinthine intermixture of water with bold headlands, deep, projecting, wooded peninsulæ, and large fertile islands. Lough Key, in the north of co. Roscommon, and in the river-course of the Boyle, is a luscious sheet of water, gemmed with beautiful islands, and zoned with fertile and ornate grounds. Lough Gara, on the mutual borders of counties Roscommon, Mayo, and Sligo, has a singularly beautiful outline, and possesses some extent of interesting shore, yet fails to produce a generally pleasing effect. Lough Arrow, partly on the boundary between Roscommon and Sligo, but chiefly within the latter county, is studded with some beautiful islands, and surrounded with not uninteresting shores. Lough Gill, partly on the mutual border of Leitrim and Sligo, but chiefly within the latter county, has some charming islands, is surrounded by bold and singularly varied mountain ranges, and has been pronounced inferior in scenery only to the lakes of Killarney. Lough Dereveragh, in co. Westmeath, is a beautiful and comparatively large sheet of water. Lough Owel, a little south of Lough Dereveragh, is a limpid lake, fed by internal springs, and affording to the Royal Canal its main supply of water. Lough Iron, in co. Westmeath, and a little north-west of Lough Owel, has, in general, flat and boggy shores. Lough Ennel, in co. Westmeath, and south of Lough Owel, is languishingly beautiful. Lough Sheelin, on the mutual border of counties Meath, Westmeath, and Cavan, but chiefly within the last of these counties, is a beautiful though only third-rate expanse of water, greatly adorned on its north shores by recent georgic and park improvements. Lough Ganny, Gaunagh, or Gouna, on the mutual border of counties Longford and Cavan, forms the young Erne by its superfluous waters, and has been pronounced the most beautiful of the Leinster lakes. Lough Ramor, in the south-east of co. Cavan, is beautified with several wooded islets, and has considerably varied shores. The Cootehill lakes, on the mutual border of counties Cavan and Monaghan, are replete with luscious beauty, and completely screened with highly embellished demesnes. Lough Derg, in the south-east corner of co. Donegal, is a gloomy mountain lake, remarkable for St. Patrick's Purgatory on one of its dismal islets. Lough Esk, in the south of Donegal, is a pleasant and ornate sheet of water, of medium character between highland and lowland. Lough Veagh, a little north of the centre of co. Donegal, is a magnificent though not large mountain lake. Lough Carrowmore, in the north-east of co. Mayo, is a dreary expanse of water, amidst a vast region of wild moorlands. Loughs Bray, in the north of co. Wicklow, are mere loughlets, remarkable for the great elevation at which they lie, and the sublime scenery in which they are cradled. The lakes of Glendalough, near the centre of co. Wicklow, are noticeable, not strictly on their own account, but in association with the many and singular architectural ruins of their small and savagely wild Glen. The lakes of Inchegeelagh or Allua, in the west of co. Cork, have an agreeable mountain character. Lough Gougane Barra, on the western margin of co. Cork, a few miles west of the lakes of Inchegeelagh, is a loughlet of the most thrilling mountain romance. The lakes of Carra, Upper and Lower, in the west of co. Kerry, lie in a wild and beautiful glen, and have, for a number of years past, commanded the attention of many visitors to the lakes of Killarney. Lough Currane, on the coast of Ballinaskelligs bay in co. Kerry, has a mingled character of moorishness and mountain night.

The noticeable lakes, additional to those we have named, are, in co. Antrim, Lough Bag, in the river-course of the Lower Bann, and on the mutual border of counties Antrim and Londonderry, and Lough Beg or Lough Portmore, in the parishes of Glenavy and Ballinderry, and adjacent to the east side of Lough Neagh; in co. Armagh, Loughs Gullion, Annagariff, Gall, Clay, Tullyna wood, Sheettrin, Cullyhanna, Patrick, Kiltybane, Annaghmore, Allua, Ross, St. Peter, Corliss, Cam, Mullaghmore, Shaws, and Shark; in co. Cavan, Loughs Tacker, Sillan, Corraneary, Upper Skeagh, Milltown, Nadregeed, Cornagrove, Gradhan, Corglass, Beehy, Annagh, Carrowfin, Tully, Gartiny, Drumany, Crilly, Faharlagh, Edenterry, Drumard, Corraback, Killynaher, Cuillaghan, Killywilly, Clonty, Derryskitt, Killeshandra, Glasshouse, Rockfield, Garty, Swan, Dawn, Derrycassa, Coologe, Templeport, Bellaboy, Lakefield, Bunerky, Brackley, Cratty, Ardrougher, Moneen, Carrickacladdy, Corraekeldrum, Naweelion, Nagloughderg, Garvagh, Legalough, and Kinnail,—the last a comparatively large lake, partly within co. Longford; in co. Clare, Loughs Doo, Naminna, Akit, Cloonmackan, Drumcullaun, Inchiquin, Cullaun, Dromore, Atedaun, Lackeen, Bunny, Muckanagh, Ballyighter, Inchorman, Ea, Graney, O'Grady, Kinlough, Doon, Rosroe, Nanilaun, Cullaungheeda, Clonbrick, Clonlee, and Avocher; in co. Donegal, Loughs Fad, Shannagh, Glen, Gartan, Greenaw, Keel, Fern, Alluirg, Alton, Upper Nacuny, Lower Nacuny, Dunlewy, Anure, Craghy, Crumbane, Barra, Finn, Muck, Namanfin, Tamur, Ananima, Machugh, Derryduff, Sheskinmore, Fad, Doon, Kiltorris, Nalughraman, Unna and Unshagh; in co. Down, Loughs Hunshigo, Drumaran, Moat, Pollramer, Erne, Balloreen, Aghery, Derry, Hiney, Clay, Islandreavy, and Loughbrickland; in co. Fermanagh, Loughs Naman, Meenameen, Glenacrewan, Scalban, Keenaghan, Nearty, Rushen, Carrick, Ross, Carron, Derg, Barry, Larra, Cargen, Smaoran, Moore, Head, Drumroosk, Diah, Corban, Mill, Killymackan, Sand, Clomnin, Cornabass, Kilgarrow, Accusel, Ballydooligh, and Natrosy; in co. Galway, Loughs Cooter, Loughrea, Cloonkeen, Lettercraffoe, Boffin, Nahillion, Shindilla, Anillaun, Maunwee, Nafaoey, Inagh, Derryclare, Curreel, Fadda, Maumeen, Anaserd, Annagh, Kylemore, Ballinahinch, Garrowman, and Fee; in co. Kerry, Loughs Voher, Giruhe, Gulsh, Caha, Cloney, and Devil's Punchbowl; in King's co., Loughs Finn, Coura, Boora, Annagh, and Ballinderry; in co. Leitrim, Loughs Rinn, Sallagh, Drumshambo, Keeldra, Greenagh, Adoon, Rowan, Gorteenamuck, Drumlaheen, Fenagh, St. John's, Scur, Cammagh, George, Garadice, Culoughs, Gulladoo, Cullies, Rockfield, Drumhart, Belthavel, Anawry, Carrigeencor, Munakill, Glen-car, Lattone, and Glenade; in co. Limerick, Loughs Gur and Coolapish; in co. Longford, Loughs Bannow, Derry, Derrymacar, Glen, Currygrane, Gorteen, Killeen, Annagh, and Corglass; in co. Louth, Loughs Newtownbalregan and Ross; in co. Mayo, Loughs Doo, Glencullen, Nahaltora, Roonagh, Nacorra, Moher, Glanawough, Ballinlough, Derrynamuck, Mannin, Island, Roe, Urlur, Black, Derrylick, Levallinree, Beltra, Feagh, Bunavecla, Nalaghan, Dilla, Cloona, Carrowkerloly, Ballymore, Upper Callow, Lower Callow, Nanoge, and Cloonakillina; in co. Meath, Ballyhoe, Corstown, Brackan, Whitewood, Breakey, Annagh, and Bane; in co. Monaghan, Loughs More, Emy, Mullaghmore, Drumloo, Slacksgrange, Quig, Lamb, Clene, Kilcorran, Shankill, Magherarny, Clonkeen, Gortanwinny, Kilroosky, Dummys, Aghafin, Creeve, Upper Creeve, Avaghon, Barraghy, Derrygooney, Bawn, Avattan, Gale, Namachree, Shantona, Bellatrain, Boraghy, Morne, Egish, Ross, Macknoe, Monalty, Fee, Rahans, and Capragh; in co. Roscommon, Loughs Skean, Meelagh, Innishatery, Cavetown, Clogher, Canbo, Corbally, Bally, Glinn, Cloonacolly, Cloona, Errit, O'Flynn, Cloonullaun, Ardakillin, Ilangaroo, Black, Grange, Finn, Kilglass, Funshinagh, and Corkip; in co. Sligo, Loughs Talt, Easkey, Cloonacleigha, Templehouse, Ballylawley, and Colgagh; in co. Tipperary, Loughs Clareen, Poulavea, Avan, and Prior; in co. Tyrone, Loughs Bradan, Lee, Maghera, Annagh, Mullighruen, Roughan, Ash, and Moore; in co. Waterford, Loughs Coum, Shingau, Crotty, Cumberagh, and Couma; in co. Westmeath, Loughs Lane, Coosan, Pot, Sheever, Ruddan, Gur, Glore, Kilrush, Bane, Brittas, Doonis, Creggan, Makeegan, and Waterstown; and in co. Wicklow, Loughs Nahanagan, Dan, Tay, and Ouler.

MINERALS.*

The sedimentary rocks of Ireland, including those of the primitive and the transition series, are, in general, very regularly stratified; they have a range or strike, varying from 40° to the north of east and south of west, to east and west; and they dip at angles varying from 10° to 80° from the horizon. "The variation in the bearing or direction of the dip, and also of its angle of inclination, arises from an undulatory arrangement of the strata which is preserved throughout the country, and consequently at the apex of every undulation, a change in the dip must take place, either to the north or south; the direction of the apex of the undulation, or the anticlinal line, as it is now technically called, being parallel to the strike of the strata. In respect to the dip, there is one very remarkable fact observable throughout the southern counties, that it is usually towards the south; and when a reverse dip occurs, it continues comparatively but for a short distance; but the strata on the north side of the anticlinal axis are observed to incline at a very steep angle from the horizon, usually from 70° to 85° , and sometimes they are quite vertical. Continuing to the southward, the strata are again observed gradually to incline to the south till at length they resume their usual angle of about 40° from the horizon. This circumstance has frequently led to an erroneous conclusion as to the absolute thickness of some of the rock formations; for if the slate or other strata be observed to dip to the south for 10 miles, at an average angle of 30° , it is reasonably concluded that the thickness in that part amounts to 5 miles; but this is certainly not the case; as from observations carefully made, both on the sea-coast, and in several precipices and quarries in the interior, it has been ascertained, that although, when seen at the surface, the whole of the strata dip towards the south, still these strata consist of a series of convolutions, frequently on a small scale, both sides of which incline to the southward, though usually at different angles; and this peculiarity is general throughout the southern counties, and is alike observable in the strata belonging to the transition slate, the carboniferous limestone, and the great anthracite coal formation, which extends through the counties of Clare, Limerick, Kerry, and Cork. In the northern counties, the same tendency to a southern dip does not appear to prevail: the length of the inclinations on the opposite sides of the undulations being nearly equal; but in some districts, particularly in the counties of Antrim, Derry, and Donegal, the continuation of the dip, in one direction, without any undulation, is very considerable."

Several great districts of primitive or transition rocks occur near the coasts, and are separated from one another by intervening fields of the secondary limestone series. An extensive one of these districts is primitive, and constitutes the greater part of the counties of Donegal, Londonderry, and Tyrone; a second is likewise primitive, and consists of a small and highly interesting mountain group, on the north-east coast of the county of Antrim; and the third is also primitive, and, besides occupying the western coasts of the counties of Galway and Mayo, extends, in a north-easterly direction, into the counties of Sligo and Leitrim. The crystalline or igneous rocks of these three districts are granite, sienite, greenstone, and greenstone porphyry; and the sedimentary rocks are mica slate, shining slate, quartz rock, and primitive limestone, all regularly stratified, and, in general, though far from uniformly, ranging north-east and south-west. A fourth and great district, partly primitive, but chiefly transition, constitutes considerable portions of the counties of Down, Armagh, Monaghan, Cavan, Louth, Meath, Longford, and Roscommon. "This northern district is most probably a prolongation of the greywacke district of Scotland, which commences at St. Abb's Head on the frith of Forth, and extends, in a south-western direction, across the country to Portpatrick on the west coast; it appears again at Donaghadee on the east coast of Ireland, and continues in the same direction to Cairnclonhugh mountain in co. Longford. The rocks contained in this district consist of greywacke slate, fossil clay slate, flint slate, chlorite slate; and in the neighbourhood of the granite district of hornblende slate, schistose porphyry, and a variety of other metamorphic rocks, having structures intermediate between sedimentary and crystalline, which it is impossible to designate by any precise name. In addition to the foregoing, the district contains the following decidedly crystalline or igneous rocks,—viz., in great masses granite, sienitic granite, greenstone porphyry, clay porphyry,—in dykes, trap, pitchstone, and porphyry." A fifth district extends through the counties of Kildare, Wicklow, Wexford, and Kilkenny: and, except that beds of mica slate occur in the vicinity of granite, its rocks are very similar to those of the preceding district.

Among the igneous rocks of the primitive and the transition districts, granite is the most extensive, and appears also to be the oldest. "The general direction of the granite districts of Ireland is north-east and south-west, parallel to the general strike of the slate rocks. Hence it appears, that this rock, while in a state of fusion, forced a passage in the line of the strike of the strata; but this is not universally the case, as in some parts, particularly of the granite district of co. Wicklow, and of insulated portions of that of the counties of Donegal and Down, the granite protrusion has cut across the strike of the strata; in which cases the ends of the stratified rocks, though much shattered and confused, are found to abut directly against the sides of the granite precipice. The stratified rocks which rest on the north-west and south-east sides of the granitic nucleus, have been much altered by the contact of the incandescent granite at the time of its protrusion; and hence we find that strata, which, within a short distance of the granite boundary, consist of clay slate, rapidly change their character, and pass into large grained mica slate, or gneiss, and occasionally into hornblende slate or hornblende rocks, and several varieties of porphyry, in which large crystals of hornblende and felspar are fully developed. In addition to the granite, vast masses of protruded greenstone occur throughout the whole of the primary districts of Ireland, and, in many cases, they are interposed along the line of boundary between the granite and the slate, and, in some instances, have forced their way through the granite itself: hence we may conclude, that they are posterior to the granite, and, though generally among the primary rocks, there is reason, in many cases, to believe them to be more recent than the newest of the secondary.

"With the exception of granite, which is used as a valuable building-stone, and some inferior slate quarries which occur in different parts of the counties of Derry, Tyrone, and Donegal, and also in parts of the counties of Down, Kildare, and Wicklow, the only valuable rock, in an economical point of view, is primary limestone, which occurs in great abundance throughout the schistose districts of the counties of Derry, Donegal, Tyrone, and Galway. This substance is chiefly valuable for manure when burned into lime; but in some districts the limestone beds occasionally produce beautiful varieties of crystalline marble of various tints, as white, rose, and dove colour; and, in co. Galway, large quarries have been opened, containing a valuable kind of serpentine, striped and mottled, white and green, from which blocks of large dimensions have been raised. The whole of these primary and transition schistose districts contain metalliferous veins; but a few only of those which are known have been worked, and, no doubt, many yet remain undiscovered. Owing to the great decrease in the prices of copper and lead during the last few years, many mines, formerly at work, have been abandoned; and at present no metallic mines are in operation in the north of Ireland, with the exception of one containing lead at Clonhig, near Newton-Ardes, in co. Down, and another at Derrynoose, in co. Armagh. Of the numerous copper and lead veins known in co. Wicklow, only four are at present at work; namely, the lead mines of Lugganure and Glenmalur, situated on the boundary of the granite and slate, and the copper mines of Ballymurtagh and Cronbane, in the vale of Ovoca, 6 miles to the west of Arklow. The metalliferous relations of the counties of Wicklow and Wexford have been described in great detail by Mr. Weaver, in his valuable Memoir, contained in the 5th vol. of 'The Transactions of the Geological Society of London.' It is consequently unnecessary to enter further on the subject in this place. At present there are no mines working in the primary mountain districts of the counties of Leitrim, Sligo, Mayo, and Galway; but many, both of copper and lead, are known, and have been worked at former periods with considerable success."

A seventh district of great extent—and the third which contains a large aggregate of transition rocks—stretches from Waterford on the east, to Dingle bay on the west, and comprehends very nearly the whole of co. Waterford, and large portions of the counties of Cork and Kerry. This district contains abundance of carboniferous or mountain limestone, and two varieties of transition slate, an older and a newer. The limestone forms the bottom of the valleys of all the principal rivers, and is found around the edges of the great sea-loughs and bays. The older transition slate is grey in colour, of similar age, composition, and structure, to that of Down, Kildare, Wicklow, and Wexford, and extensively suitable to be used as roofing slate; and it is successfully quarried at Glenpatrick in co. Waterford, and West Carbery in co. Cork. "The second or newer slate, usually rests unconformably on the older. The lower portions of its strata consist of alternating beds of brownish red quartzose conglomerate, and coarse red slate. These strata are succeeded by alternations of red and grey quartz rock, red quartzose slate, and clay slate, the grain becoming gradually finer as the beds accumulate and recede farther from the conglomerate, till at length the upper beds produce varieties of purple, brownish, red, and reddish grey clay slate, which are quarried and used as roofing slate, particularly in the valley of the river Blackwater, near Lismore. In the counties of Waterford and Cork, these strata form successive undulations, the ridges of which have an east and west direction, and the beds always incline towards the valleys of the principal rivers, and thus form troughs, which are filled by indurated sandstone and secondary limestone, whose strata rest conformably on the clay slate. The southern clay slate district contains several copper and lead mines of great value, some of which are now being worked on an extensive scale, and with signal success, particularly those of Knockmahon in co. Waterford, and of Allihies near Berehaven in co. Cork. Mining operations have lately been commenced with great spirit at Ardtully, near Kenmare, in co. Kerry; and extensive works have, till within a short period, been carried on at the Ardley copper mines, near the south-western coast of co. Cork."

Grey micaceous slate, varying in grain from coarse to fine, forms a small tract to the east of Pomeroy in co. Tyrone. It rests directly on the sienite situated to the north; is covered unconformably on the south, the west, and the east, by old red sandstone; contains a profusion of fossils, particularly trilobites, orthoceras, ammonites, producta, spirifera, mya, and pleurotomaria; and probably belongs to the Silurian series.—Several mountain masses, isolated in the flat limestone region in the interior of the country, consist partly of transition slate, and partly of overlying beds of old red sandstone. The chief of these are the Curlew mountains in co. Sligo, wholly composed of old red sandstone; the Slievebawn mountains, in co. Roscommon; the Derrybrian and Tullow mountains, sections of the Slievebawn congeries, on the west side of Lough Derg; the Slievebloom, Devil's Bit, and Keeper mountains in King's co., Queen's co., and co. Tipperary; the Booley mountains in co. Kilkenny; and the Galtee mountains in counties Tipperary and Limerick. All these isolated mountain masses of sedimentary rock have either an east and west or a north-east and south-west direction, parallel to the strike of the strata of which they are composed.

The vast predominant plain of Ireland wholly consists of old red sandstone, carboniferous limestone, and the coal formations. The old red sandstone forms a district which extends from Enniskillen in co. Fermanagh toward Cookstown in co. Tyrone; but, in other parts of Ireland, it rarely occurs except on the edges of the primitive and the transition districts; and there it is interposed between the schistose strata of these districts and strata of secondary or carboniferous limestone. A base of conglomerate usually accompanies the old red sandstone, and consists of rolled stones of quartz, and a cement of brownish-red siliceous and ferruginous paste. Sandstone strata succeed the lower beds of conglomerate, of a character progressively rising from cemented boulders to amased grains, or from literal conglomerate to fine sandstone.—The carboniferous limestone is of such amazing extent, as to form the surface rock of nearly two-thirds of the whole kingdom; it instantly and strongly arrests the attention by the singular prominence which it possesses in a geological map of the country; it forms enormously the greater part of the vast predominant or central plain, and occurs also in many ramified and isolated situations in the districts prevalingly occupied by other surface rocks; and, so far from its constituting upland regions, and earning the name of mountain limestone, as in England, it is, in a very strict sense, a 'flætz' rock,—the districts formed by it being remarkably low and flat, and owing the comparatively few and small diversifications of their surface either to accumulations of diluvial gravel, or to the igneous protrusion of crystalline rocks. The entire succession of the strata of the carboniferous limestone, however, rarely occurs in any one district, at least one and often more members of the series being usually absent. The series, so far as known, consists of, first, yellow sandstone, limestone, and shale; second, lower limestone; third, calp, black shale, and sandstone; and fourth, upper limestone.

The yellow sandstone either succeeds the old red sandstone, or rests upon the primitive or transition rocks. "The lowest member of the series usually consists of quartz sandstone conglomerate, which varies from coarse to fine-grained, and passes into sandstone. In some instances, though rarely, this conglomerate contains rolled masses of carboniferous limestone; it is usually followed by a succession of strata, consisting of yellowish grey or yellowish white sandstone, which, when fully developed, amounts to a considerable thickness, and occasionally forms hills of moderate elevation. The yellow sandstone strata are sometimes free from the intervention of any other rock, but frequently its beds are interstratified with dark grey shale and with dark grey limestone, more or less pure. In some localities, very thin beds of impure coal occur, interstratified with the sandstone and shale; a circumstance which has unfortunately led to many expensive but fruitless trials for coal in different parts of Ireland." The lower conglomerate and the sandstone members of this series have usually been regarded as belonging to the old red sandstone formation; but, as they alternate in several localities with limestone strata, which contain the fossils of the carboniferous limestone, they obviously belong to the limestone series. They generally occur on the exterior edges of the carboniferous limestone districts, in contact either with old red sandstone or with transition rocks; but they also form several insulated ridges and hills of moderate elevation, in the interior of the great central plain. "The strata are sometimes coarse, and pass into conglomerate, but they are usually fine-grained, and the upper beds alternate with impure limestone. The direction of the ridges is usually north-east and south-west, parallel to the general strike of the primary and transition slates of the country; and being formed in each case by an undulation or upheaving of the strata, the sandstone beds dip on all sides towards, and pass under, the surrounding limestone."

The lower limestone constitutes by far the most extensive portion of the limestone series. In the counties of Fermanagh, Cavan, and Leitrim, it is partly covered by the upper limestone; and in part of the counties of Dublin, Meath, and Westmeath, it is covered by the calp; but, excepting where trap protrusions or isolated yellow sandstone hills occur, it is the surface rock of very nearly all other parts of the great limestone territory. "The undermost beds are frequently siliceous and impure, and graduate insensibly into the alternations of sandstone, shale, and limestone, which form the portion of the yellow sandstone series. The colour is usually dark grey, or bluish grey. In many localities, as the beds accumulate they become black, and the structure is so occasionally crystalline as to be susceptible of a high polish, and is used for marble; thus black marbles occur, and are quarried very extensively near the western boundary of the limestone district of co. Galway, between Oughterard and Lough Corrib; also near the town of Galway, and thence to Oranmore. Black marble occurs under similar circumstances in the neighbourhood of Westport in Mayo, and of Carlow and Kilkenny; also mottled black and white, in the neighbourhood of Mitchelstown, at the base of the Galtees mountains; likewise filled with organic remains in the neighbourhood of Cork, and many other places. Where carbon, the colouring matter, is wanting, we have crystalline marble of various tints, as brownish red at Armagh, white and red striped at Killarney, Kenmare, Cork Harbour, and Castletown, 9 miles north of Nenagh, co. Tipperary; red and yellowish white at Clononey, in King's co.; and brownish red, mottled with grey of various shades, at Ballymahon, in co. Longford. Grey and dove marbles occur in numerous places, particularly at the base of the Curlew mountain, near Lough Arrow, in co. Sligo; near the Seven Churches, south of Athlone, in King's co.; and at Carrickacrumph, near Cloyne, in co. Cork. Nearly the whole of the marble quarries here mentioned, dispersed from north to south, occur near the outer edge of the limestone boundary, where it rests either on the yellow sandstone, or on some older rock. When they are met with in the interior, as at Clononey and the Seven Churches in King's co., it will be seen that detached hills of yellow sandstone, as already described, rise up from beneath the limestone strata, in their immediate neighbourhood; thus showing that the marble beds do belong to the lower portions of the series. The marble beds are succeeded by strata of grey or greyish blue limestone, which occupy a greater or less extent of country, in proportion as the strata effect a steep or slight angle of inclination from the horizon. In many cases the strata undulate, forming very flat curves; and where such occur, of course the same bed may frequently be met with at the surface, throughout a large district. Excepting in the northern counties, where the succession of the limestone series is fully and closely developed, it is almost impossible to determine, with any precision, on the point where the lower limestone may be said to terminate, and the calp or the upper limestone to commence. In many localities of the midland and southern counties, the black shale or calp series is altogether wanting, or it occurs so sparingly, that, without a laborious and minute examination, it will not be detected."

In the calp series, a black argillaceous limestone, to which the name of calp was given by Mr. Kirwan, alternates with black shale, and contains flattened spheroids of pyritous clay ironstone. "In some districts the lower beds of this series consist of alternations of sandstone, shale, and limestone, more or less pure; in others, the sandstone is wanting, but the upper beds in all consist of thin alternating beds of impure limestone and shale. In some localities, the lower beds, in addition to the sandstone and shale, contain indications of carbonaceous matter; and impure beds of coal, varying in thickness from half an inch to two inches, have been observed; which circumstance, as in the case of the yellow sandstone, has led to many fruitless trials for coal. The thickness of the calp series, where fully developed, is very considerable; on the north-west coast of co. Leitrim, it exceeds 1,700 feet, though in co. Cavan, between Belturbet and Ballyconnell, it is not more than 400 feet. In some districts, the upper members of the lower limestone alternate with beds of dark bluish grey shale, and thus graduate so imperceptibly into the calp or black shale division, that it is impossible to draw a precise line between them; while in others the division is so distinctly marked, that the boundary may at once be clearly defined. In flat countries where the gradation is usually insensible, the first decided indication is the occurrence of beds of black shale, containing balls or flattened spheroids of clay ironstone; these beds are usually interstratified with the black or dark bluish grey argillaceous limestone, similar to that which occurs in abundance in the neighbourhood of Dublin. This division is much more fully developed in the northern districts of the carboniferous limestone, than in the midland or southern; and it was solely from the clear exhibition of their strata as seen in the precipitous cliffs of the remarkable carboniferous mountain district of the counties of Sligo, Fermanagh, Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon, that the subdivision of the series has been attempted. This district, which is unique in Ireland, and which bears a striking resemblance in character as well as composition, to the carboniferous mountain districts of Derbyshire, north-west of Yorkshire and Cumberland, exhibits in perfection the whole of the carboniferous limestone, as well as the millstone grit series of Ireland. The calp and shale division is perhaps best developed on the west coast of the counties of Leitrim and Sligo, between Ballyshannon and Benbulbin. In this line of section the strata dip to the southward, at an angle of from 2° to 5° from the horizon. The lower limestone of Ballyshannon is succeeded by beds of black shale, containing balls of clay ironstone, interstratified with impure argillaceous limestone; these beds continue as far as the parallel of Bundoran, where they are succeeded by a series of alternations of grey, and occasionally reddish-grey, sandstone and black shale, with argillaceous limestone. Some of the sandstone beds contain casts of calamites enveloped in coaly matter; and some thin but irregular beds of coal have been observed, though none worth working have been discovered; and, from the nature of the country, it is improbable that such do exist. These beds are succeeded by alternations of black shale, with impure argillaceous limestone or calp, which form the precipitous cliffs of Dartry mountain facing the west, and which, near the summit, are capped by the upper or splintery limestone. In examining the succession of the calp strata in a western direction, commencing with the lower limestone at Belturbet, in the county of Cavan, and crossing Slieve Rushin, the valley of Swanlinbar and Cuilcagh mountain, an important member, namely, the grey sandstone with coaly impressions, &c., is wanting, or at least very slight traces of it can be discovered; a circumstance which proves that considerable variations may be expected in the composition as well as in the thickness of the same division of the carboniferous limestone series, even within the same district or neighbourhood; and, hence, we need not be surprised to find in some of our carboniferous districts that the calp division is altogether wanting, and in others that it is only slightly developed. It would be tedious and almost endless to enter upon a particular description of the numerous localities in which the calp series occurs in the north of Ireland; at present we need only observe, that the shale district, extending from Emyvale in the county of Monaghan, to Brookborough in the county of Fermanagh, known by the name of the Slieve Beagh mountains, has long been considered to belong to the true coal formation, and sanguine expectations have been entertained of the discovery of workable beds of coal; but having ascertained that in the order of succession it forms a portion of the calp series, it appears very improbable that these expectations will be realized. The calp district of Leinster, if it may be so called, which extends through the counties of Dublin, Meath, and Westmeath, is composed of alternations of impure black argillaceous limestone, with black shale, containing balls of clay ironstone. Some of the shale beds, which are much impregnated with sulphuret of iron, are, no doubt, the sources of the numerous chalybeate as well as sulphureous springs which occur in that district. In the neighbourhood of Dublin, the calp shale rarely contains any organic remains; while in other localities they are very abundant, particularly in varieties of producta, spirifera, terebratula, crinoida, both heads and stems, together with various corallines, and particularly a large variety of turbinolia, probably turbinolia fungites."

The upper or splintery limestone is of comparatively rare occurrence and limited extent; and in consequence of its containing most of the same kinds of organic remains which occur in the lower limestone, it cannot always be certainly distinguished. "A country composed of the upper limestone is usually extremely rugged, and contains numerous crags and mural precipices, which at a distance present the character of rude columnar facades; it is usually cavernous, and the streams falling from higher elevations are frequently lost in fissures, and flow through subterranean channels, till at length they burst forth from the lower strata of the series, and flow down the more gentle declivities of the calp shale beneath them. The rock is commonly of a light smoke-grey, or bluish grey colour; the fracture is splintery in one direction, and conchoidal in the other; the texture is even and close-grained,—frequently the mass is extremely brittle, and breaks into indeterminate angular fragments; the upper beds contain much black and grey hornstone, arranged in regular or undulating layers; they occur also in detached elliptical masses. Strata belonging to the upper limestone are well exposed to view in the precipitous sides of the carboniferous limestone mountains of the counties of Sligo, Fermanagh, Cavan, and Leitrim. The general character of the rock is similar throughout; every precipice presents at a distance the same semi-columnar aspect, is of the same grey colour, breaks with the same splintery and conchoidal fracture, and abounds with the same fossil organic remains; the lower beds consist of the same alternations of dark grey limestone with thin beds of shale; and the upper contain the same layers and detached masses of black and grey hornstone. The upper strata of the series are frequently associated with irregular beds of semi-crystalline brown spar rock, the exposed and disintegrated surfaces of which so much resemble ordinary grey sandstone in appearance, that this rock has frequently been mistaken for it. Thus brown spar of this kind occurs in the upper limestone, on the summit of Knocknaree mountain in the county of Sligo, in a similar position on Belmore mountain in the county of Fermanagh, and in many other localities. In Belmore mountain the thickness of the upper limestone amounts to 650 feet, in Benbuben it is 500 feet, and at the eastern base of Cuilcagh mountain, in the valley of Swanlinbar, in the county of Cavan, it is 600 feet. Leaving the Lough Allen mountain district, the next locality in which the upper limestone occurs is in the vicinity of and surrounding the coal formation of the county of Tyrone; commencing at Dungannon, it extends towards Stewartstown, and thence underlying the small coal field of Annahone, north of Stewartstown, it continues by Killymeen to Cookstown, in which neighbourhood it is covered by strata belonging to the new red sandstone. The quarries at Cookstown are remarkable for the number and variety of fossil organic remains which they contain; and it is to be observed that almost every species and variety which occur there have likewise been discovered low down in the series of the lower limestone, particularly in the quarries in the Clane, near the Grand Canal, in the county of Kildare, and in the valley of the river Lee near the city of Cork. It is probable that the upper limestone does not occur in any of the portion of the great midland limestone district of Ireland. The first position in which it occurs, and where it presents the usual characters of the series, is surrounding the Leinster and Tipperary coal districts in the Queen's county and the counties of Carlow, Kilkenny, and Tipperary. In the valley of the Barrow at Carlow, where the whole carboniferous limestone series of the south is clearly developed, it would appear that the calp, or black shale division is wanting, and that the upper limestone rests directly on the black marble beds of the lower. The upper limestone of the Queen's county and the county of Kilkenny is characterized by the number and size of the caverns it contains, the most remarkable of which are the Great Cave of Dunmore, situated on the edge of the Leinster coal district, 8 miles north of Kilkenny; and of Clopocke, 5 miles south of Stradbally, in the Queen's county. The upper limestone also occurs, underlying the anthracite coal district of the counties of Clare, Limerick, Kerry, and Cork. Its distinctive characters are clearly developed at Foynes, adjoining the river Shannon in the county of Limerick, close to the eastern boundary of the coal country. In this locality the strata present numerous mural precipices, and the upper beds contain in abundance layers and insulated masses of hornstone. Organic remains occur, though less abundantly than usual; but no dependence can be placed on them, owing to their being common to the lower as well as to the upper series. It is doubtful whether or not the upper limestone occurs in the valley of the river Blackwater, along the southern boundary of the Cork coal district, and from thence westward to Killarney; in that direction the strata are so much disturbed, that it is nearly impossible to determine either the dip or the strike. It seems probable that the strata of the coal formation rest unconformably on the lower limestone, that the upper is wanting in the valley of the river, and that the usual disturbance and derangement of the strata have been occasioned by a fault occurring in the line of the river, which, for the most part, forms the boundary between the limestone and the coal formation."

The millstone grit series, as to at least its decided or undoubted character, occurs only in the mountain district around Lough Allen, usually called the Connaught coal-field, and in the shale district which extends from Drumquin in co. Tyrone to the vicinity of Pettigo in co. Fermanagh. Both of these districts contain coal, and have often been regarded as belonging to the true coal formation; but the prevailing rock in them conclusively proves itself to be quite distinct from that formation, both by its close resemblance to the millstone grit of the north of England, and by its containing, in all its members, the remains of marine exuviae. "In order to place the succession of the strata which compose the millstone grit of Ireland in a clear point of view, it will be necessary to describe the sections as they occur in those localities where each portion of the series is most clearly developed. We shall commence with Cuilcagh mountain, situated to the west of the valley of Swanlinbar. The splintery limestone which forms the upper member of the carboniferous or mountain limestone series, is succeeded by three great beds or successions of beds of yellowish white quartz sandstone, having beds of black shale interposed between each. In ascending Cuilcagh mountain from the east side, these sandstone beds present a succession of terraces; and the shale beds between them assume the appearance of comparatively flat swampy plains; the thickness of the whole amounts to about 600 feet. They are succeeded by what may be termed the great shale of Cuilcagh mountain, whose aggregate thickness exceeds 700 feet. The lower beds consist of thin alternations of black shale with impure dark blueish grey argillaceous limestone which contain many of the fossils common to the carboniferous limestone series. Continuing to ascend the mountain, the calcareous beds gradually diminish in thickness, and at length entirely disappear; but in lieu of them, the shale beds are associated with numerous and frequently thick layers or beds, and also with large flattened spheroids, of argillaceous ironstone, some of which are extremely rich in iron, and were formerly worked. Many of the flattened ironstone spheroids are extremely large, and some, which are reticulated by veins of calcareous spar, present magnificent specimens of septaria. The shale which accompanies the ironstone contains a profusion of casts of marine organic remains, many of which differ from those of the subjacent limestone; and it is this circumstance which has induced the classification of the strata which immediately succeed the upper limestone, with the millstone grit series, in preference to that of the carboniferous limestone. Still continuing to ascend, the ironstone beds become thin, and at length disappear; and the upper portion, amounting to a thickness of about 250 feet, consists altogether of fine-grained black shale, containing organic remains, but particularly of posidonia, but not so abundantly as in the lower beds, which alternate either with the impure limestone or the ironstone. This great mass of shale is succeeded by an accumulation of beds of yellowish white sandstone, about 250 feet in thickness. In the lower portion, next the shale, the sandstone beds are thin, and alternate with sandstone, slate, and shale; the upper consist of thick beds of yellowish white quartz sandstone, some of which are rather coarse-grained, and assume the true character of millstone grit. This rock occasionally contains vegetable organic remains, particularly some varieties of stigmara. In this portion of the district, the remarkable table-land, which forms the summit of Cuilcagh mountain, and which is elevated 2,188 feet above the level of the sea, forms the upper member of the millstone grit series; but if we cross the valley of Lough Allen in a south-western direction to the Arigna iron works, we find the same rock resting on the same shale, near the summit of Bراهیة mountain, in the county of Roscommon; from this point we continue the description of the section. The millstone grit of Bراهیة mountain is succeeded by alternations of shale and sandstone, with three beds of coal, one of which in this mountain is three feet in thickness, though in others the same bed is less than two feet thick: but, unfortunately, the extent of this coal field, which is confined to the summit of Bراهیة and Slieve Kulkagh mountains, is so inconsiderable, that no extensive collieries or manufactories can be successfully established; consequently we cannot expect that this district will at any period produce an abundant supply of fuel for distant markets. At present the Arigna iron works, the only manufactory of that kind in Ireland, are in full work, and cast-iron of the best quality is now made there at a moderate expense. The coal, though thin, is of excellent quality, as far as regards the smelting of iron; the ironstone is peculiarly rich, and limestone is abundant in the neighbourhood. The millstone grit forms the summit, not only of Cuilcagh, but of many similar mountains of the neighbouring district. Had they been 100 feet higher, they would have all contained the main coal of Bراهیة mountain; but, unfortunately, that valuable coal-bed which, no doubt, once existed there, has been washed away by the action of currents proceeding from the north-west, and deposited in broken fragments, accompanied by sandstone and blue clay, on the surface of the limestone valley which extends to the south-east, towards Belturbet, Killeshandra, and Mohill. In many instances, large pieces of coal have been discovered by well-sinkers, in the diluvium throughout the district above-mentioned; and in some cases, the quantity of coal was so considerable as to induce the belief that, by sinking deeper, a bed of coal might be found. In the millstone grit district, which extends from the neighbourhood of Drumquin in the county of Tyrone towards Lough Erne in the county of Fermanagh, the series is very imperfectly developed. It also contains coal, but the beds are too thin and impure to repay the expense of working."

Six coal districts occur additional to the millstone grit formations, of perfectly distinct character from them, and possibly of as old or even older existence. These are the Leinster district, around the junction point of counties Kilkenny and Carlow, and Queen's co.; the Slieveardagh or Tipperary district, in the east of co. Tipperary; the Munster district, in counties Clare, Limerick, Cork, and Kerry; the Monaghan district, in the vicinity of Carrickmacross; the Tyrone district, in the east of co. Tyrone; and the Antrim district, in the north of co. Antrim. The whole of these, except the last, rest upon the upper or splintery limestone; but though thus similar in position to the millstone grit, they differ from it in wanting marine exuvies, and in possessing casts of terrestrial plants and of fluviatile and lacustrine remains. The districts south of Dublin contain only simple carbonaceous or stone coal, with its accompanying anthracite; the Antrim district contains both bituminous and simple carbonaceous coal; and the Monaghan and Tyrone districts contain only bituminous coal. Any minuter notice of the coal districts here would only be a repetition of the notices in the articles on the respective localities in the body of our Work.

The secondary rocks superior to those of the coal formation, which occur in Ireland, are magnesian limestone, new red sandstone, black shale, lias limestone, green sand, and chalk. "The whole of these comparatively recent strata occur in the north-eastern counties in the form of a great mineral basin, the upper beds of which consist of indurated chalk, capped by a thick mass of tabular trap, and the lower of new red sandstone, and, in one instance, of magnesian limestone. This great mineral basin occupies nearly the whole of the county of Antrim, and considerable portions of the counties of Derry, Tyrone, and Down. Its external edge, when viewed at a distance, presents the striking feature of a high table-land, rising precipitously either from a comparatively low and flat country, or from the level of the sea, which bounds it on the north and east. Among the numerous characteristic examples which might be brought forward, perhaps the most remarkable are the lofty precipices and mural cliffs which extend along the east coast of the county of Antrim; from Belfast to Red bay, in this direction, the same character prevails throughout, though some of the mountain headlands are more elevated and imposing than others. The upper region of the cliffs presents, in all cases, mural escarpments, consisting of a mass of black trap, frequently from 200 to 300 feet in thickness; it is usually amorphous, but occasionally it is rudely columnar. The chalk which lies immediately beneath, also presents mural precipices varying from 60 to 100 feet in height; and their dazzling whiteness, contrasted with the black mass of superincumbent trap, adds much to the general effect of the scene. The strata beneath the chalk, which, in a descending order, consist of green sand, the lias formation, and red and variegated marls belonging to the new red sandstone, are usually concealed from view by a thick covering of clay and debris, which has arisen partly from the disintegration of the incoherent beds of lias, black shale, and red marl, and partly falls from the superincumbent cliffs of trap and chalk; consequently the lower portions of the declivity, between the base of the chalk and the level of the sea, usually present a steep inclined plane, many parts of which have been cultivated, and some so successfully, that they may be classed among the most productive soils of the north of Ireland. Though the strata of the great northern mineral basin have, in a great degree, been altered or modified by the action of igneous matter, arising partly from the pressure of the great superincumbent mass of trap which covers the chalk, and partly by protrusions, consisting of trap veins or dykes, and occasionally of large mountain masses of trap, still the lithological character of the strata is sufficiently preserved to enable us to identify them; but, with the assistance of the fossil organic remains, which are abundant in the upper member of the series, no doubt can be entertained of the correspondence of these strata with similar successions of rocks in England as well as in other countries. The magnesian limestone which occurs in the neighbourhood of Hollywood, on the south side of Belfast Lough, is identical in mineral character with that of the county of Durham and other parts of the north of England; and like it, it is succeeded by beds of new red sandstone and new red marl; and, consequently, Ireland may be said to possess portions of the whole of the upper series of the secondary rocks of England, with the exception of oolite, though traces even of that formation have been discovered on the coast, near to Larne, in the county of Antrim. The new red sandstone, which succeeds the magnesian limestone, is not altogether confined to the boundaries of the great mineral basin; it occurs in detached districts, resting on the carboniferous limestone, in the counties of Armagh and Tyrone, and likewise, as already mentioned, resting on the coal formation in the neighbourhood of Coal Island in the same county. A small district of new red sandstone, and red marl also, occurs to the north of Kingscourt, in the county of Cavan, between the coal district of Monaghan and the greywacke slate. This district contains one bed of gypsum, upwards of 60 feet in thickness, which was ascertained partly by sinking, and partly by boring; but, owing to the great influx of water, workings have not hitherto been commenced for commercial purposes; but there can be no doubt that that district contains a valuable deposit of gypsum."

The great tabular trap district of the counties of Antrim, Londonderry, Tyrone, Armagh, and Down, will be found noticed with sufficient minuteness in the section on Minerals, in our article on the county of Antrim. Remarkable protruded masses of trap, however, are not confined to the north-east district of the kingdom, but occur throughout all the north and north-west among rocks of all ages and formations, and are found even among the limestone series of the great predominant plain. They consist both of whin dykes or basaltic veins, and of huge amorphous masses of greenstone or greenstone porphyry, occasionally forming large mountains, and aggregately of greater extent than any other igneous rock except granite. "Their general direction in the trap district of the county of Antrim is nearly north and south; in the slate district adjoining the Mourne mountains of the county of Down, their direction is north-west and south-east; in the counties of Tyrone and Fermanagh, where the dykes are usually large, and where their continuous length has, in some instances, been ascertained to exceed seven miles, the direction is south-east; and in the counties of Mayo and Sligo, the direction of the remarkable dykes described by Archdeacon Verschoyle is east and west; but these dykes or narrow protrusions, however instructive and important when observed in detail, dwindle into insignificance when compared with the gigantic greenstone protrusions of Knockmorden and Urrisbeg in the county of Galway, of Carlingford mountain in the county of Louth, of Slievegullion in the county of Armagh, of Slievegallion in the county of Derry, of numberless minor mountains in the county of Donegal, of Ballygally Head, of Ballygawn, of Sleamish, and of many other remarkable greenstone protrusions of the county of Antrim."

The tertiary formations of Ireland are less extensive than those of England, and are probably of lacustrine origin. "The most important deposit belonging to this class is situated along the south-eastern margin of Lough Neagh, between Washing bay near Mountjoy Castle in the county of Tyrone, and Sandy bay in the county of Antrim. In the county of Tyrone, and the northern part of the county of Armagh, this deposit occupies a district of 10 miles in length, by 5 miles in breadth; it is composed of alternations of white, brown, and greenish blue clay, with white and grey sand, and irregular beds of lignite, or wood coal, and in the margin of Lough Neagh, of silicified wood. In some localities lignite is very abundant, and particularly in the Sandy bay of Lough Neagh, where, during seasons in which fuel is scarce, the inhabitants occasionally sink pits and raise it for domestic purposes. In the parish of Clonoe, in the county of Tyrone, the clay beds rest on the new red sandstone, which overlies the coal formation of Coal Island; and during the last ten years, several trials were made by boring in the clay district in the expectation of finding the coal beneath it. Two of these trials in the townland of Annaghmore, were continued to the depth of 294 feet, without reaching the red sandstone; and several other trials were made in different parts of the district, with the same results. The elevation of the surface at Annaghmore is 100 feet above the level of the sea, and 62 feet above the level of Lough Neagh, and consequently it becomes evident that the bottom of the tertiary deposit must be at least 184 feet below the level of the sea. The clay district of Lough Neagh is similar to the potter's clay district of Bohvey, in Devonshire; and pits have been opened in many parts for the purpose of raising pipe clay; but hitherto no beds of a pure white colour have been discovered, at least none which preserve their white colour when exposed to the heat of the potter's baking furnace; but there can be no doubt, if proper trials were made in different parts of the district, that pure white potter's clay would be discovered. Potter's clay, similar to that of Lough Neagh, occurs in a valley resting on the carboniferous limestone situated to the south-east of Cahir, in the county of Tipperary; and many years since, considerable quantities of clay were raised, and exported from thence to the potteries of England. White clay also occurs in a similar position, resting on limestone near St. John's Point, and other localities on the western bank of Lough Ree, in the county of Roscommon."

Vesuvian, though of not well developed crystal, has been found at Kilranelagh, in a rock composed of common garnet, quartz, and felspar. Grenalite occurs in a micaceous compound, in the lead mines of Wicklow. The precious beryl has been found embedded in granite near Loughs Bray in co. Wicklow. Cronebane has been found in the mountains of Wicklow and Dublin. Andalusite occurs in the micaceous schist of Djouce mountain in Wicklow. A mineral nearly allied to andalusite has been found in great abundance at Killiney in co. Dublin. A crystallized mineral of characters very similar to those of indurated talc, accompanies the andalusite of Djouce mountain. Hollow spar, in very distinct specimens, has been found at and near Baltinglass in co. Wicklow. Pitch-stone, traversing granite, occurs near Newry in co. Down. Granular sulphate of barytes, accompanied by iron pyrites, has been found on the shore near Clonakilty in co. Cork. Wavellite, very similar in its external character and in its analysis to the wavellite of Devonshire, as described by Sir Humphrey Davy, has been found about 10 miles south-east of the city of Cork. Jaspers of various sizes have been discovered in yellow clay, a few feet below the surface, near the southern extremity of the granite district in co. Kilkenny. Amethysts have been found in the cliffs in the vicinity of Kerry Head. Transparent crystals, popularly known as Kerry stones, and harder, larger, and more brilliant than Bristol stones, are comparatively abundant in various parts of Kerry. Gold was for several years obtained in rather large quantity on the mountain of Croghan-Kinshela in co. Wicklow. Silver appears to have been obtained in considerable quantities, previous to the Carlist wars of the 17th century, in the lead mines of Antrim, Sligo, and Tipperary. Copper is found at Ross Island in the lower lake of Killarney; at Muckross, on the shores of that lake; at Cronebane and Ballynauertagh in co. Wicklow; and in some parts of counties Cork, Clare, Meath, Waterford, and Dublin. Lead occurs near Enniscorthy in co. Wexford; at Derrynoose in co. Armagh; near Glendalough in co. Wicklow; near the city of Dublin; and in parts of counties Sligo, Antrim, Tipperary, and Donegal. Iron ores are plentiful in various parts of Ireland; and, in the 17th century, they were worked in a number of districts till the circumjacent timber available for smelting was exhausted. The grey ore of manganese has been found in the peninsula of Howth, in various parts of co. Kilkenny, in the Mayo mountains of Glanmore, and in several other counties. Cobalt accompanies the copper of Muckross in co. Kerry; and a variety of the earth black cobalt ore of Werner, has been found in the peninsula of Howth. Tin stone occurs in Croghan-Kinshela in co. Wicklow. Porcelain earth, equal in purity to the china clay of Cornwall, has been found in the south-west of co. Wicklow. Mineral springs, chiefly chalybeate, occur in almost every county; and those most in repute, as the resorts of invalids, are the spa of Ballispellan near Urlingford in co. Kilkenny, the spa of Lucan near Dublin, the spa of Swanlinbar in co. Cavan, and the spa of Mallow in co. Cork.

The mines and most valuable quarries, worked in September, 1837, together with the condition and produce of each, may be briefly stated:—The Derrynoose lead mine in co. Armagh was about to be cleared of water by a steam-engine; the Ballycorus smelting works, rolling and pipe mill, and shot tower, in co. Dublin, employed 20 men, and produced from 800 to 2,400 tons a-year, worth £27 per ton; the Killaloe slate quarries in co. Tipperary, employed from 350 to 400 men, and produced from 7,000 to 10,000 tons per annum, worth £1 10s. per ton; the Slieveadagh collieries in co. Tipperary, employed 5 steam-engines, and from 200 to 300 men, and produced 30,000 tons per annum, worth 10s. per ton; the Knockmahon copper mines in co. Waterford, employed 1,000 men, and produced from 4,000 to 5,000 tons per annum, worth £9 per ton; the Glenpatrick slate quarry in co. Waterford, employed 120 men, and produced from 2,500 to 3,000 tons per annum, worth £1 10s. per ton; the Cairne lead mine in co. Wexford was about to be cleared of water by a steam-engine; the Lugganure lead mine in co. Wicklow, employed from 150 to 300 men, and produced from 1,200 to 3,600 tons per annum, worth £15 per ton; the Kilcrohane copper mine near Cahir-civeen in co. Kerry, employed 20 men; the Hollyford copper mine near Cappaghowite in co. Tipperary, employed 20 men; the Ballysinode copper mine near Cappaghowite in co. Tipperary, employed 20 men; and Annetstown lead mine near Tramore in co. Waterford, employed 16 men.

All the preceding were worked by the Mining Company of Ireland; and the following were worked by other parties:—Moneypoint quarry, within 4 miles of Kilrush, on a cliff overhanging the Shannon, in co. Clare, produces a fine, hard, close-grained, gritty flag, varying from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 4 inches in thickness, and containing from 10 to 20 superficial feet, and it yielded about 60,000 yards per annum, worth £2,250 at the quarry; the Clounderlough quarry, at Clounderlough bay, Lough Derg, co. Clare, produces a fine Bourdella marble, and was open only for specimens; the lead mines near Ennis, co. Clare, were of unascertained condition; the Rock-farm limestone quarries, situated on Little Island, opposite to West Passage, and thence a mile along the verge of the Cork river in co. Cork, annually produced 12,000 tons of manufactured, and 44,000 tons of rough limestone, the former worth 13s. per ton, and the latter worth 1s. 4d.; the Irish dove marble and limestone quarries at Carrigacrum near Cloyne, in co. Cork, produced 2,000 tons and upwards per annum, the value of which depended on the mode of manufacture; the Allihies copper mine, near Castletown-Berehaven, in co. Cork, produced from 6,000 to 7,000 tons per annum, worth £9 per ton; the Audley copper mine, near Skibbereen, in co. Cork, was of unascertained condition; the Dromagh collieries, near Kanturk, co. Cork, were of unascertained condition; the lead mines near Newtown-Ardes, in co. Down, were of unascertained condition; the black marble quarry, situated chiefly on the estate of Sir Valentine Blake, on the verge of Lough Corrib, in co. Galway, produced about 1,000 tons per annum, worth from £7 to £8 per ton at London and New York; the quarry of very fine sienna and dove marble at Shannon Harbour, in co. Galway, was of unascertained condition; the Valentia quarry, on the Island of Valentia, co. Kerry, yields roofing slate and flagging—the latter stronger, larger, and more handsome than almost any other flagging which even the London market can command,—and annually produced to the value of about £1,800 in flags, and £550 in slates; the Castlecomer, Clough, and Newtown collieries, in co. Kilkenny, annually produced 42,544 tons of coal, and 53,354 tons of culm, the former worth from 15s. to 20s. per ton, and the latter from 4s. to 5s.; the Faroda colliery, in co. Kilkenny, produced 2,500 tons per annum, worth 6s. 8d. per ton; the Callylihan, Wolfhill, Clogrenna, and Carnafea collieries, in co. Kilkenny, produced 16,000 tons per annum, worth 4s. per ton; the Rushes, Dromagh, Tallerton, Ardtegle, and Courleane collieries, in co. Kilkenny, were, for the time, not worked; the Clonmacnoise marble quarry, in King's co., produces a shell-grey marble, variously tinted, and of a sound and useful description, but was of unascertained condition; the Arigna mines, extending over the western side of Lough Allen, in counties Leitrim and Roscommon, produced about 2,340 tons of iron; a quarry near the Askeaton road, about 7 miles from the city of Limerick, produces a fine maroon coloured marble, but had not been worked to any considerable extent; Lyons, Ballysimon, and Guillogue quarries, in the vicinity of the city of Limerick, produce black marble in blocks of any size, but were of unascertained condition; the Dromineer quarry, on the shores of Lough Derg, co. Tipperary, produces a dove-coloured shell marble, in great quantity; the Castlebegs quarry, on the shores of Lough Derg, co. Tipperary, produces a dull black marble, but was of unascertained condition; the Slieveardagh collieries, near Killenaule, in co. Tipperary, annually produced 20,000 tons, worth 10s. per ton; the Dromglass colliery, near Dungannon, in co. Tyrone, was of unascertained condition; the Coal-Island colliery, near Dungannon, in co. Tyrone, was also of unascertained condition; the Ballymurtagh copper mine, near Rathdrum, in co. Wicklow, annually produced from 5,000 to 6,000 tons, worth £4 per ton; the Cronebane and Tyrone copper mines near Rathdrum in co. Wicklow, annually produced from 4,000 to 5,000 tons, worth £4 per ton; the Connoree copper mine near Rathdrum, in co. Wicklow, annually produced from 1,000 to 1,500 tons, worth £5 per ton; the Ballygahan copper mine near Rathdrum, in co. Wicklow, annually produced from 200 to 300 tons, worth £4 per ton; the Glenmalur lead mine near Rathdrum, in co. Wicklow, annually produced from 180 to 200 tons, worth £15 per ton.

BOTANY.

"Ireland," as has justly been observed by a distinguished botanist, "is remarkable among the British Isles for producing, exclusively, certain plants which are otherwise peculiar to the most southern continent of Europe." The strawberry tree—arbutus unedo—so fine an ornament to British shrubberies, but often baffling horticultural care in particular situations in Scotland, grows so profusely among the woods and glens of Killarney and Bantry as to give a tint to the general landscape, and so luxuriantly that a trunk of it has measured $9\frac{1}{2}$ feet in circumference. The Irish Menziesia—Menziesia polyfolia—is another ornamental plant, elsewhere cultivated as an exotic, but indigenous in Ireland. The marsh ledum and the naked stalked yellow poppy—ledum palustre and papaver nudicaule—which, in other parts of the world, are very alpine, or very arctic, were found by Professor Gieseke upon the rocks of Achill Head. Among other Irish plants, which are elsewhere wild only in the warm countries of southern Europe, are the large-flowered butterwort,—pinguicula grandiflora; St. Patrick's cabbage or London pride,—saxifraga umbrosa; the kidney-shaped saxifrage,—saxifraga geum; and the fringed sandwort,—arenaria ciliata. "The Irish gür and the Irish furze, both well known in our gardens, may be considered rather as varieties of the common gür and common furze than a distinct species." To attempt to write here a Flora Hibernica would be absurd; to copy even the best existing Flora would be both piratical and useless; and to attempt to make a selection of such native plants as we might think most interesting, would probably be to raise a wanton war against the tastes of most classes of readers. We shall simply give first a list of plants new to the Irish Flora, and recently discovered in the county of Antrim, next a list of the plants which the officers of the Ordnance Survey esteemed most remarkable in the vicinity of Londonderry, and next a pleasant extract from a popular botanical paper of Sir W. Jackson Hooker.

Calamagrostis lapponica, of the order Gramineæ, was found in July 1836, in a small island in Lough Neagh, and in July 1837, along the shores of that great lake in the vicinity of Antrim. Bromus giganteus, of the order Gramineæ, was found in September 1836, in the limestone rocks near Garron Head. Carex buxbaumii, Buxbaum's carex, of the order Cyperacæ, was found, in 1835, on an islet in Lough Neagh. Silene noctiflora, the night flowering catchfly, of the order Caryophyllæ, was found in September 1837, on the railway cut in the parish of Drumbeg, and again in an old sand-quarry at the cross-roads, about half-a-mile from Lisburn on the way to Lurgan. Elatine hydropiper, the small octandrous waterwort, of the order Elatineæ, was found, in 1836, in the Newry canal, and in September 1837, in the Lagan canal, a little above the first bridge from Lough Neagh. Geranium pratense, the blue meadow cranesbill, of the order Geraniacæ, was found in June 1836, on the limestone rocks of Whitepark, in the parish of Ballintoy. Hieracium cerinthoides, the honey wort-leaved hawkweed, of the order Composite, was found in July 1836, on the rocks of Garron Head and Glenariff. Salix Andersoniana, or green mountain willow, of the order Amentacæ, was found in June 1837, in marshy ground and by the roadside, in the parishes of Kilwaughter and Balloo. Of the order Musci, encalypta alata, fringed extinguisher moss, was found, in 1836-7, on moist and lofty basaltic rocks throughout co. Antrim; and orthotrichum rupicola, rock bristle moss, in June, 1836 on rocks near Donygregor Head, in the vicinity of Ballycastle. Of the order Lichenes, leclidea lurida, occurs in the shady crevices of maritime rocks along the coast of Island-Magee; leclidea pineti, in February 1837, on the scales of Scotch fir bark, round the Dhu Hole in Kilwaughter demesne; stiota crocata, in June 1836, at Fair Head, and near the head of Glenariff; collema plicatile, plaited collema, in September 1837, on a wet clay bank in Collon glen; collema dermatinum, skinny collema, in 1836, on calcareous rocks near Cushendall and Glenarm; collema schraderi, the schraderian collema, in July 1836, on the ground among mosses near Cushendall; and peltidea scutata, the target-fruited peltidea, in November 1836, on rocks among mosses on Sillagh Braes near Larne. Of the order Algæ and division Articulate, asperococcus vermicularis, the worm-like asperococcus, was found in May 1837, growing parasitically on other algæ near Cushendall; laminaria fascia, in May 1836, on the coast near Dunlue castle, and, in 1837, abundantly near Larne; solenia percurra, in 1836, on the shores of Lough Larne; codium adhaerens, in August 1837, creeping over the limestone rocks in Church bay in the island of Rathlin; vaucheria sessilis, the sessile-fruited vaucheria, in February, 1837, in ditches near Brown's bay in Island-Magee; vaucheria geminata, the twin-fruited vaucheria, in February 1837, in ditches near the Curran of Larne. Of the order Algæ and division Confervoideæ, conferva centralis, was found in 1836-7, abounding along the whole coast of Antrim, especially near Carnlough; conferva uncialis, in June 1836, on the limestone rocks near Doneygregor Head; polysiphonia fasciculata, in August 1836, on the limestone rocks in the island of Rathlin; polysiphonia atropurpurea, in the winter of 1837, at Brown's bay near Larne; polysiphonia affinis, in 1836, near Carnlough; callithamnion arachnoideum, among rejectamenta near the foot of the Bann; mougeotia cærulescens, in July 1836, in a boggy pool, adhering to withered stocks of grasses, and on the moor between Trostan mountain and Tievebullagh; tyndaridea bicolor, near the small cascades of most of the mountain torrents of Antrim; scytonema ocellatum, in June 1836, on a boggy bank near Tor Head; lyngbya ferruginea, in July 1837, in muddy pools on the shores of Lough Larne; lyngbya speciosa, in May 1836, attached to small rocks in Carnlough bay; rivularia granulifera, in July 1836, on most rocks and near cascades of the mountain torrents about Cushendall; rivularia calcaria, in July 1836, on the stony bottoms of the mountain rivulets, and particularly of the Glenmakeeran rivulet near Ballycastle; palmella rupestris, in July 1836, on the conglomerate or red sandstone rocks near Red Castle; nostoc sphaericum, in September 1836, on moist rocks, with water trickling over them, in Glenariff; and nostoc cæruleum, in April 1836, in a marshy place, adhering to hypnum scorpioides, near the mouth of the Bush river. Of the order Algæ and division Diatomacæ, fragilaria aurca was found in April 1836, growing parasitically on other algæ near Port Ballintrae; diatoma unipunc- tatum, in August 1837, at the Curran of Larne, growing parasitically on ectocarpus littoralis; diatoma tenue, in September 1836, adhering to stones in the bottom of the rivulet which flows into Carnlough bay; gomphonema geminatum, in June 1836, in the bottoms of most of the shallow rapid running rivulets, covering the stones with a soft cottony mass of filaments, in the vicinity of Ballycastle; gomphonema ampulaceum, in July 1836, in a very shallow sub-alpine streamlet, near the head of Glenariff; schizonema obtusum, in June 1836, on corallines near Ballycastle; schizonema quadripunctatum, in May 1837, growing on zostera marina near the Curran of Larne; schizonema Dilwynii, in August 1836, on the limestone rocks of Rathlin; and schizonema comoides, on all the limestone rocks along the coast of Antrim, especially where they have a slight coating of mud. Of genera not known to grow on the Irish shores or lakes at the time of the publication of Flora Hibernica, desmidiium Swartzii was found in January 1837, in a shallow ditch between Coleraine and Dunluce Castle; achnanthis brevipes, in December 1836, growing on entomomorpha perscursa on the shores of Lough Larne; sympella minor, in 1837, on the bottoms of gently running rivulets near Larne; and sympella cymbiformis, in December 1836, on moist rocks over which water was trickling in Island-Magee.

The plants which the officers of the Ordnance Survey thought most worthy of notice in the large parish of Templemore—the parish which contains the city of Londonderry, and which may be regarded as a fair specimen of a large part of counties Londonderry and Donegal—were, alisma ranunculoides, lesser water plantain, in boggy ground beside the Foyle; sparganium simplex and sparganium natans, unbranched and floating bur-reed, in Ballynernet lake; blysmus rufus, narrow-leaved blysmus, at the side of the Foyle near Brook Hall; rhynchospora alba, white beak rush, in a bog at Culmore Point; iris fetidissima, stinking iris, on banks at Culmore Point; circea lutetiana, common enchanter's nightshade, in bushy places beside the Foyle; utricularia vulgaris and utricularia minor, the greater and the lesser bladderwort, in holes in the race-course bog; pinguicula vulgaris, common butterwort, on moist banks on the side of the Foyle; erythraea centaurium, common centaury, at the side of the Foyle; samolus valeraudi, water pimpernel, at the side of the Foyle; drosera rotundifolia, drosera longifolia, and drosera Anglica, round-leaved, long-leaved, and great sundew, in the bay at Culmore; solanum dulcamara, woody nightshade, on the walls of Londonderry; cenanthe crocata, hemlock water dropwort, abundant at the side of the Foyle from Culmore to Pennyburn; sium latifolium, broad-leaved water parsnip, in a marsh near Culmore Point; rosa tomentosa, downy-leaved rose, in many places; rubus cæsius, dewberry, on the banks of the Foyle above Londonderry; rubus Kochleri, Kochleri's bramble, on the banks of the Foyle above Londonderry; rubus rhamniifolius, buckthorn-leaved bramble; nuphar lutea, and nymphaea alba, yellow water lily, and great white water lily, in Ballynernet lake; galeopsis versicolor, large flowered hemp nettle, in Killea; cnicus pratensis, meadow plume thistle, in meadows in Killea; and ceratophyllum demersum, common hornwort, in a marsh by the side of the Foyle above Londonderry. The more common plants, on the muddy shore from Culmore Point to Londonderry, are eleocharis palustris, creeping spikerush; juncus compressus, round-fruited rush; glaux maritima, sea milkwort; statice armorica, sea gilliflower; cochlearia officinalis, common scurvy grass; cochlearia Anglica, English scurvy-grass; and zostera marina, common grass rack. "Near the bridge of Derry, where the last plant becomes scarce, large patches of sarpos maritimus or salt marsh clubrush occur, which, with the others, spreads to the extremity of the county. Along the dry banks in Termonbacca, the lithospermum officinale, or common gromwell, which is not general in this county, is very abundant, together with a flesh-coloured variety of the convolvulus sepium or common bindweed,—a variety of that genus which does not seem to have been hitherto noticed in Britain, and only in one place in Ireland, viz., the island of Boffin or Inishboffin in the county of Galway." "The old walls of Derry are in many places literally covered with the common parietaria officinalis, or pellitory of the wall: the acer pseudo-platanus, or common plane tree, also grows naturally on them." "The grasses and other plants of which the natural meadows are chiefly composed, are, the agrostis alba, or florin or marsh bent grass; cynosurus cristatus, or crested dog's tail grass; holcus mollis, or soft grass; aira cespitosa, or turfy hair grass; and, in wet ground, the juncus effusus, or soft rush; juncus conglomeratus, or common rush; and juncus acutiflorus, or sharp-flowered jointed rush. The average produce of these meadows is generally rated at 2½ tons the Cunningham acre. The alopecurus pratensis, or meadow fox tail grass, and the bromus mollis, or soft broine grass, are also very common in the neighbourhood of Derry. The mountain pasture is generally poor. The most abundant plant on the top of Sheriffs mountain, (552 feet in height,) is the calluna vulgaris, or ling or common heath. The pasture grasses;—the festuca ovina, or sheep's fescue grass; agrostis vulgaris, or fine bent grass; anthoxanthum odoratum, or sweet-scented vernal grass; and the nardus stricta, or mat grass. The following plants likewise are abundant:—eleocharis cespitosa, or scaly stalked spike rush; and the juncus squarrosus, or heath rush. The productions of Creevagh Hill and of all the mossy ground in that neighbourhood, are similar, with the addition of the melica cœrulea, or purple melic grass on the low ground. In most of the corn fields the sinapis arvensis, or wild mustard, or charlock—generally known by the name of prashack—is very common, and is, in many instances, accompanied by that still more troublesome weed, the chrysanthemum segetum, or corn marigold, known here by the name of guil or guilgowans. The spargula arvensis, or corn spurrey, known here by the name of yare, is also very abundant: of boggy ground lately reclaimed, it often takes almost exclusive possession. In some places, the tall oat-like grass, here known by the name of pearl, the avena elatior, is but too frequent in the corn fields,—as are also the rumex obtusifolius, or broad-leaved dock, and the cnicus arvensis or creeping plume-thistle."

"In the extreme south of England and of Ireland," says Sir William Jackson Hooker, in reference to the botany of the United Kingdom,* "we find many plants incapable of bearing the cold of more northern latitudes. Hence the strawberry tree adorns the woods of Killarney and Bantry with its rich evergreen foliage and its copious redberries, and comes to such perfection that a trunk has been measured of 9½ feet in girth. It is only in our most southern latitudes that we find the large flowered butterwort, pinguicula grandiflora; the beautiful ciliated heath, erica ciliaries; the Cornish heath, erica vagans; the acrid lobelia, lobelia urens; two species of rampion, the roundheaded, phyteuma orbicularis, and the spiked, phyteuma epicata; the graceful little sibthorpia, sibthorpia Europæa; the marsh isnardia, isnardia palustris; the Cornish bladderseed, physaspermum Cornubiense; the least gentianella, exacum filiforme; whorled knotgrass, illecebrum verticellatum; and the purple spurge, euphorbia peplis. The following are among the most striking and ornamental of our native plants, which scarcely reach the middle of the kingdom, and fail below the south of Scotland:—the water soldier, with its curious spear-shaped leaves, stratiotes aloides; the water violet, hottonia palustris; the small maiden hair grass, briza minor; the sweet violet, "that loveliest herald of the spring," viola odorata; several kinds of mullein verbascum; the primrose peerless; narcissus, poeticus and biflorus; the common snakes-head, fritillaria meleagris; the agrostis setacea; the star of Bethlehem, ornithogalum pyrenaicum; the two species of squill, scilla, autumnalis and bidolea; the mountain spider wort, anthericum serotinum; the Solomons seal, convallaria polygonatum; and sweet sedge, acorus calamus; the yellow wort, chlora perfoliata; the mezezeon, daphne mezereum; the flowering rush, butomus umbellatus; the yellow marsh saxifrage, saxifraga hirculus, though this is on the continent a very arctic plant; the clove pink, dianthus caryophyllus, and dianthus prolifer; several catchflies, silene; euphorbias; cistuses; anemones; the traveller's joy, clematis vitalba; the ground pine, ajuga chamæpitys; the wood sedge, tancredum scorodonia; the crested and field cow-wheat, melampyrum cristatum and arvense; some orobanches, the vella annua, draba azoides, and iberis amara; some fumitories, famarcia, solida, aurea, and parviflora; the yellow and crimson vetchlings, lathyrus aphaca and nessolia; the vicia hybrida, lævigata, and Bithynica; hippocrepis comosa; orchis morio, pyramidalis, ustutata, fusca, militaris, tephrosanthos, and hircina; aceras anthropophora; herminium monorchis; all the species of ophrys; epipactis rubra, malaxis kosseli; the beautiful and rare lady's slipper, cypripedium calceolus; the berthwort, aristolochia clematitis; the Roman nettle, urtica pilulifera; the xanthium strumarium, and amaranthus blitum; and mistletoe, viscum album; the sea buckthorn, hippophæ rhamnoides; and white poplar, populus canescens. The country of which these plants are the produce, including, however, the lowlands of Scotland, is distinguished by Mr. Watson as the woody region; which, he elegantly remarks, from one end to the other, is an undulated plain of meadows, pastures, and cultivated fields, separated from each other by hawthorn hedges or stone walls, and thickly interspersed with parks, woods, gardens, towns, and high roads, altogether betokening a climate where man may attain a high state of civilization, and live for ease and pleasure, as well as for laborious occupations. It is the region where flourish the trees and bloom the flowers rendered classic by our poets, and not the less loved by many of us, that their commonness has made them familiar by vernacular names, without the aid of botanical systems or a dead language. It is, par excellence, the land of the daisy and cowslip, the oak and hawthorn, the hazel, copse, and the woodbine; the region of fruits and of flowers, where the trees of the forest unite a graceful beauty with strength and majesty, and where the fresh green sward of the pasture, commingling with the yellow waves of the corn-field, tells us that here at least—

"The cheek of spring Smiles in the kiss of autumn."

"Black swampy moors, such as deface so large a portion of the next, or barren, region, are in this of comparatively rare occurrence and small extent. The downs and chases in spring are covered with the countless blossoms of the golden gorse, or the more gaudy broom, and empurpled with the different kinds of heath during summer and autumn. Little, indeed, as we may regard these shrubs, in Sweden and North Russia the gorse is prized as we prize the myrtles of the South; and our common heaths are unknown over a wide extent of Europe; nor does the whole of America produce a single specimen either of these or any other species of heath. The oak, ash, yew, hornbeam, alders, elms, poplars, and willows, are the principal native trees of this region; the four first gradually yielding to the pine, white birch, and rowan, as we approach the higher portions forming the upland zone. The beech, Spanish chestnut, and sycamore, have been introduced, and the two first now spring up self-sown and readily. A climate in which the heat of summer is rarely excessive, and where rain and clouds are so frequent, is unadapted to the spontaneous growth of fruits; and we accordingly find our native productions poor in the extreme. The wild cherry, crab, bullace, and native pear, are the arborescent fruit trees. The raspberry, strawberry, blackberry, sloe, hazel nut, hip and haw, form a very indifferent catalogue for our shrubbery and herbaceous fruit plants. The cranberry, billberry, and crowberry, with the fruit of the rowan and juniper, common to this and to the barren region, are greatly surpassed by one fruit almost peculiar to the latter, viz., the cloudberry. The changes produced by cultivation, on some of the first mentioned fruits, it is unnecessary to detail. Lastly, the different kinds of gooseberries and currants cultivated in our gardens, are probably derived from species indigenous to Britain, and are very apt to spring up in our woods and hedges from translated seeds."

CLIMATE.

"The worst circumstance of the climate of Ireland," remarks Arthur Young, "is the constant moisture without rain. Wet a piece of leather, and lay it in a room where there is neither sun nor fire, and it will not, in summer even, be dry in a month. I have known gentlemen in Ireland deny their climate being moister than England; but if they have eyes, let them open them, and see the verdure that clothes their rocks, and compare it with ours in England, where rocky soils are of russet brown, however sweet the food for sheep. Does not their island lie more exposed to the great Atlantic? and does not the west wind blow three-fourths of the year? If there were another island still more to the westward, would not the climate of Ireland be improved?" This opinion, so confidently expressed, was obviously formed upon exceedingly defective grounds; it exhibits just enough of truth to impose upon limited and hasty observers; and, while unhappily a fair specimen of the belief or rather prejudice which prevails among Englishmen respecting the climate of Ireland, it unfortunately cannot, as yet, nor perhaps for years to come, receive a perfectly detailed and final confutation. The observations necessary to a precise knowledge of the climate are totally wanting in some of the districts where they are most needed, and singularly defective in the aggregate of places where they have actually been made; yet, if candidly estimated according to their real value, and treated with comprehensive reference to all the peculiar physical circumstances of Ireland, they will scarcely fail to prove that Ireland as a whole is not inferior in climate to Great Britain as a whole,—that its rainiest and most drizzling and most tempestuous districts have their counterparts in large territories of Scotland, and even in some parts of South Britain,—and that its best and by far its most extensive districts exhibit at least a balance of amenities with those of England, possessing some which England wants, as truly as wanting some which England possesses. To compare western Ireland with eastern England, as Arthur Young appears to have unconsciously done, brings out scarcely a different result from comparing Ireland with itself; for the variations of moisture, temperature, and other elements of climate between west and east, or between congeries of upland and expansion of plain, or between the exposed coast and the sheltered interior, or between the screened valley and the open morass, or between a "golden vale" and a chaos of bogs, or between any one of five scores of districts and any one of another five scores, are aggregately as wide and as full of character as any one of the majority of contrasts which persons with Mr. Young's prejudices have fancied or observed between the supposed average of the climate of Ireland and that of the sunny eastern low countries of England. Whenever a just comparison between Ireland as a whole and England as a whole can be formed, it will probably exhibit Ireland as more equable in temperature than England, freer from smart winters and prolonged frosts, less subject to violent thunderstorms, less swept and withered with keen easterly winds, freer from both exsiccating droughts and deluging falls of rain, and richer in whatever amenities are productive of great luxuriance; but more subject to fogs and drizzling rains, more overhung by cheerless and dew-compelling clouds, more tried with fitful, sudden, and frequent changes of weather, and oftener scourged with squally and tempestuous winds. Yet, what the officers of the Ordnance Survey remark with reference to Londonderry, is strongly applicable to the whole country: "To estimate with accuracy the presumed variations of this climate, long continued and carefully conducted observations would be necessary. In defect of such, it may be mentioned that the farmers believe and assert, that a marked amelioration has taken place,—the times of seeding and harvest being both considerably advanced. In support of this opinion may be adduced the extending and successful cultivation of wheat, and the increased number of quails, a bird now comparatively abundant. However, though the circumstance of a recent improvement in this respect may be probable, it would be rash to pronounce it, on the present evidence, permanent."

The aggregate fall of rain among the western mountains, and on the low grounds between them and the sea, is believed to be very great compared to that of central and eastern England, but has not been sufficiently ascertained, to warrant any definite statement as to its amount. The fall at Dublin is said to vary from about 20 to 31 inches; at Belfast, from 20 to 35 inches; at Cork, from 30 to 54½ inches; and at Londonderry, from 26 to 35 inches. But as this current statement—hitherto regarded as the most correct one—makes the mean annual fall at the last of these places to be 31 inches,—a result recently ascertained to be 3½ inches below the fact,—we obviously must regard all past observations as in the aggregate exceedingly uncertain, or as at best establishing the mere general circumstance of very wide variations in humidity between different places, and even at the same place in different years.

The mean quantity of rain falling in the under-mentioned localities, exhibits Dublin as the driest, and Cork as the wettest, locality in which the observations were made:

	Observer.	Quantity.	Average of years.
DUBLIN,	Apjohn	30.87	6
BELFAST,	Portlock	34.96	6
CASTLECOMER,	Aber	37.80	18
CORK,	Smith	40.20	6
DERRY,	Sampson	31.12	7

Dr. Kane is of opinion, that we may safely estimate the average quantity of rain which falls over the entire surface of Ireland at 36 inches; and the entire mass precipitated every year at 100,712,631,640 cubic yards. At Dublin, the months in the order or degrees of dryness, are June, February, April, March, May, October, January, September, August, November, July, December; and at Belfast, they are June, March, April, February, May, November, October, August, December, January, September, July.

The mean temperature in the city of Londonderry is 49° of Fahrenheit, in the centre of Ireland 50°, and in the south nearly 52°. Dr. Rutty states the mean temperature in Dublin, during the five years ending in 1800, at 50° 15'; and Mr. Hamilton states the mean temperature of the north coast at 48°, of the middle part of the east coast at 49° 4', of the middle part of the west coast at 48° 6', and of the south coast in the vicinity of Cork at 51° 2'. The highest observed heat at Londonderry is 81°, at Belfast 76° 80', at Kilkenny 79°, at Limerick 75°, and at Dublin 81° 50'; and the lowest observed heat at Londonderry is 21°, at Belfast 25°, at Kilkenny 29°, at Limerick 28°, and at Dublin 14° 50'. The heat of the seasons in London as compared with their heat in Dublin, is estimated as follows by Dr. Robinson:—

	LONDON.	DUBLIN.
Winter,	1.00	1.45
Spring,	3.00	2.14
Summer,	5.00	4.68
Autumn,	5.00	3.80
	12.00	12.07

Yet other parts of Ireland, particularly the counties of Kilkenny, Limerick, Tipperary, and Cork, are nearly as superior in equality of temperature to Dublin, as Dublin is superior to London. "This county," says Mr. Townsend respecting Cork, "is remarkable for the mildness of its temperature, never experiencing those extremes of heat and cold to which the same degree of latitude is subject, not only on the Continent, but even in England. The difference is occasioned by our nearer approximation to the Atlantic Ocean, which loads this part of the island with vapours; seldom, indeed, to be complained of in winter, but too often interrupting the maturer rays of the summer sun." So strongly has the prevailing equality of temperature drawn medical attention, that one place in particular—the Cove of Cork—has of late years become extensively known to fame as a valuable winter retreat for persons menaced with pulmonary complaints.

During a period of 40 years, around Dublin, the east-north-east and south-east winds were to the west, south-west, and north-west, as 3 to 4 in spring, as 2.7 to 5.2 in summer, as 1.8 to 4.8 in autumn, and 2.3 to 4 in winter. "It appears from a regular diary of the weather kept for several years in Cork," says Dr. Smith, "that the winds in that city blow from the south to the north-west, three-fourths of the year at least." During 7 years ending in 1801, the winds at Londonderry blew from the north 225 days, from the north-east 225, from the east 200, from the south-east 376, from the south 297, from the south-west 476, from the west 766, and from the north-west 539; but during 9 years at the same place—according to the memoir of the Ordnance Survey—the ratio of the winds was, north 295, south 398, east 283, west 1,005, north-west 737, north-east 265, south-west 599, and south-east 454. In a general view for the whole kingdom, south-west winds prevail in winter; west winds in summer and autumn; and east, north-east, south-east, and north winds in spring. The range of the barometer at Cork is 1.9, at Limerick and Londonderry 2, at Dublin 2.3, and at Belfast 2.5. On an average of 12 years, the medium number of fine days in a year is 126.

"With respect," says MacCulloch, "to the influence of the climate of Ireland upon the vegetable and animal kingdoms, little need be said, inasmuch as the existing state of both is manifestly owing more to circumstances foreign to the climate itself. All the productions of the soil usually cultivated in England may be raised in Ireland, although the irregularity of the seasons in the latter renders the produce more uncertain; while the greater humidity of the air is, as already stated, unfavourable to the ripening of corn, particularly of wheat. Much, indeed, of the corn of Ireland could not be preserved, unless it were kiln dried. The remarkable deficiency of forest trees is, however, owing infinitely more to circumstances connected with the political state of the country, than to differences of climate; several forests which existed when Boate wrote his account of Ireland have since disappeared; not in consequence of any deterioration of the climate, but of the wasteful abusive treatment to which they have been subjected.—The mildness and moisture of the climate is such, that the pasture lands, particularly those resting on a limestone bottom, are always more or less verdant. Even the mountains of Kerry, Cork, and Tipperary, are usually grazed throughout the year. In the southern counties, the cattle are seldom, and in some places never, housed during the winter. The eulogy of Giraldus Cambrensis on the climate of Ireland, is more applicable at the present time than when he wrote:—'Terra terrarum temperatissima, nec Cancris calor exæstians compellit ad umbras, nec ad fœcos Capricorni rigor invitat, aeris amenitate temperieque tempora fere cuncta tepescunt.' The climate, as respects the human constitution, is upon the whole highly salubrious. With the slight exception already made, it can hardly be said to be materially less so than the climates of Scotland and England. The greater prevalence of fevers and dysentery in Ireland, although partly attributable to the humidity of the atmosphere, in connection with marsh exhalations, is mainly owing to other causes; more especially to very poor and often unwholesome diet, to famine, to imperfect clothing, to sleeping on the earthen floors of the cabins, to neglect of personal and domestic cleanliness, and to various circumstances which associate themselves with the oppression, ignorance, and bigotry to which the lowest classes are subjected, and with the imperfect civilization to which they have as yet, in many places, attained. The very remarkable differences in moral constitutions, in temperament, and even in physical conformation, among the natives of the kingdoms, and especially between those of Ireland and Great Britain, cannot be explained by any appreciable differences of the climate or soil; they must, therefore, be referred, and are clearly, indeed, attributable, to other sources."

SOILS.

The soils of Ireland, as compared with those of England and Scotland, are nearly uniform throughout the kingdom. The varieties of them, indeed, are sufficiently numerous; but, with few exceptions, they all belong to one class or genus. Clay soils, in the sense of strong, stubborn, tenacious, retentive clays, such as those of Oxfordshire, High Suffolk, and some parts of Essex, Surrey, and other English counties, do not exist in Ireland. Soils of aluminous mixture, indeed, are not uncommon, and they even possess enough of tenacity to be locally designated stiff soils; but they are highly friable compared to strictly clay soils, and cannot with propriety be designated by a stronger epithet than argillaceous. Sandy soils similar to those of Low Suffolk and of Godalming in Surrey,—chalky soils similar to those which abound in Surrey, Hampshire, Sussex, Wiltshire, and some other English counties,—ferruginous gravelly soils similar to those of some parts of Middlesex,—and uncoloured gravelly soils similar to the "sharp" gravels and "hungry" moulds of many parts of Scotland, are seldom or never met with in Ireland. The greatly predominant soil, in all districts of the country except the moorish and the marshy, or such as exhibit carpetings or deep beds of bog in superincumbence on the natural soil, is a fertile loam with a rocky substratum, extensively rich and friable, partly stiffish and inclined to clay, and partly shallow, rocky, and fit chiefly to be disposed in luxuriant pasture. The prevailing loams are comparatively light; and are fertile, not only on account of their component parts, but because they rest on a calcareous subsoil, and are mixed with limestone rubble. The argillaceous loams are in some places, especially in the county of Tyrone, so strong as to be a good material for bricks. The shallow rocky loams prevail in the north of Clare, in most of Roscommon, and in parts of Galway, Mayo, Limerick, and other counties; they throw out a luxuriant herbage, remarkable for its sweetness, and its excellent adaptation to pasturage; and they so singularly combine fertility with firmness, that bullocks of 100 or 105 stones weight may be seen rapidly fattening upon them in places where, even in the wettest season, the sward would not receive the print of a horse's foot. A dark, friable, dry, sandy loam prevails in part of the counties of Limerick and Tipperary, of a kind equally adapted to grazing and tillage, seldom experiencing a season too wet or a summer too dry, and so rich that, if it be preserved in a clean state, it will yield good cereal crops for a considerable succession of years. The aggregate of fertile loams, or even of all kinds of calcareous soils, is not great in the mountainous sections of Ulster; yet they carpet and enrich a very great proportion of the valley ground, and produce an astonishing alternation of contrasts to the ferruginous, moorish, sterile soils, on the intersecting uplands. "In the north," says Mr. Wakefield, "the quantity of rich soil is not very considerable, yet valleys of extraordinary rich land are to be found in every county; and I was not a little astonished, amidst the rocky and dreary mountains of Donegal, where there was hardly a vestige of cultivation, to find myself drop all at once into a district where the soil was exceedingly fertile." The loams of much of the county of Meath and of many other districts are so conspicuously fertile as to resist, to a very great degree, the malign effects of very prolonged and exceedingly erroneous systems of clumsy cultivation. A very rich soil of great depth and rather peculiar character prevails in the low grounds adjacent to the Fergus and the Lower Shannon, and locally bears the name of corcass land; it seems evidently to have been formed by fluviatile deposit; it closely resembles the celebrated carse lands in the valleys of the Forth and the Tay in Scotland, but is not so adhesive or so powerfully argillaceous; and it has a subsoil of blue silt, differing nothing in substantial character from the upper soil, and capable of being advantageously turned up, to any depth and at any time, by the plough or the spade.

"In Ireland," says Mr. Wakefield, "there is not much land sufficiently light, though abundance of it is luxuriant enough, to be what is known in England under the name of 'turnip lands.' A vein of it, however, may be seen partly in Tipperary, and partly in the King's county, west of Roscrea, where I found turnips universally growing, though the soil is much inferior to that of our best turnip land. In many of the mountains I have observed that the calcareous soil does not extend to the top, though the summits of some produce rich clover. It is found also in patches on the mountains. Such spots afford great room for improvement. One of the most remarkable divisions of soil is that formed by the Barrow. To the west of that river limestone is met with in abundance, while it is nowhere to be found throughout the counties of Wexford and Wicklow. The best limestone in Ireland is obtained in the neighbourhood of Carlow, at least such is the general opinion; but it is not improbable that if some of the marbles were analyzed, they would prove to be not in the least inferior to it. On the other hand, in the county of Waterford, there is no limestone east of the Blackwater; so that there is a border of country extending from Dublin, through Wicklow, Wexford, and Waterford, entirely without it. Land, with a calcareous substratum, is by no means adapted in all cases to tillage; and Mr. Tighe's remarks on this subject in regard to Kilkenny, may be applied to Ireland. 'The ground that skirts the western bank of the Nore below Kilkenny,' says this sagacious observer, 'is of a poor quality, consisting of a hungry clay loam, lying immediately over a bed of limestone. In general, the nearer the limestone comes to the surface the poorer the soil; but this bank of the river, as well as the opposite, seems admirably calculated by nature to form the best kind of sheep walks; where they are permitted, they produce close and green herbage, are extremely dry, and tend by nature to produce white clover and wild burnet, but give miserable crops of corn.' Independently of the caucasses [corcasses], the richest soil in Ireland is to be found in the counties of Tipperary, Limerick, Roscommon, Longford, and Meath. In Longford there is a farm called Granard-Kill which produced eight crops of potatoes without manure. Some parts of the county of Cork are uncommonly fertile, and, upon the whole, Ireland may be considered as affording land of an excellent quality, though I am by no means prepared to go the length of many writers, who assert that it is decidedly, acre per acre, richer than England." But though the aggregate allodial wealth of Ireland is seriously depreciated by the country's great extent of waste bog, moorish uplands, and irreclaimable mountain, the cultivated land must unquestionably be regarded, and seems to be so even by Mr. Wakefield himself, as aggregately far superior, in its own substance, to that of England, and even as scarcely less productive in spite of its enormous amount of maltreatment. All the loams or calcareous soils seem to be indestructible; so that, when let alone after the most frightful scourging and utter exhaustion, they speedily recover tone, and clothe themselves with the finest herbage. "The exuberant fertility of the soil of Ireland," says Mr. Curwen, "enables the husbandman to proceed in a manner which, if pursued in England, would long ago have made that garden a desert. A century ago, Swift complained of the ruinous custom of overcropping: in later times, it has been carried to an extent far exceeding the practice of his days; and though still persisted in, there is no deficiency of produce."

The bogs of Ireland have already, as to extent, distribution, and reclamation, been considered in a separate section; and they need to be glanced at here only in reference to their surface. The mountain bogs are almost all dry heaths, shallow, peaty, easy of reclamation, but seldom capable of being converted into good or even tolerable arable land. The floating bogs are aggregately of small extent, but are not a little curious, as well as dangerous: a quantity of water lies in a body between the turbary and the gravel, which keeps the turbary in a buoyant state, and contributes to the growth of the fungus substance; and when the turf cutter incautiously approaches the bottom of a turf hole, the water frequently bursts up through a close covering of two or three feet, and exposes him to imminent danger. The red bogs occupy by far the greater part of the morassy low grounds of the kingdom; they abound in sedgy grass and heath bog-myrtle; they are generally of very considerable depth,—or from 12 to 45 feet; and they consist of successive strata, descending from a coat of musci, ericæ, and coaræ graminæ at the surface, through a series of decreasingly spongy and fibrous formations, to a bed of compact, comminuted, indurated, pitchy-looking paste, immediately incumbent on clay or limestone gravel. “Boate, in his Natural History of Ireland, divides the bogs, strictly so called, into four sorts: First, the grassy bogs, in which the surface is covered with some kind of herbage; hence they are very deceitful and dangerous to travellers. Some of these, in particular the great bog in the county of Kerry, dry up during the summer, so that cattle may graze upon them. But the deepest grassy bogs are impassable in the summer, as well as in the winter. There are, however, at all times, firm places in them, by means of which those who are well acquainted with them may pass over. 2. Watery and miry bogs, which contain grass covered, however, with water and mire. 3. Hassocky bogs, or shallow lakes, overspread with little tufts or islets consisting of reeds, rushes, coarse grass, and sometimes small shrubs. As the roots of these are closely interwoven, and sometimes rest on ground rising to the surface of the bog, these bogs may be passed over. Most of them are found in Queen’s and King’s counties. 4. The peat moors.”

AGRICULTURE.

“The tenure of landed property in Ireland differs, in one respect, very considerably from that by which land is held in England; for, with but two exceptions, there are no manorial rights in Ireland. The income of estates varies very much—from the lowest value to upwards of £100,000 per annum. There are several estates of upwards of 50,000 acres. It was formerly a common practice, to grant leases for ever, or for 999 years, or renewable for lives on a payment of a certain fine. Hence the property of very extensive estates at present, is vested in those who receive very little rent from them. In Ireland landlords never erect buildings on their estates, nor expend any thing in repairs; and the leases, in general, contain very few clauses. Six months credit is generally given on the rents, which renders the tenant very dependent on the landlord. In many leases the tenant is bound, besides paying his rent, to labour for his landlord at an inferior rate of wages. The system of what are called ‘middle men,’ prevails very much in Ireland: these are persons who rent land from the proprietors, and let them again to the real occupiers. Sometimes there are several renters between the landlord and the occupier; and the latter is answerable, not only for the rent to the person under whom he directly holds, but also for the rent due by each renter to the person above him, and by the first renter to the proprietor. This system arises from the poverty of the Irish farmers in general; but it evidently not only proceeds from poverty, but tends to increase it. The leases commonly granted, are 61 years and lives—31 years and lives—31 years—21 years and lives—and 21 years. In some counties, according to Mr. Wakefield, the green, or cultivated acres, average from £2 10s. to £3 8s.; the latter is the case with the pasture land of Limerick, whereas the green acres in Mayo and Fermanagh do not average above £1 5s., or £1 7s. 1d. Irish money per Irish acre. In some parts of Ireland the value of estates is at 30 years’ purchase; in general it does not exceed 20; and in some places it is not more than 16 or 18.”

The state of tillage husbandry, as detailed in the very voluminous Agricultural Reports of the Royal Dublin Society, was so minutely examined by Mr. Wakefield, and so carefully tested by him in a detailed course of personal observation, that an epitome of his statement of it, even in spite of changes which have since occurred, cannot fail to be interesting. In order to give a clear idea of it, he divides the country into nine districts, all distinct from one another in aggregate agricultural character. “In the first district he comprehends the flat parts of Antrim, the eastern side of Tyrone, Down, Armagh, Monaghan, and Cavan. In this district the farms are extremely small; in consequence of which, the land is generally dug with the spade. Potatoes, flax, and oats, are the crops commonly cultivated; and these are grown till the land is exhausted, when it is recruited by the cow, the goats, two or three sheep, and the poultry lying upon it for some years. The ploughs used in this district are of the most rude and imperfect structure, and do their work in the most slovenly manner. When a plough is used, three or four neighbours unite their strength, each bringing his horse, or his bullock, or his milch cow. Most ploughs are attended by a person, whose employment it is to turn back the furrow, which would otherwise revert to its bed. All the other operations of agriculture are performed in this district in the same rude manner. The little wheat that is raised in it, is 'lashed;' that is, the grain is knocked out by striking the sheaf across a beam placed above a cloth; it is, however, afterwards thrashed with a flail. In this district, as well as in the greater part of Ireland, the corn is thrashed on the highways, and is dressed by letting it fall from a kind of sieve, which, during a pretty strong wind, is held by a woman as high from the ground as her arms can reach. Under the second district, Mr. Wakefield comprises the northern part of Antrim, Londonderry, the north and west of Tyrone, and the whole of Donegal. Tillage here is in a much worse state than in the first district. There is no clover; and, with the exception of a little near Derry, no wheat. The third district comprehends the northern part of Fermanagh. Here the farms are much larger than in either of the former districts, the agriculture better, and the crops more productive. Some wheat is grown, but oats are the most prevalent crop. A small portion of the land, however, is only employed in tillage. The fourth district comprises Sligo, Mayo, Galway, Clare, and parts of Roscommon and Longford. In some parts of this district the spade culture is generally pursued; but in other parts the land is cultivated with the plough, drawn by four horses a-breast. In Roscommon, the practice of yoking horses to the plough by the tail is still followed, at least with two-year-old colts in the spring. Oats are chiefly raised in this district; but along the sea-coast of Sligo considerable quantities of barley are grown. A large portion of this district is let on partnership-leases, according to the village system. In the fifth district, which comprehends Limerick, Kerry, the south-west and northern parts of Cork, and part of the county of Waterford, little corn is grown, with the exception of the southern part of Cork. In the sixth district, which takes in the remainder of Cork, most of the land is in pasture; and, where it is in tillage, the spade is generally used. The seventh district comprehends some parts of Tipperary, and King's and Queen's counties. Here a great deal of corn is grown; and the agriculture is good, in comparison with that which is pursued in any of the preceding districts. More attention is paid to a systematic course of cropping, and keeping the land in good heart. Oxen and horses are used for the plough. In some parts turnips are grown, but they are seldom hoed. Ninety acres are considered a large tillage farm. The eighth district comprises Wexford, and a part of Wicklow. In some parts of this district beans are cultivated; but they are sown broadcast, and never hoed. Even here, their mode of ploughing is very awkward. One man holds the plough, another leads the horses, and a third presses on the beam, to keep it down. The last district comprehends the northern part of Kilkenny, Kildare, and the cultivated parts of Westmeath, Meath, and Lowth. Wheat enters into the common course of crops; but the fallows are bad. Clover has been introduced, but it is sown in exhausted land. The farms are much larger here than in any other parts of the country. The ploughs are very badly constructed, and are drawn by six oxen and horses." The following Table, given by Mr. Wakefield, exhibits, according to him, the average produce of the nine districts:—

to indicate them as they at present exist in the several counties. In Donegal, estates are very large; farms average from 5 to 40 acres in the low grounds, and from 40 to 500 in the upland districts; the practices of husbandry are exceedingly bad; the chief instruments of tillage are the spade and the loy; the crops are potatoes everywhere, oats and flax largely, and barley and wheat very rarely and limitedly; and the medium rent of land, per acre, is so exceedingly low as about 6s. In Tyrone, the tillage farms are small, and usually held under partnership leases; the mountain farms are large, and seldom much divided; the state of husbandry on the partnership farms is intolerably bad; the chief instruments of tillage are the spade and the plough, the latter often drawn by horse, bullock, and cow all in one team; the principal crops are potatoes and oats; and the average rent of land per acre is 14s. 6d. In Londonderry, by far the larger portion of the land is held from the London Companies, under either terminable or interminable leases; the farms, though in many instances consolidated during the last 30 years, still, in the great majority of instances, average not more than 12 or 14 acres; the practices of husbandry have been improved, but have not yet attained to a respectable condition, and in some districts are very bad; the chief crops are potatoes, oats, and flax; and the average rent of land per acre is 12s. 2½d. In Antrim, estates are in general very large; farms, except in the mountainous districts, are small; the practices of husbandry are much improved, but need further amelioration; both improved practices, and the implements used in them, have been partially repressed by the smallness of farms; the crops are prominently potatoes, oats, flax, and limitedly barley and wheat; and the average rent of land per acre is 16s. In Down, some estates are large, but very many are small; farms held by linen weavers average about 4 acres, and those held by persons who devote themselves exclusively to agriculture, average from 20 to 50 acres; many improvements in husbandry have been made during the last 20 years, but, as in Antrim, they are much impeded by the minute subdivision of land; the chief crops are long successions of corn, interrupted and relieved by potatoes, flax, and pease; and the average rent of land per acre is 16s. In Armagh, a large proportion of the land belongs to corporations and to church and college establishments, a few estates are large, and small estates are numerous; the farms are very small, those above 40 or 50 acres being esteemed very large, and occurring principally in the district of the Fews mountains; the practices of husbandry are greatly improved, and include Mr. Blacker's celebrated system of green crops and stall feeding; the chief crops are potatoes, oats, flax, and, to a large extent, wheat; and the average rent of land per acre is 11s. 6½d. In Monaghan, a few estates are large, and very many are small; farms are very small; the practices of husbandry are very low; the spade is more used than the plough; the principal crops are oats, potatoes, and flax; and the average rent of land per acre is 13s. 3½d. In Fermanagh, most of the estates are large; the farms are of all sizes; the practices of husbandry are more advanced in the north than anywhere else in Ulster, but still need much improvement in the south; the principal crops are oats, barley, wheat, flax, and potatoes; and the average rent of land per acre is 12s. 3d. In Cavan, the estates, with the exception of two large ones, are of moderate size; the farms average from 6 to 8 acres; the practices of husbandry are in the most wretched state imaginable; the chief crops are potatoes, oats, flax, barley, and a little wheat; and the average price of land per acre is 13s. 7½d. In Leitrim, estates are very large; tillage farms do not exceed from 5 to 10 acres, and, in many instances, are let in partnerships; the practices of husbandry are very low, but have begun to improve; the chief crops are potatoes, oats, and flax; and the average rent of land per acre is 10s. 7½d. In Sligo, a few estates are somewhat large, but many are comparatively very small; farms and husbandry are similar to those in Leitrim; tillage has of late years exceedingly extended; and the average rent of land is 10s. 8d. In Roscommon, estates are very large; tillage farms, in general, are very small; the general system of agriculture, excepting in lands held by wealthy individuals, remains in a very imperfect state; the chief crops are oats, potatoes, and wheat; and the average rent of land per acre is 13s. In Mayo, the estates are excessively large; very many of the farms are let on the partnership system; con-acre is rapidly increasing, and threatens to overrun all the pasture-land of the county; the practices of husbandry are aggregately miserable; the principal crops are potatoes and oats; and the average rent of land per acre is 8s. 6d. In Galway, several of the estates are very large; tillage farms are, in general, very small, but grazing and mixed farms are of all sizes, and are, in very numerous instances, held on the partnership system; the practices of husbandry are, for the most part, wretched; the chief instruments of tillage are the loy, the spade, and the old provincial plough drawn by 4 or more horses, and managed by two or three men; the principal crops are oats, potatoes, and some barley and wheat; and the average rent of land per acre is 12s. 1d. In Clare, estates are large; tillage farms are generally small; partnership tenures are on the decrease; the practices of husbandry have not undergone much improvement; the loy is in general use throughout the upland districts; the chief crops are oats, potatoes, barley, and wheat; and the average rent of land per acre is 11s. 3d. In Kerry, the estates are very large; some grazing and dairy farms are of considerable size, but tillage farms are very small; the practices of husbandry are in a wretched condition; tillage is effected on the upland districts with the loy or the spade; potatoes are nearly the only produce reserved for the use of the cultivators, and frequent and severe scarcities occur in the south and west; and the average rent of land per acre is 6s. 1d. In Limerick, the estates are large; some grazing farms are very extensive; tillage is not so extensive in proportion to the whole area as in many other counties, but has of late very much increased; the land experiences the severest treatment, yet with amazing rapidity recovers its tone and productiveness; the principal crops are oats, wheat, and barley; and the average rent of land per acre is 18s. 8d. In Cork, most of the estates are very extensive; tillage farms are in general very small, and, when comparatively large, are held in partnerships; the practices of husbandry in most districts are bad, but in some are improved and good; potatoes are the chief crop among the small and the partnership farmers; much tillage is effected with the spade, and much with the plough by a species of combination; and the average rent of land per acre is 13s. 7d. In Tipperary, some estates are very large, and many are of a moderate size; tillage farms are in general small, and held under middlemen; the ruinous system of con-acre is extensively prevalent, and occasions great prominence in cropping to potatoes; and the average rent of land per acre is, in con-acre, from £7 to £13, and in farms 17s. 8½d. In Waterford, the estates are very large; farms have been increasingly divided, and tillage has very greatly extended; the practices of husbandry have been materially improved; and the average rent of land is 12s. 6d. In Kilkenny, the estates are large; the farms are of various sizes, but for the most part small; the practices of husbandry have been materially improved, but are still backward; partnership tenures are not infrequent; and the average rent of land per acre is 17s. In Wexford, the estates are of considerable extent; the farms are of various sizes, and are less subdivided than in most other counties; the practices of husbandry are backward in some districts, and improved in others; the principal crops are potatoes, oats, barley, beans, and wheat; and the average rent of land per acre is 14s. In Carlow, the estates are of medium extent; some dairy farms are very large, and farms in general are less subdivided than in most other counties; and the average rent of land per acre is 15s. In Wicklow, the estates are for the most part large; the farms are of various sizes; the condition of the small farmers is exceedingly bad; very little wheat is raised; and the average rent of land per acre is 12s. In Kildare, some estates are very large, but many are moderate or small; most of the farms vary in extent from 5 to 200 acres; the practices of husbandry were formerly very bad, but have been materially improved; the principal crops are potatoes, oats, and wheat; and the average rent of land per acre is 13s. In Queen's county the estates are in general large; many of the farms are very small, and are held by persons too poor to adopt any improved practices in husbandry; the larger farmers have for a number of years practised a comparatively improved system of agriculture; and the average rent of land per acre is 14s. In King's county, the estates in general are very large; tillage farms are small, but some grazing ones are extensive; partnership tenures are less infrequent than in some other counties; the tillage farmers are aggregately in a very poor condition; and the average rent of land per acre is 12s. In Westmeath, the estates are moderate in extent; the tillage farms are much subdivided; the practices of husbandry are considerably improved; and the average rent of land per acre is 13s. In Longford, the estates are rather large; the tillage farms are in general small; grazing is prevalent; and the average rent of land per acre is 12s. 3d. In Meath, some estates are large, but most are moderate or small; grazing was formerly prevalent, but now about three-fifths of the county are in tillage; the state of agriculture, especially as compared with the singular excellence of the soil, is shamefully bad; cropping with corn to exhaustion is not unfrequent, but the usual rotation is wheat, oats, fallow, potatoes, and clover; and the average rent of land per acre is 18s. In Dublin, the estates are in general small; the farms near the city are small, but those at a distance are larger; agriculture is very much less improved than the vicinity of the whole district to the metropolis would induce a stranger to expect; and the average rent of land per acre is 18s. In Louth, the estates are of moderate extent; the farms are of all sizes, but many are very small; husbandry is improved; the principal crops are wheat, oats, and potatoes; and the average rent of land per acre is 16s.

Though estates throughout Ireland are, on the average, larger than in England, farms of all kinds, but especially those which are entirely arable, are very much smaller. Farms of considerable size seem, in all modern periods, to have existed in every part of the kingdom, particularly in the north; but ever since the close of the American war, they have been rapidly increasing in number, and dwindling down to littleness in extent. "Farms," says Mr. Newenham, "appear to have been diminishing in Ireland for many years past. Large farms of from 500 to 1,500 and 2,000 acres once so common in Ireland, hold actually no sort of proportion to farms of from 10 to 30 or 40 acres. In the county of Down, Mr. Dubordien says that farms run from 20 to 40, 50, and in some instances so far as 100 acres. Such is the case in most other parts of Ireland. For several years past, the landlords of that country have been much in the habit of letting their lands in small divisions. Another custom has become extremely prevalent,—that of taking considerable tracts of mountain, bogs, or other waste land, enclosing, improving them, and letting them in small farms of from 20 to 30 acres. Besides this, the cottier system, or giving a certain quantity of land as an equivalent for wages, prevails throughout most parts of Ireland. In fact, upwards of four-fifths of the Irish people are subsisted chiefly on the produce of the land which they occupy.* The following table, compiled by Lord Clements, shows the average size of farms, and the relative extent of tillage and pasturage in the thirty-one baronies which were minutely examined by the Commissioners of the Poor Enquiry, as a fair specimen of the entire agricultural condition of the kingdom:—

Exclusive of holdings of less extent than one acre, the total number of farms in Ireland in 1841, was, in the rural districts, 685,309, and in the civic districts 5,693.* Those in the rural districts consisted of 306,915 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 251,128 of from 5 to 15 acres, 78,954 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 48,312 of upwards of 30 acres; and those in the civic districts consisted of 3,521 of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,671 of from 5 to 15 acres, 388 of from 15 to 30 acres, and 313 of upwards of 30 acres.

* By "civic districts," as distinguished from "rural districts," in any statements taken from the Census of 1841, is meant all areas of towns which contained in that year 2,000 or upwards of inhabitants.

In 1812, when Mr. Wakefield wrote, wheat was grown in considerable quantities in the counties of Kilkenny, Carlow, Dublin, Meath, Louth, and parts of Limerick, Tipperary, Clare, Cork, and Londonderry; but was quite or nearly unknown in the counties of Monaghan, Tyrone, Donegal, Sligo, Mayo, Leitrim, and Cavan. But since 1815, it has been more extensively cultivated than before in the previous wheat districts, and freely introduced into various districts where it was formerly unknown. It is generally grown after potatoes or fallow, and receives less attention while growing than in England. In consequence either of the wetness of the season or of bad harvesting, it usually needs to be kiln-dried; and, in consequence probably of the badness of the seed, it yields from 10 to 15 per cent. less of saccharine matter than English wheat.—Barley is by no means generally cultivated; it is, when sown at all, usually sown after potatoes; and it is so greatly inferior to English barley as to yield 20 per cent. less of saccharine matter.—Bere or bigg is grown in the counties of Meath, Kildare, Westmeath, and Longford, and in the cut-out bogs of Ulster.—Oats are far more extensively cultivated than all other cereal crops combined; they were supposed, 30 years ago, to occupy ten times more ground every year than any other species of corn; they are believed, in consequence of defective husbandry and the moistness of the climate, to be the most profitable crop to the farmer; and, amidst the general extension of tillage, they have not only maintained but increased the proportion which they formerly bore to other grains. The potato oats have been generally introduced to the low districts, but have at times so extensively failed, in Waterford and other counties, as to have very considerably lost favour; and, in consequence, black oats both retain their original hold upon the upland districts, and have resumed possession of many low grounds whence they were expelled. Oats are sown after wheat, barley, potatoes, and flax, and often year after year till they reduce the land to exhaustion. Irish oats are inferior to English in both weight and quality.—Potatoes are so very prominent a crop as to have mainly contributed to impress on the social and economical character of Ireland its singularly anomalous features. They are celebrated—we probably ought rather to say, they are notorious—for their great exuberance, their enormous quantities, their universal cultivation, their forming the very staff of life to a prodigious proportion of the population, and, of late years, their precariousness of culture and very extensive and disastrous failures. They are planted on all kinds of soil; they are raised partially in drills in the east, but generally in lazy beds in the south, the centre, the west, and the north-west; they are usually cultivated with as much care as other crops are with carelessness; they are raised with studious attention to prolific varieties, but with surpassingly little regard to either farina, saccharinity, or flavour; and they hence consist, to an enormous proportion, of a watery and nauseous variety called the lumper, and a variety but a degree or two less unpleasant called the cup. The miserable con-acre system, which has a menacing prevalence over Connaught, and a large prominence in Munster, and too extensive an existence in even the other two provinces, devotes itself exclusively to the cultivation of potatoes, at, in general, so exorbitant rents as to seem to a person unacquainted with Ireland quite incredible. The produce on good land usually amounts to from 17,000 to 21,000 pounds. “The potato,” remarks Mr. Bicheno, “is the only produce the cottier reserves to himself. All the rest—cattle, corn, butter, pigs, poultry, and eggs—go to the landlord. As long as the potato lasts, he and his family have abundance. They thrive under it, and, with plenty of ventilation, enjoy good health, and have the cleanest skins in the world. But if the crop fail, or the season should prove unfavourable for preserving it, the months of April and May are trying seasons; then it is they are driven to subsist upon weeds, fevers spread, and the utmost distress prevails.”—Flax, at the time when Mr. Wakefield wrote, was cultivated in every county of Ireland except Wicklow and Wexford, and formed a very prominent crop in particular throughout almost every district of Ulster. In consequence chiefly of the withdrawal of the bounties, its cultivation subsequently declined, and eventually seemed waning to extinction; but since 1831, it has increased with amazing rapidity, particularly in the counties of Antrim, Down, and Londonderry; and now it seems again to have received a sufficient check to warrant the verdict of its being in decidedly fluctuating demand. Flax, when cultivated, follows potatoes, oats, and barley; and the ground for it is usually prepared with the spade. The cultivation of hemp was at one time pretty extensive on the rich lands of the county of Limerick; but it was afterwards abandoned. In 1810, according to Mr. Wakefield’s calculation, the aggregate area under flax was 100,000 acres; and in 1808, according to returns made to the Linen Board, the area under hemp was only 323 acres.—The turnip husbandry, and the cultivation of the artificial grasses, are now appreciated and practised by a fair proportion of proprietors and very extensive farmers; and a peculiarly economical and profitable system of green cropping and stall feeding is well understood in part of the county of Armagh; but, in a general view, or as regards the great body of the cultivators of the soil in every part of Ireland, the state of all other crops than corn, potatoes, and flax, is but slightly improved, and in many districts not one jot improved, since the date of the Agricultural

Reports and Mr. Wakefield's 'Account of Ireland.' The following vidimus of it, as it existed at that date, therefore, is unhappily still too correct: "Beans are cultivated nowhere except in parts of the county of Wexford. Rape is grown for seed in King's and Queen's counties, and in some parts of Tipperary. Of the indigenous grasses of Ireland, it does not seem necessary to specify any except the forin grass, or agrostis stolonifera, which has been lately very highly extolled by Dr. Richardson. Its merits, however, are not nearly so great as he represents them; and indeed, the only situation for which it is adapted is sea-walls, where its roots run and bind them together. Considering the very imperfect and backward nature of Irish husbandry, it is not to be expected that laying down land to grass is well understood. In fact, this is seldom done with seeds; but in most places the ground is suffered to clothe itself with its natural herbage. Soon after grass is cut for hay, it is formed by the hand into what are called 'lap-cocks,' each of which is as much as a woman can twist round her arms like a muff; these, being laid on the ground in the direction of the wind which blows through them, are soon dried, and are then put into a 'tramp-cock.' In this state it becomes heated, and its quality is further injured by the heated hay being put into ricks, so that the quality of by far the greater part of Irish hay is very indifferent. From the account of the arable husbandry of the different districts, it has already been seen that very little clover is cultivated. In the west and south-west it is scarcely known; and, according to Mr. Newenham, there are not 5,000 acres in the whole island; where it is cultivated, it is sown on exhausted and foul land."

Though approved implements, similar to those used in Scotland and England, have been extensively introduced, the original ones, or such as were not long ago universal in the country, are still in sufficiently extensive use, especially in the west and the south, to require a brief notice. The Irish plough is made chiefly of wood, and has a very long beam and no swillyard; the breast is also of wood, and has seldom any ground; and the share has hardly any wing. That used in Wexford, however, has a comparatively short beam, and a cast-iron sock. "The flail is seldom heavier than a schoolboy's whip. The spade is much narrower than the English spade; the handle generally five feet long: the handle of the shovel is still larger, it is sometimes rounded, sometimes pointed, and often square at the end. The loy, which is much used in Ireland, is a long narrow spade, which projects entirely on the right side of the handle; its breadth is that of the foot. The slane is a double loy, used in cutting turf. The sliding cars have no wheels; the ends of the shafts are shod with iron, with a wicker basket suspended between them. Cars are small carts, having the wheel fixed to the axle-tree, which turns round along with it. The wheel is not spoked, but solid. The cars are difficult to be turned."

The dairy, though far from being in a perfect condition, is probably the best managed department of Irish husbandry; and it is of great territorial extent, and much economical importance. Most of the counties of Kerry, Cork, and Waterford, part of the counties of Kilkenny, Carlow, Meath, Westmeath, Longford, and Fermanagh, and multitudes of the small farms of the counties of Cavan, Monaghan, and Down, are devoted principally to the dairy,—or rather to the manufacture of butter. The method of letting dairies to dairymen at so much per cow per annum, is common to the south of Ireland with Dorsetshire, Devonshire, and other counties of the west of England. The average number of cows on a dairy farm is from 5 to 30; the extent of middle-rate land esteemed necessary for the sustenance of each cow is about two acres; the average daily produce of a cow's milk is 8 quarts in summer and 5 in winter; and the average weekly produce of this in butter is 14 pounds. The fattening of calves for veal is little practised.—The grazing husbandry is not, as in England, united with the tillage husbandry; nor, as in Scotland, are large tracts of land devoted exclusively to the breeding of cattle. The mountains of Ireland, instead of being grazed by those who farm them, are frequently let on a partnership lease to the inhabitants of a neighbouring village, each of whom turns in a certain number of cattle, horses, goats, or geese, according to the rent he pays. The few cattle that are fed on the mountainous districts are generally very poor. The most extensive and valuable lands for fattening cattle are small parts of the counties of Louth and Kildare, considerable parts of the counties of Cork, Westmeath, and Queen's county, and especially the corcesses of the counties of Limerick and Clare, and 'the golden vale' of the counties of Limerick and Tipperary. Vast droves of cattle are bred in the mountainous districts of the west; and horses are bred in the mountains of Mourne. Most of even the loftiest uplands yield a considerable quantity of herbage, and are very much greener, in the aggregate, than the mountains of Scotland; and Mac-Gillicuddy's Reeks, the loftiest group in Ireland, and one of the wildest and most desolate, were affirmed by Arthur Young to be better fattening ground for sheep than even the rich lowlands in their vicinity. The general adaptation of Ireland to grazing is very marked, and cannot, in any view, be computed with by England. Yet, in spite of this adaptation, and of various considerable instances of the recent conversion of tillage grounds into grazing lands, the decrease of pasturage, occasioned by the extension of tillage, has for many years been both steady and rapid.

In 1841, the total number of families in Ireland dependent chiefly on agriculture was 974,183,—of whom 921,576 were in the rural districts of the kingdom, and 52,612 in the civic districts; and the total number of persons who 'ministered to food' was 1,904,071,—of whom 1,643,082 were males at and above 15 years of age, 138,870 were females at and above 15 years of age, 103,549 were males below 15 years of age, and 18,570 were females below 15 years of age. The following table shows the classes of which the latter total consisted, and also throws great incidental light on the relative importance of the country's agriculture:—

A quite recent writer, who has minutely examined the statistics of Ireland, remarks upon this table, as compared with other exhibits of the Census of 1841, that it shows two-thirds of the males and more than one-third of the whole population of Ireland, above the age of 15, to be engaged in producing, preparing, or selling food; and he adds, "If we reflect how sensitively such a population must feel, as producers, any diminution in the price of their chief article of production, we shall see a great cause of the distress that is from time to time suffered. The average price of wheat and oats in Ireland, per barrel and per bushel, calculated upon the return advertised in the Dublin Gazette for the years ending May 1, 1841, 1842, and 1843, was,—wheat, per barrel 32s. 6d. in 1841, 30s. 8d. in 1842, 27s. in 1843; wheat per bushel, 8s. 1½d. in 1841, 7s. 8d. in 1842, 6s. 9d. in 1843; oats per barrel, 13s. 11d. in 1841, 12s. in 1842, 10s. 7d. in 1843; oats per bushel, 3s. 5d. in 1841, 3s. in 1842, 2s. 7d. in 1843. This great reduction in two years of the price of the staples of Irish produce must undoubtedly have affected the country."

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCE.

The annual value of the agricultural produce of Ireland was estimated by the Commissioners of Poor Enquiry at £36,000,000, and by the writer of the chapter on Agriculture in MacCulloch's Statistical Account at £43,809,000,—exclusive, however, of the value of bogs; and it seems to be pronounced by nearly all parties to be only one-half, and by some to be only one-fifth, of what the soil is capable of yielding. The annual earnings of agricultural labourers, including farmers who worked their own land, were estimated in 1836 at £6,844,500. The progress of tillage throughout the country is shown by the following tabular statement of the quantities of grain, pulse, and malt exported from Ireland into Great Britain during each year of the period 1800-41:—

The recent general increase of the produce of the soil, indirect as well as direct, or inclusive of its connection with grazing, malting, the dairy, and the provision trade, appears from the following comparative table of exports from Ireland to England in the years 1825 and 1835:—

Ballinasloe has for a long period been the great mart for the sale of Irish sheep and black cattle; so that the two following tables of sales and prices there, strongly illustrate the condition of the grazing produce of the country:—

The exports from Ireland to Liverpool in 1826, included 57,395 black cattle, 62,819 sheep, 73,912 pigs, 338,218 cwt. of bacon and hams, and 143,725 barrels of beef and pork; and, in 1830, they included 169,892 black cattle, 1,566 calves, 252,057 sheep, 28,351 lambs, 390,561 pigs, 5,674 horses, and 434 mules. The following table affords a comparative view of the quantity of live stock and of agricultural produce exported from Ireland :—

The provision trade of Ireland was, at one period, confined chiefly to Cork, but is now, in all its departments, very extensive also at Dublin, Belfast, Newry, and Limerick, and in the department of butter is diffused over the greater part of the kingdom. Pork hams, in enormous quantity and of excellent quality, are prepared at Belfast; bacon and hams are salted, in large quantities, at Belfast, Waterford, Clonmel, and Limerick; beef is cured, on a great scale, and assorted into three classes called planters', India, and common beef, at Limerick and Cork; and the provision trade in general—increasingly subject, however, to a preference in England for the importation of the living animal rather than the prepared carcass—is very extensive in Dublin, Drogheda, Dundalk, Newry, Londonderry, Wexford, New Ross, Waterford, Clonmel, Cork, and Limerick. The official returns ceased, in 1825, to give separate details for Ireland; yet the following table, exhibiting the quantities of exported salted meat and butter every fourth year from the Legislative Union till that date, flings considerable light on the general progress of the provision trade :—

The following are the Irish ports from which the butter was exported during each of the twenty years ending on the 5th January, 1826, viz. :—

Note.—The quantities exported from the Ports of Ireland, individually, in the last two years, cannot be ascertained, as the exportations to Great Britain, since 1850, have been excluded from the returns rendered from Irish ports to the inspector general's department.

WOODS.

Ireland was, at one time, very extensively clothed with forests. "According to Boate, on the authority of Geraldus Cambrensis, who came into Ireland, on its first conquest, in company with Henry II., this country was full of woods on every side; but the English, on gaining possession of it, cut them down, partly in order to deprive the banditti of their lurking places, and partly to gain the greater scope of profitable lands. Another cause operated, which operates in all countries—the desire to obtain wood for fuel. Forests, however, were still numerous in those parts especially over which the English had not acquired a perfect and tranquil power; but after the quelling of the great rebellion in the time of Elizabeth, the forests were still more reduced in extent and number. The same motives which operated with the conquerors on their first invasion, operated now. Besides, the prospect of gain for the sale of the timber was a further inducement. Immense ship loads were sent to foreign parts; and whereas, before this period, there was not a single charcoal manufactory, on the subduing of the rebellion, a great number on a very extensive scale were erected. All these causes, however, though operating probably with a progressive effect, had not denuded Ireland entirely of forests in the middle of the 17th century, the period when Boate published his Natural History of that country. He complains, indeed, that great part of Ireland was very bare of woods in his time; and that, in some places, you might travel whole days long without seeing any wood or trees, except a few about gentlemen's houses; and, particularly, instances the route from Dublin, as far as Dromore, by Dundalk and Newry, being above 60 miles, in some parts whereof you shall not see so much as one tree in many miles; and adds, that the 'great woods, which the maps do represent to us upon the mountains between Dundalk and Newry, are quite vanished.' Notwithstanding these complaints, there were, in the time of this author, large forests, which no longer exist. In Leinster he states, that the counties of Wicklow, and King and Queen's counties, were throughout full of woods, some many miles long and broad; and that part of the counties of Wexford and Carlow were greatly furnished with them. In Ulster, there were, in his time, great forests in the county of Donegal, and in the north part of Tyrone; likewise in Fermanagh, along Lake Erne, in Antrim, and in the north part of Down. The greatest part of the latter county, however, as well as Armagh, Monaghan, and Cavan, which, in the war with Tyrone, were encumbered with great and thick forests, were, in the time of Dr Boate, almost everywhere bare. With respect to Munster, he represents the counties of Kerry and Tipperary as possessing sundry great forests, notwithstanding the English, especially the Earl of Cork, had made great havoc with the woods. In Connaught he states, that there were very few forests, except in the counties of Mayo and Sligo."

In 1841, the total superficial extent of woods in Ireland was 487,558 acres; and of this total 374,482 acres were trees in clumps, groves, and forests, and 18,092,038 trees, equivalent to 113,076 acres, were detached trees in hedge-rows, in pleasure-grounds, and in other situations. The total number of acres, in clumps, groves, and forests, of oak was 29,536, of ash 6,042, of elm 1,417, of beech 3,274, of fir 25,239, of mixed trees 280,096, and of orchards 28,878. The total number of detached oak trees was 661,622, of ash trees 4,459,464, of elm trees 599,802, of beech trees 1,325,380, of fir trees 2,430,950, of mixed trees 8,073,451, and of orchard trees 241,369. Of the oak trees in clumps, groves, and forests, 22,784 acres were planted previous to 1791, 1,493 from 1791 to 1800, 1,327 from 1801 to 1810, 1,393 from 1811 to 1820, 1,342 from 1821 to 1831, and 1,197 from 1831 to 1840; of the ash trees, 2,677 acres were planted previous to 1791, 927 from 1791 to 1800, 689 from 1801 to 1810, 679 from 1811 to 1820, 442 from 1821 to 1830, and 628 from 1831 to 1840; of the elm trees, 479 were planted previous to 1791, 135 from 1791 to 1800, 134 from 1801 to 1810, 131 from 1811 to 1820, 141 from 1821 to 1831, and 380 from 1831 to 1840; of the beech trees, 931 were planted previous to 1791, 384 from 1791 to 1800, 342 from 1801 to 1810, 279 from 1811 to 1820, 730 from 1821 to 1830, and 600 from 1831 to 1840; of the fir trees, 1,612 acres were planted previous to 1791, 1,243 from 1791 to 1800, 2,691 from 1801 to 1810, 5,496 from 1811 to 1820, 7,684 from 1821 to 1830, and 6,513 from 1831 to 1840; of the mixed trees, 76,587 acres were planted previous to 1791, 22,399 from 1791 to 1800, 31,087 from 1801 to 1810, 42,878 from 1811 to 1820, 51,456 from 1821 to 1830, and 51,456 from 1831 to 1840; and of the orchard trees, 7,136 acres were planted previous to 1791, 2,736 from 1791 to 1800, 3,824 from 1801 to 1810, 4,925 from 1811 to 1820, 5,952 from 1821 to 1830, and 4,305 from 1831 to 1840.

LIVE STOCK.

The upland breed of Irish black cattle abound in Kerry, in Mayo, and generally in the mountainous districts of the kingdom; they are small, wild, and hardy, not well shaped, and covered with long coarse hair; they are in some districts black, and in others brindled; and, when removed to a better soil and climate than those of their native mountains, they fatten as rapidly as the black cattle of Wales and of the Scottish Highlands. The long-horned or lowland breed of Irish black cattle abound in the counties of Meath, Westmeath, Limerick, Tipperary, and Roscommon, and generally in the low and level grazing districts of the kingdom; they are much larger and heavier than the upland breed; they are usually coarse and ill shaped; and they have very long curved horns, with in general an inward curvature. Very numerous flocks throughout the country consist of crosses between the native breeds and English bulls; some flocks consist of the short-horned breed or improved Teeswater, the Holderness, the Staffordshire, and the Devonshire breeds, or crosses between these and others; and the dairy stocks consist variously of these breeds, of the Ayrshire, of the Irish upland, and of the Irish lowland, but chiefly of the two latter.—The native Irish horse seldom stands higher than 15 hands, is very hardy and sure-footed, and is a very useful animal, particularly as a hack. A large, long, blood horse, is much reared in Meath, and is to be found in most of the rich grazing counties.—The native Irish sheep are small, and have nearly as much hair as wool; but they have long ceased to be common. The sheep which now prevail are a very mixed breed, crossed with different kinds of English sheep; they are of the polled, long-woolled kind; in the great breeding counties, they are very large; and in many parts of the kingdom, they are kept only for their wool,—and even this, in multitudes of instances, only for strictly domestic use. A breed of fine-woolled sheep, peculiar to the mountains of Wicklow, exhibit the only traces of a distinct race of short-woolled sheep in the island.—The Irish breed of swine are long-legged, lank, thin-sided, long-backed, haggard, ungainly animals, not easily fattened, and altogether very unprofitable; and they still exist in very large numbers in the west, south-west, and centre of the kingdom, but have, in most other districts and partially in even these, been much improved by crosses with English breeds. Pigs are kept by very nearly all the peasantry; and they are fattened principally with potatoes, and afterwards sold for the purpose of paying rent. "The cow, the pig, the goat, the turkeys, of which large numbers are raised," says Mr. Bicheno, "are as much a part of an Irish cottier's family as the children."—Goats are kept in most parts of the country, either wandering at large on mountainous grounds, or tethered to the tops of knolls and banks in the low countries.—Poultry are very numerous on grounds of every character, on farms and holdings of all sizes, and amongst people of all classes and in all districts. The county of Wexford is celebrated for crammed fowls; and there is a fair at Ballyheague in that county, expressly for the sale of all kinds of poultry. Turkeys are everywhere numerous; and, being admitted to the warm cabins of the peasantry, they generally thrive.—Rabbit-warrens are not numerous; but some of them, as at the east side of the river Bann and on the peninsula of Fannat, are very large.

In 1841, the live stock of the rural districts of Ireland consisted of 552,569 horses and mules, worth, at £8 each, £4,420,552; 90,315 asses, worth, at £1 each, £90,315; 1,840,025 black cattle, worth, at £6 10s. each, £11,960,158; 2,091,199 sheep, worth, at £1 2s. each, £2,300,317; 1,353,101 pigs, worth, at £1 5s. each, £1,691,373; and 8,334,427 poultry, worth, at 6d. each, £208,353;—and the live stock of the civic districts consisted of 23,546 horses and mules, worth £188,368; 2,050 asses, worth £2,050; 23,091 black cattle, worth £150,092; 14,990 sheep, worth £16,489; 59,712 pigs, worth £74,639; and 124,090 poultry, worth £3,102. The total estimated value of live stock in the rural and in the civic districts, was thus respectively £20,671,068, and £434,740. The distribution of the kinds of live stock among the holdings and farms of various sizes, exhibits, in the rural districts, on holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 31,117 horses and mules, 23,999 asses, 90,659 black cattle, 120,281 sheep, 295,048 pigs, and 1,987,294 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 81,141 horses and mules, 34,201 asses, 265,252 cattle, 234,561 sheep, 251,687 pigs, and 1,796,395 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 175,868 horses and mules, 18,845 asses, 508,499 cattle, 401,304 sheep, 350,825 pigs, and 2,302,607 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 112,143 horses and mules, 5,334 asses, 329,298 cattle, 293,970 sheep, 215,340 pigs, and 1,143,811 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 152,300 horses and mules, 7,936 asses, 646,317 cattle, 1,041,083 sheep, 240,301 pigs, and 1,104,323 poultry;—and the distribution of live stock in the civic districts exhibits, on holdings not exceeding 1 acre, 18,027 horses and mules, 1,824 asses, 11,398 cattle, 2,849 sheep, 53,774 pigs, and 100,412 poultry; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,929 horses and mules, 117 asses, 3,169 cattle, 569 sheep, 2,669 pigs, and 10,379 poultry; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 1,859 horses and mules, 80 asses, 3,073 cattle, 1,034 sheep, 1,717 pigs, and 7,870 poultry; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 648 horses and mules, 19 asses, 1,730 cattle, 826 sheep, 633 pigs, and 2,604 poultry; and on farms of upwards of 30 acres, 843 horses and mules, 10 asses, 3,726 cattle, 9,692 sheep, 692 pigs, and 2,825 poultry. "The too great number of horses on small farms," say the Commissioners of the Census, "has long been the subject of remark. From the table it will be seen, that in farms between five and fifteen acres, there are nearly as many horses as farms, especially in Leinster, of which the most remarkable instance is the county of Wexford, where they exceed the number of farms. In other provinces they are not so disproportionately numerous. But on the whole country, they are not less than two to every three farms. In the larger farms they, of course, grow more numerous, and in those above thirty acres average more than three to each. It is, however, necessary to observe, that the numbers in the table include all horses, whether employed as auxiliaries to production, or to luxury—a very important distinction, but one we deemed it would have been impossible to establish under the circumstances existing at the period of our inquiries. In the rural districts, however, the number of such cannot be so large as to disturb the proportion to any great extent. The cattle appear about two to each farm, between 5 and 15 acres, and increase to an average of thirteen to each farm above thirty acres. Sheep, as may be supposed, vary considerably in the small farms; they generally appear two to each, but on the larger farms the numbers vary from 5 to 58 to each farm. The average in Ulster is 5. In Galway it is far above the average, having 82 to each farm. Pigs are on the whole less numerous than might have been expected. There is nearly one to every farm in the smallest class. They rise to five to each of the largest class. Poultry do not, as is commonly supposed, preponderate in the smaller. They increase in the different classes of farms from five to each, in the lowest, up to 8, 15, and 22 to each in the highest. Asses are most numerous in the larger farms. In those under 30 acres they are one to every 10 farms. In those from 5 to 15 acres, about one to 15 farms, and in those above 30 acres, one to every 5 farms. The proportion of each description of stock on the several classes of farms is shown by the annexed table. We abstain from comments which would lead us beyond our subject, but the agriculturalist will not fail to find material for reflection, and an ample field for improvement in many of the facts here classified:—

LANDED PROPERTY.

Frequent and most extensive forfeitures of land, at various periods down to the settlement at the Revolution, arose out of the resistance which the Irish made to the power of the English. A few proprietors, particularly in Connaught, hold their estates by original title to the soil; but all others hold under grants made in the times of Henry VII., of Elizabeth, of Cromwell, and of William III. Upwards of one-half of the province of Ulster became vested in the Crown by the attainder of John O'Neill and his associates in the reign of Elizabeth, and was bestowed upon English lords in such a manner as seemed most likely to secure the English power in Ireland; and the enormous property of the last Earl of Desmond, in the south and west of the kingdom, was all forfeited by his rebellion, and offered in portions or estates to settlers at so low a price as twopence per acre. Upwards of 500,000 acres in the six northern counties became vested in the Crown at the flight of the Earl of Tyrone; and, as abuses had arisen from the too great extent of grants on former occasions, the lands, at this time, were disposed of in smaller portions, and much of them to the Corporation of London and other parties who were esteemed least likely to alienate the influence of them from the Crown. On occasion of the vastly extensive forfeitures in the wars of Cromwell, Connaught was reserved for the Irish, enormous tracts were appropriated to the discharge of the arrears due to the English army, and the counties of Dublin, Kildare, Carlow, and Cork, were disposed of according to the pleasure of parliament. At the Restoration, the act of settlement, and the subsequent bill of explanation, were passed for the purpose of regulating and assorting the grants. Upwards of one million of acres, estimated in value at upwards of £200,000 a-year, were forfeited at the Revolution; but, in terms of the articles of Limerick and Galway, part of them were restored.

In 1727, Mr. Brown computed the gross rental of Ireland, exclusive of quit-rents, tithes, &c., at £2,824,000; in 1778, Mr. Young estimated it at £6,000,000; and, in 1812, Mr. Wakefield computed it to be £17,228,540 Irish. In 1827, Cesar Moreau, Esq., published, in his elaborate but very scarce Statistical Account of Ireland, the following "attempt to estimate the public and private property of Ireland, and the result of much consideration, after consulting the ablest writers on political economy, and the latest authorities that bear upon the subject:—"

Productive private property,	£467,660,000
Unproductive do.,	87,000,000

Public arsenals, castles, forts, and all other places of defence, with the artillery stores, &c., thereto belonging,	4,000,000
Total public property,	£9,000,000

An elaborate estimate framed by Mr. Griffith, based principally on official valuations, and published in 1832 in his evidence on the Second Report of the Lords Committee on Tithes, exhibits the average rent of Ireland, exclusive of houses in Dublin, Cork, Belfast, Limerick, and other large towns, at 12s. 5½d. per statute acre, and states the total landed rental of Leinster at £3,472,450, of Munster at £3,801,540, of Ulster at £3,205,318, of Connaught at £2,236,170, and of Ireland at £12,715,478. This estimate, though seemingly about at least £1,000,000 below the fact, is that which was followed in our statements of the average rental of land in the several counties; and it exhibits the average rent per acre throughout Leinster at 14s. 7½d., throughout Munster at 13s. 0½d., throughout Ulster at 12s. 3½d., throughout Connaught at 10s. 9½d., and throughout Ireland at 12s. 9d.—The annual value of land, in each county and in the whole kingdom, as shown by the valuator for the poor rate, and also the proportions of land fit and unfit for cultivation, are shown in the following table; but the total of acres as exhibited in columns 3, 4, and 5, is only 19,441,944, while that exhibited in the preceding column is 20,806,271—a discrepancy which is accounted for by the circumstance, that the one statement is taken from a paper read to the House of Commons in July, 1840, and the other from the Census of 1841:—

The valuation of the counties taken under the Act of 6 and 7 Wm. IV., cap. 84, and completed as yet in 18 counties only, at an expense of £97,456, or 5s. 3½d. per acre, gives a series of totals, not differing much from those of the Poor-Law Valuation. The acreage in the Valuation Return differs from that of the Census Report, which is taken from the Ordnance Survey.

On pages 8 and 9 of a work in the course of publication [1844] by George Lewis Smyth, that writer, with the facts of the Poor-Law Valuation before him, and on the assumption of its being "understood to stand at between £13,000,000 and £14,000,000," attempts to show that the present annual rental of the whole country is about £21,394,675, and that, by the "easy process" of reclaiming waste lands, and quite irrespective of improved husbandry upon the lands already in cultivation, it might in a few years be augmented by the sum of £5,000,000.

MANUFACTURES.

In their Second Report published in 1838, the Railway Commissioners, after giving a summary view of the Linen and the Woollen manufactures of Ireland, make the following general remarks upon Irish productive industry:—"Besides these, it can scarcely be said that there is any other manufacture in Ireland conducted on so great a scale as to be of so much national importance. Under the now exploded system of bounties and protecting duties, several manufactories sprang up; but not being the natural growth of circumstances favourable to their establishment, most of them gradually disappeared as soon as the undue encouragement, which had created and stimulated them, was withdrawn. Still there are to be found, in every district, establishments of various kinds conducted in the most creditable manner; but they do not exist to such an extent as to claim especial notice in a general view of the employment of the people. If it were necessary to show that there is no inaptitude among the population for manufactures, for such even as require the greatest ingenuity, neatness, and skill, we would select the damask of Lisburn and the tabinets of Dublin. The worked muslins produced in many parts of Ireland, and very often from the poorest cabins, rival those of France, and are sold at half the price; embroidery on silks and satins is also carried to great perfection, and schools have been established in many places for the instruction of the female peasantry in this beautiful art. But while the manufactures which were formed under the system of bounties have been sinking into decay, the various processes to which agricultural produce is subjected have been gradually extended and improved. Grinding, malting, brewing, and distilling have made great progress within these few years. Until lately, the mills of Bristol and Liverpool enjoyed almost the exclusive advantage of converting the Irish wheat into flour. That process is now performed in Ireland. The construction of water-wheels and other machinery has been much improved, and the use of them under favourable circumstances has greatly increased; but there are few large mills in which steam is not united with water power, in order that the supply may be constant and regular during the summer as well as the winter months,—a proof of a better system of trading and of more enlarged means. The malting was one of the first in which improvement became manifest; and this has gradually led to greater perfection in the quality of the beer produced. Great breweries have been established in Dublin and Cork. Irish porter is now largely exported to England; and the Dublin bottled porter successfully rivals the London porter, even in London itself. The quality of Irish produce has also considerably improved. Irish butter, Irish pork, and Irish beef bring greater prices in the English market than they did some few years ago; while the quantity produced and exported has much increased. The districts in which these improvements are most manifest are those of Cork, Waterford, Limerick, and Belfast. From north to south, indications of progressive improvement are everywhere visible, and most so in places which are accessible to the immediate influence of steam navigation; but these signs of growing prosperity are unhappily not so discernible in the condition of the labouring people as in the amount of the produce of their labour."

The following table of "occupations," prepared by the Census Commissioners of 1841, and constituting a digest of the whole of their personal statistics of productive industry throughout the kingdom, has closer connection with manufactures than with any other category, and throws so much light, by all its parts, on either their absolute or their relative amount, that it may well be exhibited entire.

Though the extensive sole use of water-power in mills and factories, and the considerable mixture of that power with the power of steam, prevent the number of steam-engines from being a tolerable index to the manufacturing condition of the kingdom, yet an increase in the number of steam engines seems a decided indication of the quantity of increase in manufactures. We, therefore, subjoin, on the authority of an appendix to the Second Report of the Railway Commissioners, published in 1838, a statement of the date, number, and aggregate power of the steam-engines which then existed; and we need only premise that, though a few were employed for pumping at collieries and in other situations, the vast majority were employed in direct subordination to milling and manufacture, that the number has since very materially increased, and that the domestic manufacture of steam-engines, particularly at Dublin, has for a number of years been extensive. "In Belfast and its neighbourhood, there were erected in 1806, one steam-engine of 20 horse-power—in 1810 two—1812 one—1817 one—1824 one—1825 three—1826 two—1827 one—1830 one—1832 two—1833 four—1834 three—1835 eight—1836 four—1837 five—1838 eleven. Total, 50; horse-power, 1,274. In Clonmel and Suirville: In 1829 one—1834 one—1837 one. Total, 3; horse-power, 65. In Cork: In 1815 two—1817 two—1818 one—1820 three—1823 one—1824 one—1825 two—1826 one—1828 two—1830 three—1835 one—1837 one—and from 1810 to 1834 eight for foundries. Total, 28; horse-power, 412. In Dublin: In 1811 one—1812 one—1813 one—1815 one—1816 two—1817 two—1824 one—1825 one—1826 one—1827 one—1828 two—1829 one—1831 one—1832 one—1833 three—1834 two—1835 one—1836 two—1837 two—1838 one. Total, 29; horse-power, 438. In Galway: In 1832 one—1834 one—1835 one—1836 one. Total, 4; horse-power, 46. In Kilkenny: In 1816 one—1827 one—1832 two—1833 one—1838 two. Total, 7; horse-power, 164. In Limerick: In 1818 four—1822 one—1828 one—1830 one—1832 one—1834 one—1836 two—1838 one. Total, 12; horse-power, 206. In Londonderry: In 1815 one—1825 one—1834 one—1835 one—1836 two—1837 one—1838 one. Total, 8; horse-power, 116. In Portlaw: Three engines of 300 horse-power, for cotton-factories. In Waterford: In 1817 one—1823 one—1825 one—1828 one—1832 one—1834 one—1835 one. Total, 7; horse-power, 90."

The following extract from the Report of the Inspector of Factories in Ireland and Scotland, for the quarter ending on September 30, 1841, shows the number and sites of Irish factories employing persons under 18 years of age:—"The factories inspected were situated at and in the neighbourhood of Belfast, at Lisburne, at Springfield, Whitehouse, White Abbey, Carrickfergus, Ballynure, Wolfmill, Ligoniel, Balmore, Brockfield, Springfield (2), and Raceview, in the county of Antrim; at Londonderry and Buncrana, in the county of Londonderry; at Zion, near Strabane, in the county of Tyrone; at Gifford, Hazlebank, Seapatrik, Killileagh, Castlewells, Grove, Beirsbridge, and Bangor, in the county of Down; at Darkley, in the county of Armagh; at Laragh and Cherryvale, in the county of Monaghan; at Drogheda, in the county of Louth; at Navad, in the county of Meath; at Balbriggan, Drumcondra, Blancherstown, Chapelizod, Hibernia, Blue Bell, Greenmount, Ely, Bathmines, Milltown, Ballyboden, Kilternan, and Haarlem, in the county of Dublin; at Celbridge, Inchiquire, and Newtown, in the county of Kildare; at Stratford and Tuckmill, in the county of Wicklow; at Mountmellick, Newmills, Barkmill, Fruit Lawn, and Mountrath, in the Queen's county; at Hillsbro', near Roscrea, in the county of Tipperary; at Glanmire, Blarney, Grenagh, and Bandon, in the county of Cork; at Mayfield, in the county of Waterford; and at Clahamon, in the county of Wexford." The following table shows the number of factories and persons employed in 1835 and 1839:—

The articles on the province of Ulster, the town of Belfast, and the cities of Kilkenny and Limerick, contain such notices of respectively the linen, the cotton, the woollen, and the lace manufactures, as to render any lengthened or very detailed statements in this place unnecessary. The number of yards of linen exported from Ireland in various years from 1800 to 1825 was as follows:—

	To Great Britain.	To Foreign parts.	Total.
1800	No separate returns.	35,676,906
1801	34,622,896	3,288,704	37,911,602

1825	25,560,926	2,553,589	55,114,515

The total value of unbleached linen cloth publicly sold in the markets of each of the four provinces in the years 1821, 1822, 1823, and 1824—irrespective, however, of sales made by private contract—was as follows:—

Since 1825, when the commercial intercourse between Ireland and Great Britain was placed on the footing of a coasting trade, no means exist of ascertaining with exactness the extent of the linen manufacture; yet evidence of the most satisfactory kind can be furnished of its having very materially improved in both quantity and quality. "Great and important changes," says a gentleman of the highest authority on the subject, "have resulted from the abandonment of the system of bounties on exports, from the improvement in machinery, and from the application of more extended capital; all of which have, however, tended to expel the smaller manufacturers, dealers, and bleachers, and to diminish profits; but they have secured to the consumer a more perfect and regularly-manufactured fabric, and at a vastly cheaper rate; and they have enabled us to see more clearly our capabilities of carrying on the manufacture in competition with the linen manufactures of the Continent. The result of the whole is satisfactory. We are now certain that we can manufacture almost every description of linen, except lace and fine cambric, as cheap and as well, perhaps cheaper and better, than any other country. The improvements in bleaching, also, having been placed on a more secure basis by science and experience, have contributed to raise the character of our goods, and I feel confident those causes will continue further to operate in advancing the character of Irish linens. The bounties on export, though so long regarded as the only support of our manufacture of coarse fabrics, encouraged the production of extremely low and worthless articles, on the value of which the bounty became a handsome profit; and such goods were, of course, despised when brought into comparison with those of the Continent in foreign markets. A better description is now made for export, and the character of the Irish manufacture is advancing. The machinery for spinning yarn has been improved to a degree that has outrun the most sanguine expectations. The extension of spinning-mills is now most rapid. We have had several small mills for many years, and for the last three or four, one very large one, all of which have prospered; and so many are now starting up in every quarter, that there is much danger of the demand being overrun by the supply which may soon be expected. The spinning by machinery has also tended to encourage the application of large capital to the manufacturer." The bleach-works 40 years ago were twice as numerous as at present; yet those which now exist do much more work; and ten can be named in the county of Antrim, which are more than equal to forty of the largest in 1790. "I know ten establishments," said a highly respectable witness in 1840, "that have, within the last year, exported more than £50,000 value each of linen to foreign markets. I also know four manufacturers that have, within the last year, manufactured upwards of £30,000 in value each." The following table shows the date and the extent of the cotton and flax mills erected, from 1801 to 1833, in Belfast and its neighbourhood:—

Since 1833, no fewer than 18 flax or linen-yarn mills have been erected, two formed by the adaptation of quondam cotton mills, and two formed by the adaptation of quondam printfields.

The cotton manufacture, after flourishing for a series of years, principally in Belfast and its vicinity, very seriously declined, and seemed almost tending to extinction; but, viewed in its general connection with Ireland, it may be regarded as having decidedly revived. Mr. C. G. Otway, an assistant Hand Loom Weaver Commissioner, said in 1840, "Some large cotton mills have been lately established in Ireland, and intelligent manufacturers have embarked in the trade; and some of the finest specimens of calico prints in the London market are Irish manufacture." Mr James Stewart, the factory inspector for Ireland and Scotland, said, at the close of the same year, "I have great pleasure in reporting that, during my circuit in Ireland, the flax and cotton factory owners generally admitted, that, for some time past, there has been a tolerably brisk demand for the articles manufactured by them. There is a considerable augmentation of the number of persons employed in the cotton and flax factories. A cotton factory, at Stratford, in the county Wicklow, employing about 150 persons, which has been for a long period in a dilapidated state, has recently been fitted up, and is at work. A large addition to the only cotton factory in the county Wexford is being proceeded with; and there are new flax factories, and large additions to some of those already established, at Belfast and in other parts of the county Antrim." Since 1840, several new factories have been established; and, but for a violent hostility on the part of Irish artisans to the introduction of skilful mechanics from England, considerably more would now have been in operation. The following table shows the kinds and quantity of Irish cotton goods exported from Ireland, in each year of the period 1802—1821:—

The woollen manufacture is succinctly and luminously exhibited by Mr. Otway, in the Handloom Weavers' Commissioners' Report of 1840. "It appears," says he, "that the woollen manufactures in Ireland, previous to the present century, were treated as an exotic, artificially nurtured, and not naturally developed. Bounties, protecting duties, and monopolies, invited a host of minor manufacturers, with small capitals, to enter the business; and their competition, for a time, kept up the nominal rate of wages. Monopolies in Ireland, as elsewhere, were injurious not only to the community, but to the very party they were designed to benefit. The manufacturer, lulled by the false security of what seemed a sure demand, over-rated his profits. Acting on this miscalculation, he gave the workmen almost any sum they pleased to ask, when it was necessary to secure a lucrative contract; in fact, he was paying wages out of his capital. Nor was this system so profitable to the workmen as some of the witnesses have represented. If the nominal rate of wages was higher in Ireland, employment was more steady in Yorkshire; and it is not improbable that at the end of a year the total earnings of the English operative would have been the larger sum." "Mr. Willans has shown that the prosperity of the woollen trade, previous to the removal of the protecting duties in 1823, was greatly exaggerated, and that they did not afford to the manufacturers the advantages intended. There can be no doubt that considerable benefit resulted from the substitution of large capitalists for the smaller manufacturers, so numerous previous to 1810,—a change which took place about the year 1812. The panic of 1825, the results of which were not fully developed until the following year, produced, as fully stated and explained by Mr. Willans, great distress among the Dublin operatives, but not greater than was felt at the same time in the manufacturing districts of England. I am, however, led to believe that this crisis produced many beneficial effects: it swept away all the establishments supported by a system of fictitious credit, and it led to the examination of the rate of wages, and a comparison of the amount with the actual instead of the nominal profits. Wages were consequently reduced; but had the old system been retained, the crash would have been eventually more ruinous, and employment would have ceased altogether. Thus, what the woollen trade lost in extent it gained in real stability; it is now in a healthy and progressive condition, especially as the advancement of steam navigation has opened new markets for Irish woollen goods in the south and west of England." "At Rathdrum, my attention was directed to a branch of the woollen trade, once very flourishing and extensive, but now I may say wholly extinct, the manufacture of flannels. There were 12 fairs held annually at Rathdrum, and it was stated that previous to 1816 so many as 1,200 pieces of flannel were offered for sale at a single fair. After the year 1818 the trade declined so rapidly, that in 1830 the Flannel Hall was closed and the fairs were at an end." "I have now only to repeat my opinion that the woollen trade of Ireland is in a more sound and healthy condition than it ever has been, and that its yearly advance may be confidently expected. But in this, above all other trades, the agriculturist must lend his aid to the improvement of the manufacture; the breeding of sheep, with a view to the improvement of the fleece, has hitherto received very little attention in Ireland; the wool is at present only suited for the manufacture of the coarser cloths and friezes for domestic manufacture amongst the peasantry, and hence that branch of the woollen trade has received considerable extension."

The silk manufacture of Ireland was introduced by the French refugees, and established in the Liberties of the city of Dublin, at the close of the 17th century. A small number of the silk weavers are employed in the manufacture of velvets and ribbons, and all the remainder in the manufacture of tabinets or poplins and tabareas,—the latter article shot with linen yarn, and the former with worsted. The total of silk weavers in Dublin, in May 1838, was 400; and of these, 280 were employed on tabinets and tabareas, 30 on velvets, and 32 on ribbons, while the remainder were either tabinet weavers only occasionally employed, or whole silk or single-hand ribbon-weavers who could not find employment. A statement has been made, but is believed to be exaggerated, that, in 1775, the silk manufacture employed 3,400 weavers, 340 dyers, 1,700 winders, 200 female throwsters, and 200 quill-winders and drawboys,—or a total of 5,840 persons. Since 1775, however, the manufacture has never been extensive, and has been subject to continual fluctuations. The value of raw and orgazine silk imported into Ireland in 1790 amounted to £96,130; in 1791 to £81,413, in 1792 to £112,589, in 1793 to £101,665, in 1794 to £25,293, in 1795 to £51,930, in 1796 to £88,130, in 1797 to £67,300, in 1798 to £42,292, in 1799 to £63,620, in 1800 to £78,451, in 1801 to £43,659, in 1802 to £45,282, in 1803 to £74,423, in 1804 to £54,334, in 1805 to £93,103, in 1806 to £67,222, in 1807 to £53,255, in 1808 to £72,301, in 1809 to £34,831, in 1810 to £57,100, in 1811 to £71,203. The number of pounds imported in 1813 amounted to 104,186, in 1817 to 60,094, in 1821 to 58,729, and in 1825 to 62,128.

The number of corn-mills, corn-kilns, distilleries, breweries, maltsters' establishments, paper manufactories, glass-works, and tobacco manufactories, in each of the excise districts in Ireland, on July 10, 1835, is shown in the following table, compiled from the Appendix to the Twentieth Report of the Excise Enquiry Commissioners:—

BANKS.

Previous to 1783, all banks in Ireland were private, and issued notes without control or responsibility; from 1783 till 1821, the Bank of Ireland, a chartered company, enjoyed an exclusive circulation of its notes in Dublin, and 50 Irish, or 63 English, miles around; and, in 1821, joint stock banks, with an unlimited number of partners, were legalized beyond the bounds of the Bank of Ireland. The singularly disastrous history of Irish banking during the first and the second of these periods is thus glanced at by Mr. G. L. Smyth:—"Previously to the year 1783, the standard grievance with all Irish writers on Political Economy, were two in number,—that there were none but private bankers in Ireland, who issued notes without restraint or responsibility,—and that the disparity of exchanges with England involved ruinous losses to Irish commerce. To these causes, by common consent, were the great runs upon the banks, and the failures of 1720, 1745, 1760, and 1770, ascribed. We have, therefore, during the first stage, the fixed producing causes, and the sum of the consequent evils, in four panics, during a term of sixty-three years, and the failure of some seven or eight banks. In the second stage, comprising a term of forty years, we have the same complaints of excessive paper money, and still more adverse exchanges; and a series of panics which left only four banks out of fifty, not bankrupt, or averse from business. Instead of mitigating, therefore, the monopoly of the Bank of Ireland increased and aggravated the mercantile convulsions of the country. Strange and improbable as the principal incidents in the history of banking in Ireland must appear, antecedent to the chartering of the national establishment in 1783, they are infinitely surpassed in wildness and inconsistency by the chance-medley produced by subsequent events. Not only before the bank was chartered, but even before the suspension of cash payments, the business of banking in Ireland was principally confined to Dublin. There were not, in 1797, more than half-a-dozen banks* in the south of Ireland, and none in the north or west; but after that year almost every place had its bank, and every conceivable mode and device for circulating money was resorted to. For instance, Wexford, a small town, which, even in 1821, had a population of only 8,326 inhabitants, and a proportionally limited trade, had, between the years 1800 and 1804, no less than seven banks. The fate of such commercial establishments will be conjectured at once:—five failed rather quickly, and one gave up business. Two new ones immediately started, to fill the vacuum thus created, which soon after shared the fate of their predecessors. Of the whole number, only one, that of the Messrs. Redmond, conducted business with honour and profit. It was the earliest of the Wexford banks, and about the last private bank that existed in Ireland. New Ross, again, a smaller town than Wexford, and more than twenty miles from it, had four banks, only one of which was standing in 1812, and even that afterwards gave way. Similar instances, in abundance, are to be cited in various other places, but the repetition would be tiresome. The wild growth of these mushroom establishments has been already given in detail from the Commons' Report of 1804, which shows that eleven banks, in 1800, had become twenty-three in 1801; twenty-nine in 1802; thirty, in 1803; and fifty, in 1804. In 1812, Mr. Wakefield published his Political Survey of Ireland, and stated that, of the fifty banks in 1804, there then remained only nineteen extant. One adverse circumstance or other had swept away the rest. Notwithstanding this sharp warning, new speculators had rushed into the field with as little prudence as fear, so that, notwithstanding the failure of thirty-one out of fifty banks, between 1804 and 1812, only six years, there were still thirty-three banks open in 1812. These adventurers resorted to expedients of all kinds for the purpose of forcing a trade. They supplied small traders with their notes, and used to pay a premium to get them into circulation. The bankers themselves were in the habit of attending markets and fairs like so many hucksters, each putting off his own commodity as best he might. Their favourite issue was not promissory notes, but post bills, at ten days' sight, which, being generally unaccepted, were paid, if at all, at convenience. But the mischief did not rest with the multitude of bankers. Besides the fifty private firms already spoken of, there were as many as 295 petty dealers and chapmen, grocers, spirit-dealers, apothecaries, and shopkeepers of all sorts, inundating the country with a species of I. O. U., called silver money, which was a direct violation of the law, and ranged, in nominal amount, from threepence-halfpenny to ten shillings. This fraudulent paper was principally spread over the south and south-west of Ireland, which further suffered under an enormous distribution of forged notes, the unlettered population being, in that respect, easily imposed upon. In 1810 the circulation of the Bank of Ireland rose to more than £3,000,000, and there was a panic; in 1820 it exceeded £5,000,000, and there was another panic. Then began an accumulative series of those rapid failures which seem to be known to no other country, and which spread indescribable calamity and consternation over the whole surface of the island. In the month of June, the Banking firm of Roche and Co., of Cork, failed; and, on the same morning, that of Leslie and Co. suspended payment in the same city. By the next Saturday, Messrs. Maunsell, of Limerick, had closed their doors. These embarrassments were quickly followed by the stoppage of Messrs. Rial, at Clonmel; Sause, at Carrick-on-Suir; Newport, at Waterford; Loughnan, at Kilkenny; Alexander, at Dublin; until, within a single month, eleven Banks had broken, and in the whole south of Ireland there remained open only two houses—Messrs. Delacour, at Mallow, and Redmond, at Wexford."

In 1783, the Bank of Ireland commenced operation with a capital of £600,000 Irish currency; from 1784 till 1799, its dividend was from 5 to 6 per cent.; in 1800, its capital was £1,500,000, and its dividend 7 per cent.; in 1809, its capital was £2,500,000, and its dividend up to 1814 was 7½ per cent.; in 1821, a bonus of £500,000 was added to the original capital; from 1821 to 1829, the dividend was 10 per cent.; and from 1829 to 1835, the dividend was 9 per cent. In 1797, the circulation of the Bank of Ireland was £621,917; in 1808, £2,827,000; in 1809, £3,068,100; in 1810, £3,157,300; in 1813, £4,212,600; in 1821, £5,181,600; in 1825, £6,309,300; and in 1843, £3,100,000. The banks formed since the legalizing of joint stock banks in 1821, have been the Hibernian, the Northern, the Provincial, the Belfast, the Agricultural, the Provident, the National, the Ulster, the Royal, the Tipperary, and the London and Dublin banks. The Agricultural and the Provident have ceased; and the partners, branches, and capital of the others, as well as of the Bank of Ireland, in 1843, are shown in the following table:—

NAME.	When Instituted.	No. of Partners.	No. of Branches.	CAPITAL.
Bank of Ireland	1783		25	£3,000,000
Hibernian Joint Stock Bank	1824	225		1,000,000

The amount of the notes of the joint stock and private banking companies in Ireland, in January 1836, (as shown by their accounts of unstamped notes in circulation, in the half-year ended December 1835,) was £1,713,900.

The Average Amount of the Unstamped Promissory Notes, on which Composition, in lieu of Stamp Duty, has been paid to the several Banking Establishments in Ireland, for the half-year ended 31st December, 1837, was—

The Bank of Ireland, supposed to be	£3,200,000
Provincial Bank of Ireland	688,000
National Bank of Ireland	£157,600
Limerick do.	66,300
Clonmel do.	70,600
Carrick-on-Suir do.	32,600
Waterford do.	80,500
Wexford and Enniscorthy, do.	31,100
Tipperary do.	79,800
Tralee do.	28,700

Provident Bank of Ireland	6,000
Messrs. Ball and Co., of Dublin	16,500
Total	£5,036,500

An estimate of the Proportions in which the total amount of Bankers' Notes in Ireland circulate in each of the Four Provinces.

Assuming the amount of Notes circulated in Ireland to be £5,000,000,

The Province of Leinster may be considered to have	£1,700,000
" Ulster	"	1,400,000
" Munster	"	1,300,000
" Connaught	"	600,000
Total	£5,000,000

A writer in the 'Banker's Magazine' for June 1844, says: "The rapid improvement which has taken place in the condition of Ireland during the past twenty years, must be attributed almost exclusively to the system of banking introduced by the Joint Stock companies, established in pursuance of the act 6th Geo. IV., c. 42. The enterprise and public spirit of the founders and supporters of these banks have effected more practical good for Ireland than all the legislative measures of the past century; Ireland is indebted to its banks for an improvement of agriculture, an extension of commerce, and a large increase of social happiness, and of the means of enjoyment for all classes of society. Ireland like Scotland enjoys the advantages of a small-note circulation; its currency, unlike that of England, is composed chiefly of notes under five pounds, and very little gold is used in the ordinary transactions of trade. It is a well-known fact that two-thirds of the circulation of notes in Ireland consists of notes of one pound, and other denominations under £5 in value. This circulation of small notes arises from the peculiarities which attend four of the chief branches of industry in Ireland, viz., the linen manufacture, the raising of corn, the production of butter, and the rearing of pigs. Although each of these branches is, in the aggregate, of very considerable magnitude, yet from the very great number of persons engaged in them, the produce which one individual brings to market is so very small, that without a circulating medium adapted to the circumstances, the trade could not be carried on. That there is no danger of an excessive issue, in consequence of the small-note circulation, is proved by the regular and proper manner in which it has been conducted for so many years, and by the immediate check any over issue would receive from the following causes which are in constant operation;—first, the notes are immediately convertible into gold, at the branch of the bank where they are issued; secondly, the interest allowed by the Joint Stock banks on deposits, holds out a strong inducement to every one to return to the issuing bank all surplus money not wanted for immediate purposes; thirdly, the exchange of notes with other banks in Ireland takes place, in general, daily; fourthly, the exchange with Britain would be affected, and a demand for gold would be instantly produced by any excess of issue—this check being one of instant operation, as regards the principal Joint Stock banks, through whom the chief part of the business of rent and commercial remittances is carried on. The most important feature, however, in Irish banking, is the charter of the Bank of Ireland, which—as above stated—confers upon that bank the exclusive privilege of banking in Dublin, and for fifty Irish miles around; this distance being about the same as that enjoyed by the Bank of England, fifty miles Irish being sixty-three English. Within this distance (which, however, is not a perfect circle, in consequence of Dublin being near the sea) no bank consisting of more than six partners can issue notes, or perform any of the functions of a banker. When the Joint Stock banks were first established beyond the prescribed limit, they opened offices in Dublin, in order to retire notes, and perform other operations essential to their existence as banks of issue. The Bank of Ireland determined to prevent this, and in consequence brought an action against the Provincial Bank for an infringement of the charter. The case, after a protracted struggle, was decided in favour of the Bank of Ireland; but the injustice of the restriction was so apparent, that an act was passed allowing Joint Stock banks to retire their notes in Dublin, on condition of their not re-issuing them within the prescribed limit of fifty Irish miles. This is the extent of the privilege at present enjoyed by the Joint Stock banks; they are, in every other respect, excluded from 'the seven richest and most fertile counties of Ireland (surrounding Dublin) containing a population of about 1,500,000 souls, and within which space only six branches of the Bank of Ireland have been established, although the number of Joint Stock branches in the various towns of Ireland, beyond fifty miles from Dublin, is one hundred and thirty-one!'"

FISHERIES.

From the Shannon to Malin Head, the waters of the coast abound with fish; but the fishermen, except at Galway, are for the most part holders of small patches of land, and possess only rude, occasional, and inefficient means of prosecuting fishing. Fish-curers drive a considerable trade at Galway and Killybegs; but at most other places between the Shannon and Malin Head, the fishermen rely principally or wholly on the herring fishery, and dispose of most of their produce to travelling traders who visit the several fishing harbours. From Malin Head to Belfast Lough, the fishermen are much more regularly employed, and find a ready sale for their produce either at home or in the markets of Glasgow and Liverpool. From Belfast Lough to Carlingford Lough, the trade of fishing, except for herrings, is regularly followed at only two or three places, and, in consequence of the superior remuneration of agricultural labour, is generally regarded with indifference. From Carlingford to Wexford, fish are alleged by fishermen to be scarce; and from Dublin to Wexford, little fishing is carried on for the supply of the Dublin market. It is confidently asserted that a diminution of the fisheries in this great district "amounts to three-fourths of the quantity taken at a period not many years distant. This failure in productiveness is attributed to an over fishing, and to a destruction of spawn,—both imputed to the trollers." At Waterford, the fishing resource has long been believed to be abundant; and the famous nymph bank is asserted to yield white fish in inexhaustible quantity. From Waterford, round the entire south coast, and northward to the Shannon, a recent decline in the productiveness of the fisheries, amounting now to an absolute scarcity of fish, is matter of constant local complaint; but this scarcity seems to exist only in the bay and in-shore fisheries, to which the operations of the fishermen, owing to their poverty and insufficient gear, are chiefly confined.

"Exclusively of the edible fish, properly so called," say the Commissioners of the Irish Fishery Enquiry, in Oct. 1836, "Ireland possesses oyster banks which yield valuable returns, where properly fished; and the lobster fishery would form a most lucrative branch of industry—but it is not efficiently worked. Lobsters exist in great plenty on various points of the coast; yet the English markets derive their principal supplies from Norway; while in the Irish markets, lobsters are scarce, dear, and often not to be had. The sunfish and whale are met with in the Irish seas; the former, only a few years since, visited the north-west coast annually, in considerable numbers; but it is stated that they are now rarely seen there; resorting, according to the opinion of those best acquainted with the subject, to banks more distant from the coast. From this cause, and also perhaps from the inexperience of the fishermen, and the want of proper boats to follow the business, the taking of sunfish may be said to have ceased; and the oil formerly in high repute in the Dublin market, is, at present, scarcely to be found in the trade. To pursue the sunfish with effect, the vessels employed should, according to Dutton, be of from 80 to 100 tons burthen, with three attendant boats, manned with eight men each; but in the evidence taken at Galway, vessels of 40 tons are stated to be sufficient. The Galway fishermen, however, search for these animals in their ordinary fishing boats; and boats of a still smaller size have been used for the same purpose, on the coast of Mayo. It is also stated that when the Mayo fishermen took a fish or two, a large portion of the oil was lost by conveying the liver to land in a small open boat, as well as by the want of fit means on shore for extracting and saving the oil. It is, then, not unlikely, that the prevailing opinion is correct; and that the fish are still to be found further from the shore, if due pains were taken to seek them. If this be so, (and it deserves the inquiry of interested persons,) a valuable enterprise is open to such fishermen as could proceed on an adequate scale of operations. The high price of spermaceti oil in Dublin, and the excellent quality of the sunfish oil, (especially if due care were taken to boil it while the liver is fresh and sweet,) would insure a brisk and steady sale for the article. A similar complaint of this disappearance of fish from their accustomed haunts, is made with respect to the herring; the shoals being said to have left, wholly or partially, several places where heretofore they were abundant. The herring is a fish of rather uncertain movements. It is known to have deserted, for a time, bays where it has for seasons abounded; and then, again to re-appear in large quantities. No cause worthy of confidence has been assigned for the fact; the whole history, indeed, of the migrations of the herring having hitherto been involved in obscurity. It is an opinion daily gaining ground among naturalists, and may nearly be taken as established, that the imputed annual movement of the shoals from north to south, is an error; and that the herrings, and all (so called) migratory fish, merely leave the deep waters, and approach the shores for the purpose of spawning. This latter opinion rests on a strong analogy with the known habits of salmon in that particular; also on the certainty that herrings are taken on some or other parts of our coasts, at all times of the year; and it is strengthened by the remarkable fact, that the remains of the herring are not found in the stomach of those whales which are killed in high latitudes; though they are in that of the species which are found on our own coast. While the grand facts are thus in dispute, it seems vain to attempt an explanation of the more partial and irregular phenomena. Fishermen, however, are apt to complain of the shoals being less abundant on their stations than formerly. But though certain bays may be thus partially affected, the herring is always to be found in the open sea during its season; and boats which have stood out into the deep water, have returned laden, when the bay fishery utterly failed."

The Government began, in 1764, to attempt the use of the most direct means for creating and maintaining a national fishery, but were soon obliged to desist; and they afterwards made no considerable effort to aid the industry of the Irish fishermen, till 1819, when commissioners were appointed for applying, in Ireland, the system adopted for the Scotch fisheries in 1808. These commissioners were empowered to distribute public money in bounties, to persons fitting out fishing boats of a specified tonnage, and curing herrings, cod, ling, and some other fish; also, to make regulations suited to particular localities, and to inflict penalties for practices then made illegal. A sum of £5,000 Irish was annually placed at their disposal for the further encouragement of the fisheries, but its application was subsequently limited by law to the building of piers and repair of fishing boats; and a large portion of the sums accruing from these annual grants was used as a loan fund, for enabling fishermen to provide equipments on advantageous terms. In 1830, the Irish Fishery Board was abolished, and an unapplied balance of the grants at their disposal was committed to the management, first of the Board of Irish Inland Navigation, and next to the Commissioners of Irish Public Works, together with a sum of £4,500 for the year commencing in April, 1830, £3,500 for the second year, £2,500 for the third year, £1,500 for the fourth year, and £1,000 for the fifth year, to be applied in completing piers commenced before April 5, 1830, and in paying persons employed for enforcing the repayment of loans made by the Irish Fishery Board. The following table exhibits the number of boats and men engaged in the coast-fisheries of Ireland in 1836:

INLAND TRAFFIC.

"Without any official aid or authentic documents," say the Railway Commissioners, "we were thrown on our own resources, to procure such information as we best could in reference to the nature, amount, and direction of the internal traffic of the country. We were enabled, through the kind permission of the Inspector-General, to obtain the assistance of the constabulary, who being spread in small detachments over Ireland, seemed peculiarly available for the purposes of such an inquiry. Having supplied instructions and forms of return to the several constables, we received a mass of information, displaying, in many instances, considerable local knowledge, and very creditable intelligence; chiefly deficient, as might be expected, in showing the amount of merchandise or produce conveyed, but valuable as exhibiting the direction of the traffic, and the extent of country by which the various markets and fairs throughout the kingdom are respectively supplied. From these returns, collated and compared with great labour, tested and corrected in those instances in which we had returns known to be accurate—such, for example, as those furnished from the Grand and Royal Canals—Lieutenant Harness, of the Royal Engineers, has constructed the Traffic Map, which may be regarded as a mechanical representation of the direction and relative amount of the internal traffic of Ireland." We give a copy of this Traffic

Map with our Gazetteer; and, in order that it may be fully understood, we subjoin, in a note, Lieutenant Harness' statement of the principles of its construction.*

The Grand Canal, which forms the largest and most remarkable of the lines exhibited on the map, sends off a main branch to communicate with the navigation of the Barrow at Athy; sends off six other branches which, together with this main one, have an aggregate extent of 65½ miles; passes through Philipstown and Tullamore to the river Shannon, at Shannon Harbour, 79½ miles from Dublin; communicates there with all the extensive and ramified navigation of the Shannon from Lough Allen to the ocean; and finally proceeds 9½ miles to Ballinasloe, there probably to communicate at some future period with a long projected system of inland navigations through the lakes of Connaught to the sea at Westport and Killalla. The total tonnage in the traffic on this canal in 1822 was 134,939, and in 1837 was 215,910; and the amount of tolls in these years was respectively £24,866 and £40,859. In 1830, the effect of the introduction of steam-power on the Shannon, and the communication which this established between Limerick and Liverpool, began to be felt on the Grand Canal, and mainly contributed to the increase of its traffic; and the numerous improvements on the Shannon navigation, projected by the public commissioners, will greatly facilitate the means of communication at many points on both banks, and bring a much greater range of country within reach of the advantages of the navigation, and in consequence materially augment the traffic on both the Grand and the Royal Canal. From Carrick-on-Shannon past Athlone, Portumna, Killaloe, Limerick, and other places, to the sea, the river Shannon, or rather its chain of lakes, has for years past been partially navigated over a distance of about 150 miles by steam-vessels either carrying goods and passengers or acting as steam-tugs. The total tonnage carried by the boats of the Inland Navigation Company on the Shannon in 1826, was 2,004 tons, and in 1836 was 47,289 tons; and the quantity of agricultural produce carried from Limerick and shipped at Dublin for Liverpool in 1833, was 187 tons of wheat, 520 tons of flour, 543 tons of oatmeal, and 4,998 firkins of butter,—and in 1836, was 289 tons of wheat, 7,158 tons of flour, 1,156 tons of oatmeal, and 12,795 firkins of butter. The Royal Canal, begun in 1789, runs very near the Grand Canal for 52 miles, or to Mullingar, proceeds thence north-westward by Ballymahon and Killashee, sends off a branch of 5 miles from the latter place to Longford, and joins the Shannon at Richmond Harbour, 92 miles from Dublin. In 1834, the total receipts and expenditure connected with this canal were respectively £24,000 and £11,376; and, in 1836, they were respectively £25,148 and £11,912. The navigation of the Barrow from the south end of the main branch of the Grand Canal at Athy has been effected by the construction of 17 locks, and the formation of a horse trackway; and it forms a line of communication along the rich though narrow limestone valley of Carlow, with Bagnalstown, St. Mullins, New Ross, the Suir navigation, and the ocean. In 1800, the tonnage on the Barrow navigation was 19,828 tons, and the amount of tolls was £1,405; and, in 1835, the tonnage was 66,084 tons, and the amount of tolls was £4,966. The navigation of the Suir takes very large sea-borne vessels up to the city of Waterford; but forms a very imperfect navigation for barges thence to Clonmel, the boatmen having great difficulty in forcing the barges through its numerous shallows and rapids. The Boyne navigation carries large sea-borne vessels up to Drogheda, and is thence aided artificially 19 miles to Navan; and, in 1837, the amount of tolls was £775 17s. 1d. The Newry navigation is 21 miles in length,

* The map representing the traffic in merchandise cannot be supposed to convey any definite idea of quantity; it gives, however, some idea of the general direction of the trade, and of the extent of country supplying or supplied by each port; and it has been attempted to make the breadth of the streams correspond with the relative amount of traffic, so far as a judgment could be formed. The returns employed for determining the inland traffic were obtained from the constabulary; these returns gave, as nearly as the several constables could ascertain, or according to their judgment, the quantity of corn and meal, of butter, eggs, wool, cattle, &c. sent from the various market-towns, to the different ports, for sale or exportation. They also stated what port each town was dependent upon for its supplies of heavy articles, such as iron, coal, and timber, together with the mode and cost of communicating with it. In some instances, too, the number of carts supposed to be employed, in a given period, between the port and the town, was added. Since, generally speaking, no reliance could be placed upon the actual amounts of any of the articles returned, the direction of the trade was, at first, alone attended to, and a line for each stream of trade so returned was drawn upon a map; many towns uniting to send their produce in the same direction made these thick, and they in fact became wide in proportion to the number of towns that fed them. The whole map having been thus traced out, the streams of produce on the Grand and Royal Canals, which were found to bear very nearly the same proportion to each other that their traffic does, as exhibited in Porter's Tables, were taken as equivalent to the number of tons shown by those tables to be conveyed by them; this supplied a scale; those streams for which any thing like definite information respecting weight had been obtained, had their breadths corrected by that scale, and the others were left unaltered. Returns from the Mining Company of Ireland, and other sources, have furnished the information relative to the weight and value of the produce annually obtained from the mines and quarries, as given on the map. Returns, so far as the records of the custom-houses could supply them, have been obtained of the exports and imports of each port, for the year 1835, together with an account of the tonnage of the shipping cleared and entered in 1825, 1835, and 1830; for these data numbers were assumed as affording a measure of the trade of each port, and these numbers were submitted to the several collectors for their opinions; thus have been obtained the quantities assigned to them on the map.

and connects Lough Neagh with the town of Newry and the head of Lough Carlingford; and, in 1837, its tonnage amounted to 102,332 tons, and its tolls to £3,505. The Tyrone navigation connects the collieries at Coal Island near Dungannon, with the river Blackwater and Lough Neagh; it was constructed under grossly mistaken impressions of the value of the Tyrone coal-field; and, in 1836, its tonnage amounted to 7,291 tons, only 718 of which were coals. The Lagan navigation connects Belfast with Lough Neagh; and, including the river, the lake, and the Tyrone navigation, or from Belfast to Coal Island, it extends 61 miles. In 1836, the tonnage of this navigation was 44,700 tons, and the tolls amounted to £2,060 10s. 8d. A very important work, the Ulster canal, was quite recently constructed to connect the Blackwater and Lough Neagh with Lough Erne, and to bring Belturbet, Belleek, and all the country lying around and between them, into water-communication with Belfast and Newry; and, in 1838, this canal was completed as far as to Monaghan, and promised to be a most useful work.

"The total tonnage carried by all the canals and navigable rivers," said the Railway Commissioners, in 1838, "may be taken at about 600,000 tons; and the amount of tolls at £71,242, if the tolls, on an average, be taken at 1d. per ton per mile. The average distance which the above tonnage is carried is about 30 miles. With a view to form an estimate of the probable total amount of agricultural produce carried from the interior to the several ports of the kingdom, detailed accounts of the annual exports for several years prior to 1826, were examined by Lieutenant Harness, and the result as stated by him is equivalent to 437,000 tons. Supposing the increase since 1826 to be in proportion to the shipping cleared, the present exportation may be considered to amount to 680,000 tons; and after allowing 20,000 tons for eggs, wool, flax, and potatoes, from the returns furnished by the Customs to the Commissioners, the total export of agricultural produce may be assumed, with tolerable confidence, at 700,000 tons annually. The population of the ports amounts to about 700,000, and allowing three-fourths of a ton per person for the consumption of the inhabitants and that of their horses, the quantity consumed would be 525,000 tons annually. The total annual produce carried at present from the interior to the several ports, may, therefore, be estimated at about 1,225,000 tons. The consumption of Dublin, Cork, and other great ports, will, of course, materially exceed the general average: but it can hardly be above the truth to assume, that the return trade of Irish manufactures, including shop-goods, beer, and spirits, for the supply of the inland towns, as well as of the rural population—the poorest of whom are consumers of tobacco, spirits, and woollen cloth—would consist of 1 cwt. annually for each individual of the population to be supplied. This would give 385,000 tons for the return trade; making, with the agricultural produce carried to the ports, 1,610,000 tons. This is the valuable portion of the inland traffic. It is carried on, for the most part, by the common cars of the country, at a very low rate—the charge not exceeding, on an average, 8d. per ton per statute mile; and the average distance of carriage is not less than 40 miles. The total amount of carriage to and from the ports will, of course, be very different from the above. Weighty and bulky articles, of small value, but in constant demand—such as stone, sand, lime, bricks, and flags—will generally be supplied from the immediate vicinity, or brought by sea, unless a canal or railroad should afford great facility and economy of transport; and in that case, a portion would be furnished from some convenient locality traversed by the canal or railroad, as in the case of Dublin. Estimating the quantity which would be brought in under such circumstances, according to the supply of such articles furnished by the Grand and Royal canals, it would appear that five-twelfths of a ton should be allowed for each inhabitant. Turf, coal, and manure, would also, with such facilities, become articles of transport for a considerable distance."

The following table exhibits the estimate formed by Lieutenant Harness, under the Railway Commissioners' directions, of the amount of inland traffic to and from each of the ports of Ireland:—

PUBLIC CONVEYANCES.

We copy from the Atlas of the Railway Commissioners a map which shows the direction and relative amount of travelling throughout Ireland, and denotes, by figures at the side of the lines, the average number of persons passing weekly, by public conveyances of all kinds, between the places of mutual communication; and in order that the map may be well understood, we subjoin a statement by Lieutenant Harness, its compiler, of the principles on which it was constructed.*

"We believe," say the Commissioners, "that this map presents a faithful and accurate picture, and will convey a more clear and distinct idea of the state of travelling on the several routes than could readily be given by any other means. It will be seen that the largest stream is from Dublin towards Naas, where it divides into three branches—the one by Carlow, Kilkenny, and Clonmel, to Cork; the other by Mountrath, Roscrea, and Nenagh, to Limerick; while the third, passing along the Grand Canal, is chiefly dissipated among the small towns on its banks, a small portion reaching Ballinasloe. Next in importance are the streams through Balbriggan and Ashbourne, uniting at Drogheda, and thence continuing to Newry; at which town a branch separates towards Armagh, where it is again subdivided into smaller branches, the principal of which pass by Caledon, to Omagh and Strabane on the left, and to Moy, Dungannon, and Cookstown on the right. The main line from Newry continues through Lisburn to Belfast. Next in magnitude to these two great lines is the stream direct to the west, through Lucan, Maynooth, Enfield, Clonard, and Kinnegad, where a branch separates to Athlone, by Kibbeggan; the main line continuing to

* To obtain the requisite information for the passenger map, blank returns were sent to each constabulary district, which, on being filled in, furnished a description of the public conveyances passing each police station, with the average number of their passengers; and from these returns, a list of public conveyances throughout Ireland was arranged. Besides the check arising from each conveyance being returned by at least two police stations, it has been further checked by returns obtained from Messrs. Parcel, Bourne, and Bianconi, the three largest coach and car proprietors in Ireland. The number of travellers between several places on the lines of road from Dublin to Cork and Limerick, has been also ascertained by enumerators, whose observations have, in a great degree, corroborated the results obtained as above, and at the same time corrected a few errors, caused by the same conveyance having been differently described at different stations. A few such errors may still remain, but it is believed that the numbers given on the map are a tolerably correct average of the number of passengers conveyed weekly, by public conveyances, between the places to which they refer; and as the number of such passengers may be considered a very fair proportional measure of the whole number of travellers in any direction, the streams of shade, of which the breadths have been proportioned to those numbers, may be considered as conveying a faithful picture of the relative amount, in different directions, of this description of traffic. The number of passengers conveyed by the boats on the Grand and Royal Canals are correctly given from very valuable returns furnished by the two Companies.

Mullingar, and thence to Longford, from which a small stream passes through Carrick-on-Shannon and Boyle to Sligo. The Athlone branch continues to Ballinasloe, where another small division takes place, a portion diverging to Tuam and Castlebar, while the larger passes on by Loughrea to Galway. The Royal Canal runs close to the main route, touching it at several points, passing by Mullingar, and communicating with Longford by a branch from Killashee. Swift boats are now established as far as Mullingar (52 miles), which they reach in eight hours from Dublin; and the common or slow passage boats ply regularly between Dublin and Longford, performing the journey in twenty-three hours. Next in point of consideration is a stream to the north-west; it branches off on the left at Clonee to Trim, and to Navan on the right, passing through the latter place to Kells, Cavan, and Enniskillen." The Commissioners estimate that if railways were to be constructed from Dublin to respectively Cork, Belfast, and Mullingar, according to the lines indicated on the map, the passenger traffic upon them would be as shown in the following tables :

In 1836, the number of passengers by the Grand Canal was 86,364, and by the Royal Canal 28,320.

None of the various extensive lines of railway projected by the public commissioners, summarily noticed in our articles on Dublin and Leinster, and often referred to in the body of our work, have yet been constructed; nor have the greater part of lines surveyed by other parties, and referred to in our articles on Leinster and several of the large towns, been yet undertaken. The only complete line in Ireland at the commencement of 1844 was the Dublin and Kingstown railway, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and then quite recently extended to Dalkey by an atmospheric railway $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length. The Ulster railway, from Belfast to Armagh, was open for passengers and goods to Portadown, 28 miles; and the Dublin and Drogheda railway, 30 miles in length, was in such a state of forwardness that it was expected to be opened in the month of May.

PUBLIC WORKS.

The following series of extracts, copied from a work published in 1843, fully shows the extent to which government has of late years promoted public works in Ireland:—

Augmentation of Grants by the Irish Parliament for 6 years previous to the Union (1800) . . . £79,314
 Augmentation of Grants by Imperial Parliament for 4 years previous to 1817 . . . £396,834
 Grants by the Imperial Parliament for Ireland:—

	From Jan., 1801, to Jan., 1817.	From Jan., 1817, to Jan., 1833.	Total.
To Charitable and Literary Institutions . . .	£1,995,128	£2,230,622	= £4,225,750
Encouragement of Manufactures and Agriculture . . .	868,174	472,247	= 1,340,421
Public Works and Employment of Poor . . .	1,535,336	1,536,824	= 3,072,160
Total, . . .	£4,398,638	£4,239,693	£8,638,331

Money granted by the Imperial Parliament for the Improvement of Harbours in or connected with Ireland, was, for—

Howth £345,194, Kingstown £304,335, Donaghadee £132,672, Port Patrick £125,370, Dunmore £79,175, Hobbs Point £23,422.—Total £1,010,177.

By the Act 1 and 2 Will. IV. c. 33, an advance of £500,000 was made in support of public works in Ireland. Upwards of one million sterling has been advanced by the legislature to carry the Irish Poor-law Act into operation. Various other items might be added to show the liberality of the imperial legislature towards Ireland.

Money voted by the British House of Commons and Acts of the Imperial Parliament, for Public Works in Ireland, under the direction of the Irish Board of Works.

But this is not all. Mr. Smyth says, that the 'existing Board of Works' was appointed in 1831, when the salaries of the Commissioners, formerly only £500 a-year, were raised,—that of the chairman to £1,000, and of the others to £600 a-year each. Very extensive duties, and full power as to the direction of the various public works, administered or assisted by the former Boards, and the control of every new enterprise to which assistance might be applied, were given to the new body, who, to promote public works in Ireland, have been voted from the treasury :—

1 and 2 William IV. c. 33. £500,000; Grant Fund, £50,000; 1 and 2 William IV., c. 103. £100,000; Repayments reissuable, £120,000; 1 Victoria, c. 21. Grant Fund, £50,000; 1 and 2 Victoria, c. 88. £50,000; Expenses of Board, 1831, £1,110; 1832, £3,564; 1833, £4,434; 1834, £3,276; 1835, £8,565; 1836, £3,140; 1837, £3,591; 1838, £3,206; Shannon and Railway Commission, £50,000 + £5,000 + £12,700, £67,700.—Total, £968,576.

From 1831 to the present time, the following sums of money have been awarded to Limerick by the Board of Works, which is said to owe its origin to Mr. Spring Rice. The sums will be found numbered, as here, in the Parliamentary Report for last year :—

No. 41. Road from Woodford to new line to Limerick, £950. 46. Road from Glenquin to Goulburn Bridge, County Limerick, £600. 5. Limerick Navigation Company, to improve Works, £8,910. 6. Road leading to Ennis, £205. 7. Ditto to Waterford, £560. 15. Completing Wellesley Bridge and Docks, £25,000. 34. Road leading to Waterford, £206. 35. Road leading to Ennis, £117. 36. Road leading from Abbeyfeal to Glinn, £1,181. 61. Rebuilding Thomond Bridge, £9,000. 68. Barrington's Hospital, £2,500. 70. Limerick Navigation Company, to improve quays, &c., £6,500. 75. Road from Mitchelstown to Kilfinnane, £1,150. 80. Limerick Bridge, £40,000. 93. Road from Buttevant to Kilfinnane, £400.—Total, £97,379.

The following Return shows the Gross Amount of Public Money advanced under each separate Head of Account for Public Works in Ireland. A lengthened detailed statement was laid before Parliament, 17th August, 1839, showing the specific application of each sum of money granted :—

Arts and Agriculture: The Cork-street Society, Dublin, £923; the Royal Dublin Society, £285,438; the Farming Society, Dublin, £87,132; the Linen Board, Dublin, £537,656. Bogs and Waste Lands, £32,633. Buildings: Bridges, £91,810; Chapels, £2,113; Churches, £749,541; Docks, £923; Gaols and other Prisons, £486,995; Infirmaries, Hospitals, &c., £435,167; Law Courts and Sessions-houses, £80,444. Light-houses, £104,028; Record Offices, £6,975; Round Towers, &c., of defence, £85,766; Schoolhouses, £33,648; Workhouses, £800. Fisheries, £7,914. Harbours and Ports, £1,285,600. Inland Navigation, £1,159,849. Mines, £32,859. Poor (relief of), £609,399. Post roads, £883,363. Public Works of a Miscellaneous Character, £1,743,136.—Total of Advances, from 1800 to 1st June, 1839, £8,828,141.

TERRITORIAL DIVISIONS.

The most ancient recorded division of Ireland is alleged to have consisted of Leath Conn in the north and Leath Mogha in the south, and to have been formed, in Milesian times, by an imaginary line drawn from the bay of Dublin to the bay of Galway. The map of Ptolemy is the most ancient geographical document of Ireland; and, considering the period in which he lived, and the maps and descriptions he gave of countries which were then better known, it is singularly distinguished by correctness of topographical delineation. The districts inhabited by various tribes, as exhibited in this map, are determined as follows by Whittaker: "1. CENTRAL, comprising the counties of Tyrone, Fermanagh, Monaghan, Cavan, Leitrim, Longford, Westmeath, King's county, Queen's county, Kilkenny, and Tipperary, inhabited by the Scoti, bounded by the Shannon, Lough Allen, and Lough Erne on the west, the rivers Barrow and Boyne, and Lough Neagh, on the east, the rivers Suir and Blackwater on the south, and a chain of mountains on the north. 2. NORTH, or the counties of Antrim and Londonderry, peopled by the Robogdii, whose boundary was from Horn Head to Fair Head. 3. EAST, or the county of Antrim and part of Down, inhabited by the Damnii, from Fair Head to Ardglass; part of Down and the counties of Armagh and Louth by the Voluntii, from Ardglass to the river Boyne; the county of Meath and part of Dublin by the Eblani, from the Boyne to the Liffey; parts of Dublin and of Wicklow by the Caucii, from the Liffey to the Ovoca; parts of Wicklow and Wexford by the Menapii, from the Ovoca to Carnsore Point; parts of Wicklow and the counties of Kildare and Carlow by the Coriundi, between the Boyne and Barrow rivers. 4. SOUTH, or part of Wexford and the county of Waterford, by the Brigantes, from Carnsore Point to the Blackwater; part of Cork by the Vodii, from the Blackwater to the Bann; parts of Cork and Kerry, by the Ibernii, from the Bann to Dingle bay. 5. WEST, or part of Kerry, by the Luceni; parts of Kerry and Limerick by the Velaborii; Clare by the Cangani; Galway by the Auterii; Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, Leitrim, and Fermanagh, by the Magnate; and Donegal by the Hardinii, from the Ballyshannon river to Horn Head."

After the introduction of Christianity, Ireland was subdivided into very numerous petty toparchies and principalities, nearly all of fluctuating extent, and some of comparatively brief existence; toward the close of the purely Hibernian period, it comprised the five kingdoms of Leinster in the south-east, Munster in the south-west, Connaught on the west, Ulster on the north, and Meath in the centre, but at the same time formed one general or supreme monarchy; and after the Anglo-Norman conquest, it was for a brief period fitfully subdivided among English magnates and Irish chiefs, and then formally and progressively divided into counties, yet, for a series of generations, existed practically in the two divisions of English and Irish, or of Ireland within the Pale, and Ireland beyond the Pale. See article LEINSTER. Its present political divisions consist first of four provinces, next of 32 counties, next of 313 baronies and a number of municipal jurisdictions, next of a number of parishes which may be stated at 2,348, and next of ultimate subdivisions called townlands in most districts, and ploughlands in some, but the total number of which cannot be stated till the completion, now at hand, of the Ordnance Survey. The division into provinces has long ceased to be of any practical utility, except as an aid to topographical knowledge. The counties in Ulster are Donegal, Londonderry, Tyrone, Antrim, Down, Armagh, Monaghan, Fermanagh, and Cavan; those in Leinster are Louth, Dublin, Wicklow, Wexford, Meath, Kildare, Carlow, Kilkenny, Longford, Westmeath, King's county, and Queen's county; those in Munster are Waterford, Tipperary, Limerick, Cork, Kerry, and Clare; and those in Connaught are Galway, Mayo, Roscommon, Leitrim, and Sligo. Each of the counties of Cork, Tipperary, and Galway, was recently divided into two ridings. The baronial divisions are used principally in regulating grand jury assessments and other civil matters; the parochial divisions, principally in regulating tithe compositions and other ecclesiastical matters; and the townland divisions, principally in regulating the affairs of estates and other comparatively domestic matters.

The judicial division of the kingdom comprises six circuits:—1. The Home, comprehending the counties of Meath, Westmeath, King's, Queen's, Carlow, and Kildare; 2. The North-East, comprehending the counties of Louth, Down, Antrim, Armagh, and Monaghan, and the towns of Drogheda and Carrickfergus; 3. The North-West, comprehending the counties of Longford, Cavan, Fermanagh, Tyrone, Donegal, and Londonderry, and the city of Londonderry; 4. The Leinster, comprehending the counties of Wicklow, Wexford, Waterford, Kilkenny, and Tipperary, and the city of Kilkenny; 5. The Munster, comprehending the counties of Clare, Limerick, Kerry, and Cork, and the cities of Limerick and Cork; 6. The Connaught, comprehending the counties of Roscommon, Leitrim, Sligo, Mayo, and Galway, and the town of Galway.—The military divisions are, for the recruiting service, Newry, Dublin, and Cork; and for the general service, Belfast, Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and Athlone.—The fiscal divisions are 16 ports for the customs, 21 districts or collections for the excise, and the 32 counties for stamps.—The ecclesiastical divisions will be stated in the section on Religion.

PUBLIC REVENUE.

On January 5, 1817, the treasuries of Ireland and Great Britain were mutually consolidated; and since that date, full separate views of the public financial condition of Ireland cannot be obtained. The following table and statement exhibit a summary view of the revenue and expenditure for 1815 and several previous years, and a classified view of the items of revenue and expenditure in the year 1817:—

The postage revenue is under a secretary who corresponds with the head office in London. There are 730 post-offices, including sub-offices and receiving-houses, where letters are collected and transmitted to the nearest post-office. The gross annual income, during 10 years, was as follows. The penny postage commenced on the 10th of January, 1840, when the franking system was abolished.

1834, £240,472	1836, £255,080	1838, £254,435	1840, £101,563	1842, £132,430

The number of letters, including franks, during the existence of the franking system, for the last month of each of the years 1839 to 1842, both inclusive, and the two first months of 1843, was—

1839, December 29	225,889	1842, December 25	446,534
1840, December 20	381,306	1843, January 22	461,148
1841, December 19	425,681	1843, February 19	408,084

The benefit accruing to the lower classes by the facilities afforded for the transmission of small sums through the post-office, since the establishment of the penny postage, appears from the following table. There were transmitted in 1839, £111,864.	1840, £198,133.	1841, £461,295	1842, £503,543.

GOVERNMENT.

The constitution of Ireland, as to both its principles and by far the greater part of its materials, is identical with that of England, consisting of a legislative vested in king, lords, and commons, and an executive vested solely in the crown; and it differs almost solely in having the supreme executive deputed from the crown to a lord-lieutenant, and the subordinate executive committed to a separate or distinct staff of officers. The parliament, previous to the Legislative Union, was also distinct; and, besides materially differing in some great features from that of England, it materially differed at successive epochs from itself; but, as to all its intrinsic character, and even very nearly all its influence upon the present condition of the country, it is now the proper subject, not of statistic statement, but of history. The chief governor bore at former and successive periods the titles of justiciary, warden, lord-justice, and lord-lieutenant; and, at one time, he possessed so very high powers that he could appoint a lord-deputy to his office,—could convoke, prorogue, and dissolve parliaments at will,—could pass laws, in the style of royalty, without consulting the sovereign or his English ministers,—could control all the military authorities within Ireland,—and could summon at pleasure all the king's subjects to attend him in his public progress of either state or military operation. The lord-lieutenant now holds office during pleasure; but—except when a change occurs in the ministry and councils of the sovereign—he is generally continued during five years. “The extraordinary powers, trenching on the prerogative of royalty, which he formerly exercised,” says MacCulloch, “have been gradually lopped off, so that he is now little more than the organ for executing the ordinances of the British cabinet. He still, however, maintains an establishment of regal character, holds a court, is attended by officers of the household, for the support of which he receives a fixed annual salary of £20,000, two splendid residences, and several minor emoluments, among which the payment of his household by the crown is by no means trifling. He is aided in the discharge of his official duties by a privy-council, composed of all the great judicial functionaries, and other noblemen and gentlemen nominated by the crown. The approbation of this body is essential to give validity to many of the lord-lieutenant's acts. During his absence, or on his demise, his place is filled by lords-justices, who are generally the lord-chancellor, the archbishop of Armagh, and the commander of the forces. But the government of the country is in reality exercised by the lord-lieutenant's chief secretary, who is usually a member of the cabinet, and has an establishment of under-secretaries and clerks, in London and Dublin, to execute the details of his office. The charge of each county is given to a lord-lieutenant, aided by a number of deputy-lieutenants, all named by the chief governor, and acting gratuitously. Their recommendation has much weight in the appointment of the county magistracy, though the actual nomination of magistrates be vested in the lord-chancellor, who has also the power of superseding them. They act without salary. Latterly, a class of paid magistrates, called stipendiaries, has been established, appointed ostensibly to aid the other class, but who, in reality, perform the greater part of the executive duties, and are looked to by the government as more especially responsible for the preservation of the public peace. Their orders are carried into execution by a constabulary of between five and six thousand men, classed in three divisions of high constables, constables, and sub-constables. Cities and corporate towns have an executive of their own nomination, varying in name and powers according to the special provisions of their respective charters; but these, it is probable, will, at no distant period, be either materially modified or entirely set aside."

COURTS AND OFFICERS OF JUSTICE.

The Irish system of judicature closely resembles that of England; and, in its grand features of court of chancery, court of king's bench, court of exchequer, and circuit court of judicatory, was established by King John. The Court of Chancery is the highest court of judicature in Ireland; it is a court both of law and of equity; it holds pleas of various matters after the method of common law, and issues all original writs, commissions of bankruptcy, lunacy, &c.; and, as a court of equity, it moderates the rigours of the common law, and entertains cases in which the plaintiff is incapable, from such causes as having lost his bond, to obtain relief at common law. The court of chancery has also a general jurisdiction over matters beyond those in which inferior tribunals cannot adjudicate; it gives relief for and against infants, notwithstanding their minority; it adjudges the interests of married women, notwithstanding their coverture; it obliges executors to give security and pay interest for money which has been long in their possession; and it redresses frauds of all descriptions which cannot be remedied at common law. The lord-chancellor takes precedence of all peers except the primate; yet within the city of Dublin, he must give precedence also to the lord-mayor. The Master of the Rolls assists the lord-chancellor, and wields judicial powers subordinate to his; and he holds his office during good behaviour, while the lord-chancellor holds during pleasure.—The Court of King's Bench is the supreme court of common law. A chief justice and three puisne judges preside in this court, and are the sovereign conservators of the peace, and the supreme coroners of the land. The court has very extensive powers; it takes cognizance of both criminal and civil causes; it superintends all civil corporations; and it can reverse erroneous judgments of magistrates, and inflict punishment on both them and their officers for abuses of their authority.—The Court of Common Pleas is presided in by a chief justice and three puisne judges, and holds pleas of all civil causes at common law between subject and subject, in actions real, personal, and mixed, but it has no cognizance of pleas of the Crown.—The Court of Exchequer is presided in by a chief baron and three barons; it was originally intended to order the revenues of the Crown, but now consists of two divisions, the first of which manages the revenue, while the other is a court of record and of common law. The terms at which "the Four Courts" sit are Michaelmas, Hilary, Easter, and Trinity.—Courts of assize for criminal and civil pleas are held twice a-year in each county, by two of the judges of the superior courts; courts of quarter-sessions are held four times a-year by the assistant barrister of each county; and courts of petty-sessions are held often and in many places by the county magistrates.—The great courts which sit in Dublin, additional to those of Chancery, King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, "are the Prerogative Court, for the trial of ecclesiastical causes; the Court of Admiralty, for offences and suits of debt and damage on the high seas; the Court of Bankruptcy, which is held by commissioners appointed by the lord-lieutenant; and the Court of Insolvents. This court, constituted in 1821, for the relief of insolvent debtors, is presided over by two commissioners, who, besides their fixed court in Dublin, make circuits through the several counties, one commissioner visiting those in the northern provinces, and the other those in the southern. They are appointed by the lord-lieutenant. In order to diminish the expenses and delays attendant on the usual modes of proceeding in the superior courts of law, an act was passed in the reign of William III. for deciding cases of small debts by a summary process, called civil bill. The act, at first, was so inoperative as to be declared obsolete in the beginning of the reign of Anne, when it was revived; and it was further regulated by an act of 2 Geo. I. But the most important step towards removing the impediments to the attainment of justice by the great body of the people, both in criminal and civil cases, was the appointment of county courts of general session, for which purpose every county is divided into two districts, in each of which general sessions of the peace are held four times in the year by the resident magistrates, who are aided in their deliberations by an assistant barrister. The qualifications for this latter officer are, that he must be a practising barrister, and of six years' standing. He is ineligible to sit in parliament, and by a recent arrangement is prohibited from practising in the county in which he acts in a judicial capacity. By another late arrangement, magistrates are required to hold courts of petty-sessions for the investigation of minor criminal offences, which they had previously been in the habit of deciding in private. The effects of both these changes have been satisfactory. Every chartered city, town, and borough enjoys the right of holding courts under its own magistrates for the trial of criminal offences, and of civil actions. The nature and extent of the jurisdiction of these courts varies according to the terms of the charter. In some places it is very extensive, embracing cases of felony and of civil action to a large amount; but, according to the practice now universally acquiesced in, processes of a graver nature are referred to the king's judges during circuit. Every manor, of which the number is very considerable, is entitled to hold courts of record, as in cities and towns, but generally to a very limited extent. The presiding officer is the seneschal, appointed by the lord of the manor. The manor of St. Sepulchre's, of which the Archbishop of Dublin for the time being is lord, claims the right under its charter of inflicting capital punishment; but this right has never been exercised, at least in modern times."

In 1841, the census enumeration of "persons at and above 15 years of age, who ministered to justice," exhibits 29 judges, 69 stipendiary magistrates, 2 mayors, 16 sheriffs, 24 coroners, 14 seneschals, 754 barristers, 32 proctors, 2,572 attorneys, 24 clerks of the peace, 43 officers in courts of justice, 1 consular-agent, 26 public notaries, 87 scriveners, 12 clerks of petty-sessions, 147 law clerks, 3,806 excise and stamp officers, 33 civic officers, 9 inspectors of weights and measures, 9,721 constabulary and police, 1,398 bailiffs, 214 city constables, 6 town serjeants, 477 jail-keepers, 4 serjeants-at-mace, and 21 watchmen.

CRIME.

The state of crime during the years 1826—1836, as exhibited in the annual returns of the Inspectors-General of Prisons, was as follows:—

YEARS.	Number charged with crime.	Total Convictions.	Sentences, least and greatest.		Executions.	Proportion of Convictions to Population.
			6 Months' Imprisonment and under.	Capital.
1826	16,318	8,716	6,283	281	34	1 in 832

1836	23,891	18,110	13,464	175	14	1 in 442

In 1837, a new arrangement was adopted in the returns, to distinguish the lighter cases at petty-sessions and before magistrates, from the graver cases before the quarter-sessions and the assizes; and the state of crime from that time till the close of 1842, was as follows:—

YEARS.	Summary Convictions.		No. of Cases at Assizes and Quarter-Sessions.	Total Convicted.	Sentences, least and greatest.		Executions.	Proportion of Convictions to Population.
	Petty Offences.	Drunkenness.			6 Months' Imprisonment and under.	Capital.
1837	9,649	8,769	14,804	9,536	6,186	154	10	1 in 839
1838	9,760	16,461	15,723	9,609	6,349	39	3	1 in 882
1839	16,812	38,678	26,392	12,049	7,726	26	17	1 in 666
1840	15,261	23,227	23,833	11,194	6,976	43	0	1 in 715
1841	13,177	28,649	20,796	9,287	5,624	40	5	1 in 680
1842	17,009	17,396	21,186	9,874	5,973	25	4	1 in 628

The following table exhibits the amount of crime in Ireland, and the amount of crime in England and Wales, during the years 1831—1842; it affords a ready means of comparing these amounts, with the aid of the simple fact that the population of Ireland is very nearly one-half of that of England and Wales; and it also gives a definite statement of the proportion of convictions to population in each year and in each country:—

The returns of crime arrange offences into 6 classes; 1. Against the person; 2. Against property, with violence; 3. Against property without violence; 4. Against property maliciously; 5. Forgery and base coin; 6. Miscellaneous offences. Each of these classes includes offences of the greatest and least enormity; and in the year 1842, the number of greatest and least crimes in each class, and in each country, was, in

From 1818 till 1824, the punishment of death was abolished for twenty-one kinds of offences, on account of which there had been no executions during several preceding years; in 1832, it was abolished for the stealing of horses, cattle, and sheep, larceny of £5 in a house, coining, and most kinds of forgery; in 1834, it was abolished for the offence of returning from transportation; in 1835, for letter-stealing in the post-office, and for sacrilege; and, in 1837, for all crimes except murder, high-treason, rape, arson, and a few others of rare occurrence. A diminution of the number of executions was, of course, not effected by the abolitions of 1818—1824; but it began to be rapid and great after 1832, and it has eventually—even in spite of convictions for other offences—become practically commensurate with convictions for the worst cases of murder.

PRISONS.

The Inspectors-general of the Prisons of Ireland derive their powers from an act of parliament passed in 1826, and consolidating all previous Prison Acts; and they annually inspect and report upon each prison of every description in the kingdom. "In 1821, when we commenced our important duties," say they in their Report for 1841, "we found the county gaols of Ireland (with a few valuable exceptions, such as Limerick and Cork), in a state very unpleasant to revert to. They were for the most part scenes of filth, fraud, and vice, with scarcely one good resident officer, without accommodation, clothing, classification, employment, inspection, school instruction, order, or cleanliness; the law totally disregarded, male and female prisoners often not separated, spirits sold openly in many gaols, and frequently by the under-officers. The expenditure in the diet amounting to 9d., and in some cases 1s. per head per day, which was a manifest fraud on the county, going on for years unobserved or at least unnoticed; the families of prisoners being frequently fed from the overplus food issued to each prisoner—this fact can scarcely be credited, were it not that the commissioners frequently found small bags of meal in the cells, and on asking the reason, it was averred that it was the saving of the daily issue, kept for handing over to visitors on the market days. In the reports of that day these defects were noticed; and, in the following year, the grand juries in general took up the subject of prison discipline, the evils complained of were gradually removing, and new gaols or additions were in progress of building, or being presented for, in the counties of Cork City, Drogheda, Roscommon, City of Limerick, Sligo, Monaghan, Longford, Leitrim, Londonderry, Galway, Clare, Kilkenny, Louth, and Dublin. Limerick and Cork counties had already built new gaols, and commenced improvements in discipline. In a very few years after, the following counties built large additions or new gaols, viz., Carlow, Donegal, Tyrone, Down, Cavan, Kerry, King's County, Queen's County, Mayo, and Tipperary. And, finally, within these few years, the following counties have erected new gaols, presented for, or are building additions:—Antrim, Westmeath, Meath, Kildare, Waterford County, Wexford, Fermanagh, Town of Galway. And there remain yet to be built—Armagh, City of Kilkenny, City of Waterford, and Dublin City (Newgate). And some of the latter are town gaols, where the grand juries are looking forward to sending their prisoners to the county gaol under the Corporation Act. It is true that in the progress of prison discipline, and the increase of crime with the population, many of the above prisons require additional cells, and steps are annually taken to provide them. But, on the whole, none of the evils detailed now exist, nor can exist without being known, inquired into, and remedied. In most of the prisons, a new grade of qualified governors and under-officers are provided, as vacancies occurred, from the good feeling of high sheriffs, who have liberally abandoned their patronage to the grand juries, boards of superintendence, or inspectors-general of prisons, and these local boards of superintendence, which were a new creation under the Prison Act of 1826, have, in almost every instance, worked well, and to their zeal is owing most of the improvements in the Irish gaol department. Classification of prisoners according to crime, is a new feature within these 20 years, and in every gaol it is carried on to a considerable extent. The employment and industry of prisoners are increasing, and in some degree to be found in all Irish gaols, without exception. The inspection of a turnkey over each class and school instruction is the practice in each gaol, and a gaol dress for every prisoner is very general; and the cleanliness and good order of all the county prisons is borne testimony to by the judges of assize, and many strangers who now frequently visit these establishments. One more vital improvement remains to be noticed, viz.: the change from licentiousness to order in the female side of the prison. The act of 1826 provided for matrons and female assistants to regulate the female criminals, and now, in all gaols, they are separated from the male classes, clothed, instructed, and employed, frequently visited by benevolent ladies, under the regulations of Mrs. Fry; and the result has been the reform of many poor criminals, whose case must have been hopeless under the former vicious system, previous to 1820, when almost promiscuous intercourse was permitted in some gaols without control or inspection."

In reference to Bridewells, the inspectors-general say, "The minor prisons of Ireland under this head, amount to about 110, and, in 1821, amounted to 140, including manor court prisons. They were all, with four exceptions, literally black holes or dungeons, and so called commonly; there was no registry of the inmates, no food, or inspection; and committals to them, as well as discharges, were unknown beyond the immediate neighbourhood. It was a system opening a door for the greatest abuse; and the commissioners say they could detail instances of prisoners being detained for months in them, and being allowed to sleep out of them at night, as an act of necessary benevolence. It is gratifying to state that this national nuisance has been swept away by the Prison Act of 1826, submitted by the commissioners to the Right. Hon. Henry Goulburn, then chief secretary of Ireland, who took much pains to correct all these abuses, and worded much of the act himself, by altering and correcting some of the suggestions. Almost all the manor court prisons, and several bridewells, were abolished by this act of parliament, and the remainder placed under sound regulations and checks; inspection was provided for, quarterly returns made to the commissioners' office of all committals and discharges, and food secured for the prisoners, repairs enforced, and furniture obtained."

In reference to Lunatic Asylums, the inspectors-general say, "The places of confinement, public and private, are placed, by act of parliament, under the commissioners' inspection. The only public asylums that existed when they commenced duty in 1821, for the cure of this malady, were those of Dublin and Cork, exclusive of a few private asylums, chiefly in the neighbourhood of Dublin, which were conducted on humane and judicious principles; all others were temporary receptacles for idiots and incurable cases, in the gaols and houses of industry scattered through the county towns, and where no means could be provided for the cure and proper care of such patients. Classification and healthy employment could not be obtained in such places, and their cases appeared hopeless. At the commissioners' suggestion, in the year 1823, an act of parliament passed, legalizing district lunatic asylums, at the joint expense of three or more counties. In the following year, three of them were in progress of building, viz., at Armagh, Limerick, and Belfast: regulations were made by the commissioners, and approved of by government, for regulating these asylums, and there now exist nine of them, on a large scale, including in their several districts every county in Ireland. Thus is established a national school for discovering the best mode of treating this disease, a ground-work is laid for a house of reception for all pauper cases of lunacy or idiotism in the kingdom, only requiring an additional wing to the building, as numbers increase. The management of these asylums, both medical and moral, has met with universal approbation, and the cures effected, and convalescents sent home, are proofs of the soundness of the treatment. The expense is heavy on the public doubtless, and no pains should be spared to lessen it; but as a great national effort to relieve all such cases, the commissioners are of opinion it is not equalled in Europe or America."

The new feature of prison discipline—the total separation of prisoners from one another by means of separate cells by day and night and separate yards for exercise—is thus noticed by the inspectors-general of 1841: "In the commencement of the last year, the Irish Commissioners obtained an act of parliament legalizing this separation under regulations; the subject was brought before the grand juries in Ireland, and the boards of superintendence, by a circular letter from the commissioners, accompanied by a small plan for heating and ventilating the cells, and enlarging a few of them, with the view of gradually commencing the system, on economical terms, and trying by experiment its effects, previous to recommending so large an outlay as altering the entire prison would cost; and it is but right to state, that the then inspectors-general of prisons had some doubts as to the expediency of the system being adopted at once, without some checks and protection being first established against the possibility of its degenerating into any thing like cruelty, from the want of sufficient guards and inspection, or into injury to the health of individuals, from too continued a confinement, unless accompanied by constant employment, the use of books, and frequent intercourse with officers or visitors, not prisoners."

In 1842, the number of district lunatic asylums was 10, of bridewells 105, of city or town prisons 14, and of county gaols 34. One of the lunatic asylums, situated at the city of Armagh, served for the counties of Armagh, Cavan, Monaghan, and Fermanagh; one at Limerick, for Limerick, Clare, and Kerry; one at Belfast, for Antrim and Down; one at Londonderry, for Londonderry, Donegal, and Tyrone; one at Dublin, for Dublin, Meath, Louth, and Wicklow; one at Maryborough, for Queen's county, King's county, Westmeath, and Longford; one at Carlow, for Carlow, Kilkenny, Kildare, and Wexford; one at Ballinasloe, for Galway, Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, and Leitrim; one at Waterford, for Waterford; and one at Clonmel, for Tipperary. Three of the bridewells were in the county of Antrim, 4 in Armagh, 3 in Cavan, 3 in Donegal, 1 in Down, 1 in Fermanagh, 2 in Leitrim, 3 in Londonderry, 1 in Louth, 2 in Mayo, 2 in Meath, 2 in Monaghan, 4 in Roscommon, 1 in Sligo, 3 in Tyrone, 1 in Westmeath, 5 in Clare, 17 in Cork, 7 in Galway, 8 in Kerry, 3 in Kilkenny, 1 in King's county, 6 in Limerick, 3 in Queen's county, 11 in Tipperary, 2 in Waterford, 3 in Wexford, and 1 in Wicklow. Two of the county gaols are at respectively Athy and Naas in the county of Kildare; two are at respectively Clonmel and Nenagh in the county of Tipperary; and one is at the assize-town of each of the other counties. Tread-mills exist in 29 of the county gaols; and those of Cavan and Cork are the minimum and the maximum of the 29 mills, and have an ascent per day of respectively 240 and 14,400 feet. The cost of the diet of the prisoners ranges from 2½d. per day in the county gaol of Carlow, to 5½d. per day in the city gaol of Kilkenny. The total expenditure of the county, city, and town gaols was £85,424 0s. 1d. in 1841, and £82,664 8s. 3½d. in 1842.

CONSTABULARY.

An efficient police force, maintained in terms of an act of 6 William IV. exists and acts in every county, city, and town of Ireland. They are clothed in the uniform of the Rifle Brigade, they constantly carry fire-arms, and are in a state of efficient discipline; a few are mounted as cavalry; and all parties and classes are at all times available as a military force. Small bodies of three or five men each are stationed at almost all the villages, at many of the hamlets, and even at places where no clusters of houses exist; and these, besides preserving the peace in small circumjacent districts, carry expresses from station to station, escort prisoners, and promulgate government notices and proclamations. The force is classified as sub-constables, constables, head-constables, sub-inspectors, and county inspectors; each of the classes is again classified into first, second, and third rates; and the men are promoted from rate to rate, and from class to class, according to their good conduct and the length of their service. The effective strength of the force, on January 1, 1843, consisted of

The total of these sums is £432,682 10s. 1½d.; and the total, after the addition of some general items, is £441,605 5s. 11½d. The proportion of this total cost borne by the consolidated fund of the empire was £263,473 5s. 2d.; and the proportion borne by the counties, cities, and towns of Ireland was £178,132 0s. 9½d. In 1843, the total expense of the constabulary force was £436,152. In 1836-7, the first year of its re-organization, it was £357,275. A statement of the number and salaries of stipendiary magistrates has already been given in the section on 'Government.'

MILITARY.

The disembodied militia of Ireland consists of 346 officers and 326 staff; and is maintained at the annual cost of £33,589. The arms in possession of the yeomanry of Ireland are distributed principally in Ulster, and consist of 25,360 muskets, 30 pistols, 357 carbines, and 1,398 spears.—The total of military, rank and file, quartered in Ireland on the first day of each of the years 1833—40, was as follows :—

		RANK AND FILE.			TOTAL.
		Cavalry.	Artillery.	Infantry.
1st January	1833	2,064	873	21,061	23,998
"	1834	2,389	873	19,823	23,085

"	1840	873	743	13,340	14,956

The total of military, rank and file, quartered in Ireland in December, 1843, was 21,210; these were distributed in the proportions of 6,788 within the military district of Dublin, 2,894 within that of Belfast, 4,210 within that of Athlone, 3,445 within that of Limerick, and 3,873 within that of Cork; and they consisted of 51 sappers and miners, 1,045 artillery, 69 marine artillery, 2,090 cavalry, 17,295 infantry, and 628 marines. The cost of a regiment, according to the parliamentary estimates, is from £17,000 to £27,000 a-year; and the following is the computed annual cost of the above force, the computation being based upon the data furnished in the army, navy, and ordnance estimates of the preceding session of parliament:—

REPRESENTATION.

In 1793, no fewer than 200 of the 300 members of the Irish House of Commons were asserted by Mr. Grattan to be the nominees of private individuals; and from 40 to 50 were understood to be each returned by a constituency of not more than 10 electors. The Irish parliament, just before the Legislative Union, abolished 83 nomination boroughs, and voted £1,245,000 of compensation to their owners or 'patrons,' as compensation for disfranchisement; the Act of Union reduced the number of representatives in the House of Commons to 100; and the Reform Bill, in the reign of William IV., added 5 to this number. The present temporal peers of Ireland, 204 in number, send 28 of their number to represent them for life in the House of Lords; the bishops send 4 of their number in rotation to represent them in the House of Lords; and the constituencies of the counties, the university, and the boroughs, send respectively 64, 2, and 39 members to represent them in the House of Commons. The present state of the franchise is shown by the following tables:—

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

The Commissioners appointed to inquire into the affairs of the Municipal Corporations of Ireland, presented to parliament their voluminous reports and appendices in 1835; and, according to their statements in these documents, they found that 99 corporations appeared to have exercised corporate functions during the last century,—that 7 other municipalities which possessed parliamentary franchise at the Legislative Union were, at not very remote periods, corporate bodies, constituted under royal charters still on record,—that 5 other municipalities which possessed parliamentary franchise, had no charter of incorporation, but are noticed in ancient records as having had either a corporate capacity or burgage tenure,—that 6 other boroughs, possessed charters of parliamentary franchise, but had not the character of municipal corporations,—that 25 other ancient towns, villages, or quondam seats of population possessed some historical claims to early municipal character, but have not figured in modern times as municipalities, and are not known to have ever had parliamentary franchise,—that only 63 of all the municipal corporations of the kingdom appeared to be effectively existing, or to be exercising corporate functions, at the date of the Commissioners' reports,—that the corporations of 30 towns became extinct between 1800 and 1835,—that 8 other towns, once corporate and municipal, but now without any effective corporations, continued to possess either some exercise of corporate functions, or some remnant of corporate property,—that in only 23 of the existing effective corporations had the commonalty or freemen, directly or indirectly, a voice in or control over the election of the corporate officers, or the management of some of the corporate business,—that 44 of the total number of corporate towns either existed as such by prescription, or had municipal character previous to the reign of James I.,—and that of the remaining number of municipal corporations, 46 were created by James I. 1 by Charles I., and 15 by Charles II. Irrespective of the Corporations, an act was passed in the 9th year of George IV., ch. 82, for enabling Commissioners to be elected in every city and town in Ireland, to light, pave, and cleanse their respective districts; and by a return to the House of Commons, No. 632, dated August 24th, 1843, the names of the Commissioners of each town, and the number and value of the houses rated since the commencement of the act being brought into operation, are fully detailed.

A new municipal act which came into operation in November, 1841, divides each borough of 12,000 or upwards of inhabitants into wards, appoints it to be governed by a chief magistrate and by a certain number of aldermen and councillors, vests the election of the aldermen and councillors in the inhabitants of each ward who are entitled to vote by right of their property, recognizes the chief magistrate of Dublin as Lord Mayor, and that of each other borough as either mayor, sovereign, provost, or portreeve, and renders all former corporations of the boroughs defunct.—The total number of parliamentary boroughs, since the Reform Act, is 33; and some of these are wholly civic, while others are partly civic and partly rural. Those wholly civic are Armagh, Athlone, Bandon, Belfast, Carlow, Clonmel, Coleraine, Dundalk, Dungannon, Ennis, Enniskillen, Kinsale, Londonderry, Mallow, New Ross, Tralee, Wexford, and Youghal; and those which have rural districts as well as civic are Carrickfergus, Cashel, Cork, Downpatrick, Drogheda, Dublin, Dungarvan, Galway, Kilkenny, Limerick, Lisburn, Newry, Portarlington, Sligo, and Waterford.

EDUCATION.

"The following table," say the Commissioners of the Census of 1841, "will show the proportions to the population 5 years old and upwards, of the number of ignorant, together with some other interesting comparisons. The counties are arranged according to the order of their education:—

COUNTIES AND TOWNS.	Per cent. of the population who can neither Read nor Write, 5 years old and up.	Per cent. of the popula- tion from 5 to 15 attending Schools.	Ratio which the numbers of persons ministering to Education bear to the population between 5 and 15 years of age.	COUNTIES AND TOWNS. For the purpose of conveying to the eye a general representation of the degree in which total ignorance of elementary instruction still prevails in the several counties, we annex a shaded map,* by which it will be seen that, in a large portion of the island, there is still considerable darkness. In shading this map, the towns have been taken out, so that the map indicates only the state of the rural districts. The following table indicates the per centage of the same class in towns also arranged according to the order of their education:—

The comparison of this map with that of population,* will show that density of population is favourable to education, when in districts having facility of communication or affording contiguity of residence. Thus the district south and east of Lough Neagh contrasts favourably with the county of Kerry, although in relation to arable land, the latter is actually the most densely peopled. The difference, of course, is simply caused by the large extent of mountain and pasture, and consequent difficulty of communication. The remarkable accordance of this map with that which represents house-accommodation* is very striking. It is, however, beyond our province to discuss the circumstances which may tend to perpetuate the lower class of houses. Still we may observe, that bad house-accommodation and defective education seem to accompany each other. But whether the one or the other be cause or effect, there can be little doubt that the removal of either would be soon followed by the amelioration of the other.

By combining a knowledge of the class of education of each individual with the age, we obtain a more or less certain measure of the degree in which youth were instructed, and the rate at which elementary education has been advancing during several successive periods. To reduce these facts to a tabular form, it is only necessary to assume that the period of life for the class of education of which we treat lies within the age of from 5 to 15 years; and then carry back the present survivors to the respective periods when they were between those ages, and consider them as the representatives of the state of society during those periods. Thus, there are now 194,079 males whose ages range from 56 to 65; the period during which these persons were between 5 and 15 years old was from 1781 to 1790. The following is the division of this number according to their education:—

78,510 who can read and write;
23,394 who can read only;
92,175 who can neither read nor write;

which, being reduced to proportions of 100, gives the following relative rates:—

40 per cent. who can read and write;
12 „ who can read only;

which indicates the extent of education afforded by the means which were in operation from 1781 to 1790. It is true that this is a comparison of survivors alone. We have no means of knowing whether the remainder of the contemporary population were more or less educated, but there is no reason to suppose that those who died were differently educated from those who survived. We feel, therefore, that there is no apparent cause why we should not take the survivors as the representatives of the whole; at all events, in those decades, for which the numbers are probably too large to be affected by any accidental causes."

In 1834 the number of daily schools in Ireland was 9,537; and of these 8,886 made returns of their attendance, and 771 made no returns; 5,633 were supported wholly by fees, and 4,004 were supported wholly or partially by endowment or subscription. The 8,886 which made returns had on their books 353,809 males, 223,900 females, and 5,700 children whose sex was not specified; and 771 which made no returns were computed to be attended by 30,886 children. Of the 4,004 which were supported wholly or partially by endowment or subscription, 892 were in connection with the National Board, 203 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 115 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, 235 with the Kildare Place Society, and 618 with the London Hibernian Society. Some brief notices of the most important of these educational boards and societies will be found in our article on the city of Dublin.

The receipts of the National Board during the year ending on March 31, 1843, included £55,000 of treasury issues, and amounted to £60,460 5s. 4d.; and the disbursements during that year included £2,859 2s. 4d. for the normal establishment, £9,883 10s. 3d. for schoolhouses, and £29,736 13s. 3d. for salaries and gratuities to teachers, and amounted to £63,146.

LITERATURE.

A view of the ancient literature of Ireland belongs properly to chapters on Antiquities and Ecclesiastical History; and a view of the country's modern literature—as far at least as regards the publication of literary works of any considerable moment—unhappily belongs almost wholly to the article on the city of Dublin. A large and highly respectable amount of literary excellence, indeed, is diffused among the nobility, the magistracy, the clergy, and a portion of the general community of the country; and a very fair proportion of this excellence has of late been displayed in the various walks of authorship; yet very nearly all of it is either the mere qualification and ornament of professional pursuit, or connects itself with the enlargement of literature and science solely through the presses of Dublin or of London. Any attempt, therefore, to make separate and general statistics of the literature of Ireland would either be a redundancy or a failure. All we can with effect do, under the head of Literature, is simply to throw together two or three superficial and slenderly connected particulars.

The colleges for theology, science, and literature, and the schools of medicine and surgery in Ireland, are Trinity College, Dublin, incorporated in 1591, and opened for students in 1593; the College of St. Columba, in the county of Meath, opened on Aug. 1, 1843, in strict and exclusive connection with the United Church of England and Ireland; the Royal College of St. Patrick, at Maynooth, instituted by act of parliament, in 1795, for the education of Roman Catholics; St. Patrick's College at Carlow, St. Jarlath's College at Tuam, and St. Patrick's College at Armagh, for the education of Roman Catholics; the Roman Catholic College at Dublin for Foreign Missions; the Royal Belfast Academical Institution, practically for the education of Protestant Dissenting ministers; the Belfast Academy, instituted in 1786; the King and Queen's College of Physicians in Ireland, founded by charter of Charles II.; the School of Physic in Ireland; the Association of Graduates in Medicine of Trinity College, Dublin, instituted in 1837; the Association of Members of the King and Queen's College of Physicians in Ireland, instituted in 1816; the Royal College of Surgeons in Ireland; the School of Surgery; the Dublin Obstetrical Society, established in 1838; the Theatre of Anatomy and School of Medicine and Surgery, in Peter-street, Dublin; the Apothecaries' Hall of Ireland; the School of Medicine of the Apothecaries' Hall of Ireland; the Society of Apothecaries, established in 1835; and the Medical Association of Ireland, established in 1839. The principal literary and scientific institutions have their seat in Dublin, and are the Royal Dublin Society, the Royal Irish Academy, the Royal Hibernian Academy, the Royal Irish Art Union, the Royal Zoological Society, the Geological Society, the Dublin Natural History Society, the Civil Engineers' Society of Ireland, the Royal Institute of Architects, the Dublin Mechanics' Institution, the Royal Agricultural Society, the Royal Horticultural Society, and the Practical Floral and Horticultural Society. One hundred and two local farming societies exist throughout Ireland, in connection with the Royal Agricultural Society. The number of newspapers in the course of publication in the boroughs of Ireland, at the close of 1843, were 7 in Belfast, 1 in Carlow, 1 in Ennis, 3 in Cork, 1 in Ballyshannon, 1 in Downpatrick, 2 in Newry, 22 in Dublin, 2 in Enniskillen, 1 in Tuam, 2 in Galway, 3 in Tralee, 2 in Kilkenny, 2 in Limerick, 3 in Londonderry, 1 in Longford, 2 in Drogheda, 1 in Ballina, 2 in Castlebar, 1 in Achill, 1 in Monaghan, 1 in Maryborough, 2 in Boyle, 2 in Sligo, 1 in Nenagh, 2 in Clonmel, 3 in Waterford, 2 in Athlone, and 2 in Wexford. The number of stamps issued for newspapers for a series of years from 1827 to 1841, both inclusive, shows an increase of circulation of nearly double the amount at its commencement:—

Years.	Stamps.	Years.	Stamps.	Years.	Stamps.
1827	3,545,846	1832	4,458,990	1837	5,262,211

Total	10,780,644	Total	14,600,173

Increased consumption of paper during the last four years, 3,819,529 lbs.

In 1841, the number of letterpress printers in Ireland was 1717, of copperplate printers 18, of lithographic printers 20, of bookbinders 692, of map-mounters 7, of stationers 153, of booksellers and stationers 336, and of print-sellers 12.

RELIGION.

The established church of Ireland is Protestant Episcopalian, closely modelled upon the Anglican, and so intimately connected with it that the two are often styled the United Church of England and Ireland. The original episcopacy of Ireland comprised a very large though unascertained number of bishoprics; it afterwards became, for many centuries, reduced to 32; and it eventually suffered a consolidation of these 32, first into 22, and next into 12. All the thirty-two dioceses still continue distinct in statistics; all have a separate constitution and separate officers; and the names of all are as fully retained in topography as if each had still its own bishop. Four of the thirty-two, down to the period of the last and recent consolidation, were archbishoprics,—Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam; and the occupants of them were entitled respectively the Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland, the Primate and Metropolitan of Ireland, the Primate and Metropolitan of Munster, and the Primate and Metropolitan of Connaught. The sees suffragan to Armagh were Dromore, Down, Connor, Derry, Raphoe, Clogher, Kilmore, Ardagh, and Meath; those suffragan to Dublin were Kildare, Ossory, Ferns, and Leighlin; those suffragan to Cashel were Emly, Waterford, Lismore, Cork, Ross, Cloyne, Limerick, Ardfert, Killaloe, and Kilfenora; and those suffragan to Tuam were Clonfert, Kilmacduagh, Elphin, Killalla, and Achonry. The ten unions of sees which reduced the number of bishops to 22, and for a long period limited the hierarchy to that number, were Connor with Down, Ardagh with Tuam, Leighlin with Ferns, Emly with Cashel, Lismore with Waterford, Ross with Cork, Ardfert with Limerick, Kilfenora with Killaloe, Kilmacduagh with Clonfert, and Achonry with Killalla. Three other consolidated dioceses survive more or less in name, and in some remnant of their chapters, but have lost their distinctive limits and statistics; and these are Glendalough united to Dublin, Clonmacnoise united to Meath, and Aghadoe united to Ardfert. The Church Temporalities Act of 1833 reduced the archbishoprics of Cashel and Armagh to the rank of bishoprics, transferred to the province of Armagh the bishoprics of Tuam, Killalla, Achonry, and Elphin, in the province of Tuam, transferred to the province of Dublin all the bishoprics in the province of Cashel, and the bishoprics of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh in the province of Tuam, remodelled the arrangement of several amounts of episcopal revenue, ordained the consolidation of all the sees of Ireland under 2 archbishops and 10 bishops, and appointed the consolidation to be effected gradually on the demise of the several bishops whose sees were to be united. The twelve principal sees, under the act, together with the see or sees united to each, are—in the province of Armagh—Armagh with Clogher, Meath without any annexation, Derry with Raphoe, Down with Connor and Dromore, Kilmore with Ardagh and Elphin, and Tuam with Killalla and Achonry; and—in the province of Dublin,—Dublin with Kildare, Ossory with Leighlin and Ferns, Cashel with Emly, Waterford, and Lismore, Cloyne with Cork and Ross, Killaloe with Kilfenora, Clonfert, and Kilmacduagh, and Limerick with Ardfert. The only dioceses which the new arrangement did not affect as to their extent or annexation, were Meath unannexed and Limerick united to Ardfert. At the close of 1843, the diocese of Clogher still continued separate from Armagh, and the diocese of Kildare from Dublin; so that the number of bishops, including the two archbishops, was then 14. The order of precedence is the archbishop of Armagh, the archbishop of Dublin, the bishop of Meath, the bishop of Kildare, and the other bishops according to the date of their consecration. The episcopal income is derived principally from lands let upon lease of 21 years, and renewed from time to time at the originally small rent upon payment of fines of fluctuating amount; and, on an average of three years ending in December, 1831, it amounted to £151,127 12s. 4½d. gross, and £128,808 8s. 3½d. nett; but, under the new arrangement, it is reduced to £82,953,—leaving a balance of £68,175 to be managed by a Board of Commissioners for the general purposes of ecclesiastical discipline and education. The proprietor of the district called the Lordship of Newry, is the only party who wields episcopal power within that district,—holding his ecclesiastical court, and granting licences of marriages and probates of wills, under the seal of the religious house to which the Lordship belonged prior to the Reformation; the warden of Galway wields a peculiar power, closely akin to that of a bishop, within the parishes of the wardenship of Galway; and the deans of Lismore, St. Canice, St. Patrick, and Christ-church, exercise peculiar jurisdictions within their respective deaneries. Three of the 32 dioceses, Meath, Kilmore, and Ardagh, have neither chapter, cathedral, nor economy; and the first of these has, in lieu of the chapter, a synod presided over by the archdeacon, and consisting of all the beneficed clergymen of the diocese. The corporations of deans and chapters are 30 in number, the diocese of Dublin having two, and each of the remaining 28 dioceses one. The majority of the deans and chapters consist of a dean, a precentor, a chancellor, a treasurer, an archdeacon, and prebendaries,—the last varying in number, from one as in Dromore to 20 as in St. Patrick's of Dublin. The order of precedence among the precentors, chancellors, treasurers, and archdeacons, varies in different chapters; and the offices of dean, precentor, chancellor, treasurer, and archdeacon, are usually styled dignities, though only such of them are legally so as have annexed to them ecclesiastical jurisdiction. In the chapters of Tuam, Derry, Raphoe, and Clonfert, there is neither precentor, chancellor, nor treasurer; in those of Elphin, Killalla, and Achonry, there is neither chancellor nor treasurer; in those of Clogher and Emly, there is no treasurer; in those of Kildare and Waterford, the archdeacons are not members of the chapters; in those of Tuam and Kilmacduagh, there is a provost; in that of Clonfert, there is a sacrist or sacristan; in those of Waterford, Ardferd, and Kilfenora, there are no prebendaries; in that of Killaloe, there are no prebendaries, though 7 are in the diocese; in that of Kildare, there are 4 canons but no prebendaries, though 8 of the latter are in the diocese. The chapters of Waterford, Kildare, and Leighlin have peculiar though quite different usages with respect to the application of their corporate revenues; the chapters of Clogher, Connor, Dromore, Raphoe, Ferns, Ardferd, Kilfenora, Clonfert, Elphin, Kilmacduagh, Killalla, and Achonry, have no corporate revenues; and the chapters of Armagh, Christ-church-Dublin, St. Patrick's-Dublin, Down, Leighlin, St. Canice-Kilkenny, Cashel, Emly, Waterford, Lismore, Limerick, Cork, Ross, Cloyne, Killaloe, and Tuam, have economy estates, whose proceeds are applied to the maintenance of the fabric and the officers of the cathedrals. Corporations of minor canons exist in the cathedrals of St. Patrick's-Dublin, and Ardferd, for the purpose of duly maintaining cathedral service; and corporations of vicars choral exist in the cathedrals of Armagh, Christ-church-Dublin, St. Patrick's-Dublin, St. Canice-Kilkenny, Limerick, Cashel, Lismore, Cork, Ross, Cloyne, and Tuam, for the purpose of the due performance of choral services.

The number of deans is 33; of precentors, 26; of chancellors, 22; of treasurers, 22; of archdeacons, 34,—there being two in the diocese of Dublin, and two in that of Ardferd and Aghadoc; of provosts, 2; and of sacristans, 1. The total number of dignitaries, in the common acceptation of that word, is 39; and the total number of prebendaries and of canons is respectively 178 and 9. "The duties, for the most part, of the dignitaries and prebendaries, as such," say the Commissioners of Ecclesiastical Enquiry, "appear to be preaching in rotation with the other members of each chapter, in the respective cathedral churches; attending chapter meetings; and, in some instances, the occasional management and superintendence of the economy-estates, with the exception of the prebendaries of Christ-church-Dublin, who are charged with the additional duty of a daily attendance, each in turn, upon the morning and evening services in the cathedral throughout the year. The archdeacons are not merely members of the respective chapters, but in some instances, as officers of the dioceses at large, have also certain duties to perform, such as the examination of candidates for holy orders, attendance at all ordinations, consecrations of churches, and confirmations; but the last two duties, it would seem, are not necessarily attached to the office of archdeacon in this country, and in many dioceses are not undertaken by the archdeacons unless called on by their respective ordinaries. New duties, however, have been lately imposed on them, under and by virtue of the 127 section in the Church Temporalities Act, which provides, 'that the several archdeacons in Ireland shall have and exercise all such powers, rights, authorities, privileges, and jurisdictions within their respective archdeaconries, as any archdeacons in England have or exercise within their respective archdeaconries by any law, statute, canon, or general custom, in force in England;' by virtue whereof they now, like the archdeacons in England, may visit the clergy of their respective archdeaconries, although they are not empowered to hold diocesan visitations, as the bishops do, or those commissioned by them, as the vicars-general usually are. The aforesaid duties are however wholly distinct from, and exclusive of, those which archdeacons, dignitaries, and prebendaries, may have to perform as parish ministers; for in many instances there are annexed to several of the dignities and prebends one, two, or more benefices, with cure of souls attached, which form the corps of these dignities and prebends, respectively; and wherever such annexation exists, the incumbent-dignitary or prebendary has all the duties of a parochial minister cast upon him.

"The dignities, which have not benefices with cure of souls annexed to them, are the nine deaneries of Armagh, Clonmacnoise, Dromore, Christ-church-Dublin, St. Patrick's-Dublin, Lismore, Ross, Tuam, and Clonfert;—the nine precentorships of St. Patrick's-Dublin, St. Canice-Kilkenny, Waterford, Lismore, Ross, Elphin, Kilmacduagh, Killalla, and Achonry;—the five chancellorships of Christ-Church-Dublin, Kildare, Emly, Lismore, and Ross;—the five treasurerhips of Down, Christ-Church-Dublin, St. Patrick's-Dublin, Ross, and Kilmacduagh;—the eleven archdeaconries of Raphoe, Kilmore, Ardagh, Kildare, Ross, Kilfenora, Tuam, Clonfert, Kilmacduagh, Killalla, and Achonry;—the two provostships of Tuam and Clonfert;—and the sacristship of Clonfert—thereby making of dignitaries forty-two in number, who have not any cure of souls annexed to their offices; and it may be added, with regard to the five archdeaconries of Raphoe, Kilmore, Ardagh, Kildare, and Killalla, that there are little or no emoluments thereunto belonging. There are also fifty-two prebends without having any benefices with cure of souls annexed to them; namely, the seven prebends of Swords, Yagoe, Wicklow, Timothan, Castleknock, Tassagard, and Maynooth, in the cathedral church of St. Patrick's-Dublin;—the prebend of Castropetre, in the cathedral of Kildare;—the prebend of Kilrane, in that of Ferns;—the seven prebends of Seskenane, Kilgobinet, Dysart, Kilrosanty, Modeligo, Clashmore, and Tulloghorton, in the cathedral of Lismore;—the prebends of Dollardstown, in the cathedral of Emly;—of Liscleary and Holy Trinity in that of Cork;—of Curraghanmore, in that of Ross;—Kilmacdonough, in that of Cloyne;—and those of Lockeen, Clonadagad, Dysert, Tullogh, and Rath, in that of Killaloe;—the five prebends of Killabeggs, Taghsaxon, Kilmoylan, Faldown, and Laccagh, in the cathedral of Tuam;—the four of Kilmacallane, Kilgoghlin, Kilcooley, and Tirebrine, in that of Elphin;—the eight prebends of Fenore, Anacalla, Kilconnell, Killaspicmoylan, Kilteskil, Droughta, Ballynoulter, and Kilquane, in the cathedral of Clonfert;—the two of Kinvarra and Island-Eddy, in that of Kilmacduagh;—the five of Killanley, Errew, Ardagh, Lackan, and Rosserkbeg, in that of Killalla;—and the two prebends of Killaraght and Kilmovee, in the cathedral church of Achonry;—but it is to be observed, that the prebend of Timothan, in St. Patrick's cathedral, Dollardstown in that of Emly, and Killanley, in that of Killalla, exist merely in name, not having any fruits or emoluments whatever belonging to them; while the annual proceeds of other prebends are extremely small, not amounting in some cases to ten pounds per annum, and in many not exceeding forty pounds per annum, as is the case with some of those in the province of Tuam. It appears, also, that there are four prebends, without cure, annexed to the episcopal dignity, namely, that of Cullen to the archiepiscopal see of Dublin; those of Glankee and Isertlaurence to the archiepiscopal see of Cashel; and that of Athnet to the episcopal see of Limerick; and in right of their prebendal offices, these dignitaries are entitled to a voice and seat in their respective chapters; but they do not appear, in all instances, to be in the habit of availing themselves of their privileges in this respect. With regard to the nine canopies, it is to be observed, that there are not any benefices, or cure of souls, attached to any of them. In the case of the four minor or petty canons of St. Patrick's cathedral, the duties of each appear to be, either personally or by deputy, to attend at the morning and evening services in the cathedral every fourth Sunday, and at morning service every day in the succeeding week; and as regards the four canons of Kildare, each is obliged every eighth Sunday, in rotation with the other members of the chapter, to undertake the cathedral duties, which duties are, however, discharged by a residentiary canon, at the expense of the individual members of that chapter; but in the case of the minor or petty canon of Ardfer, there is not any duty now annexed to this office, the church of Ardfer being parochial as well as cathedral, and consequently all the duties performed by the parochial minister."

The following is a summary of the gross and nett amount of income of cathedral dignitaries and officers:—

The income of the 12 bishops under the new arrangement effected by the Church Temporalities Act, is as follows: Armagh, £13,170; Meath, £4,621; Derry, £6,033; Down, £5,896; Kilmore, £7,478; Tuam, £5,020; Dublin, £9,321; Leighlin, £6,550; Cashel, £5,354; Cloyne, £4,009; Killaloe, £3,932; Limerick, £5,369. In 1842, the receipts and the expenditure of the Board of Ecclesiastical Commissioners created by the Church Temporalities Act, amounted to respectively £111,949 and £103,054; but the receipts included not only the balance or saving of abolished sees and abolished benefices, but also the proceeds of the funds of Primates Boulter and Robinson.

The parochial clergy are, for the most part, maintained by tithes, and in many instances also by glebe lands; but in a few of the larger towns, they are maintained by a house-tax called Ministers' Money. By the Act 1 and 2 Victoria, c. 109, compositions for tithe were abolished, and fixed payments or rent-charges substituted for them, consisting of three-fourths of their amount, to be paid by the landlord or others having a perpetual interest in the lands. The benefices consist either of single parishes, of unions of two or more parishes, of inappropriate or appropriate curacies, and of perpetual or district curacies. Some of the benefices consisting of single parishes never had a vicar or any division of tithes, and are called either rectories or rectories entire; others had at one time both a rector and a vicar, but now unite the two characters, and are called rectories and vicarages; and others yield their tithes in two portions and to two different parties, and, according to the circumstance of the rectorial portion being held by a layman or a clergyman, are called either vicarages alone, or rectories in one capacity and vicarages in another. In some of these benefices is a chapelry with a separate incumbent, and in others one or two chapelries without separate incumbents, but under the care of the rector or vicar, aided by one or more stipendiary curates. Most of the benefices which comprise two or more parishes, consist solely of the vicarages of these parishes, the rectorial tithes being either held improperly by lay parties, or appropriately by bishops, dignitaries, or ecclesiastical corporations. The vicarial tithes, in very many instances, constitute about one-third of the whole tithes, and are called the small tithes; while the rectorial constitute the remainder, and are called the large tithes. In some instances, however, the vicarial consist of two-thirds, and the rectorial of one-third; in others, the vicarial consist of five-ninths, and the rectorial of four-ninths; in others, the vicarial and the rectorial each consist of a moiety; and in others, the vicarial consist of much less than one-third. Improper and appropriate curacies were originally parishes, served only by stipendiary curates, who had no legal succession, and were incapable of taking a grant or an endowment; but, by Acts of 29 George II., and 11, 12, 23, and 24 of George III., they were rendered perpetual incumbencies, independent of the impropiators, capable of receiving endowment, and as fully possessed of parochial status as if they retained property in the tithes. Perpetual curacies are either portions of single large parishes, or clustered districts of two or more mutually adjacent parishes, erected into ecclesiastical parochial status by deed of diocesans; and, in the former sense, they were authorized by Acts of 7, 11, and 12 George III.,—and in the latter, by Acts of 7 and 8 George IV.

The modern history of tithes in Ireland—of their first being levied in kind, next compounded, and eventually commuted—is too well known to require to be sketched. Easter offerings and small dues are entirely unknown in Ireland; surplus fees appear to be seldom or never demanded in the country benefices; and an income payable to perpetual curates, in the way of augmentation allowance, out of Boulter's fund, does not exceed £4,460 8s. 8½d. The number of glebe-houses, within the provinces of Dublin and Cashel, as exhibited in the Commissioners' Report, is 363; and all of these, excepting 97, were erected since the commencement of the present century. The number of glebe-houses, within the provinces of Armagh and Tuam, as exhibited by the same authority, is 466; and these, say the Commissioners, "have been, for the most part, erected within the present century under the old and new acts in that case made and provided—greater facilities having of late years been granted to encourage and promote the building of glebe-houses than formerly existed until within the last 5 years; during which period, the facilities previously enjoyed by the clergy having been withdrawn, the instances of new houses being undertaken are extremely rare, if indeed any such instances exist."

The statistics of the quondam provinces of Armagh and Tuam, slightly more extensive than the present province of Armagh, were, in 1836, as follow:—Number of benefices with cure of souls, 601; without cure of souls, 1; subject to episcopal jurisdiction, 600; subject to peculiar or exempt jurisdiction, 2; consisting of single parishes, considering perpetual cures as such, 443; consisting of unions of two or more parishes, 159. Total number of ecclesiastical benefices, 602. Number of parishes constituting the aforesaid benefices, 966. Number of chapelries, 30. Number of incumbents resident in their benefices, 498; not resident in their benefices, 104. Gross income of the benefices, £299,111 1s. 1d.; nett income, £253,530 11s. 6d. Number of benefices without any stipendiary curates being employed, 306; having one stipendiary curate, 233; having two or more stipendiary curates, 63. Total number of stipendiary curates, 371; gross amount of their stipends, £27,880 10s. 4½d. Number of benefices with churches, 577; without churches, 25. Total number of churches, 642; total accommodation, 193,798. Number of benefices with glebe-houses, 462; without glebe-houses, 140. Number of benefices with glebe-lands, 516; without glebe-lands, 86. Reputed acreable contents of the glebe-lands, 114,218 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches. Number of benefices in the gift, collation, or nomination of the crown, 53; of diocesans, 357, and the free churches of Derry and Drogheda; of incumbents, 66, and one chapelry; of laymen and corporations, 103, and four chapelries; of alternate parties, 23. Amount of appropriate tithes, £19,752 19s.; of inappropriate tithes, £38,957 4s. 2d. Number of dignities held by incumbents, 61; of prebends held by incumbents, 61; of other ecclesiastical preferments held by incumbents, 117.

The statistics of the quondam provinces of Dublin and Cashel, nearly co-extensive with the present provinces of Dublin, were, in 1837, as follows:—Number of benefices with cure of souls, 770; without cure of souls, 23; subject to episcopal jurisdiction, 790; subject to peculiar or exempt jurisdiction, 3; consisting of single parishes, considering perpetual curacies as such, 469, including the chapelries; consisting of unions of two or more parishes, 304. Total number of ecclesiastical benefices, 793. Number of parishes constituting the aforesaid benefices, 1,381. Number of chapelries, 13. Number of incumbents resident in their benefices, 540; not resident in their benefices, 241. Gross income of the benefices, £311,542 7s. 3½d.; nett income, £266,532 4s. 0½d. Number of benefices without any stipendiary curate, 417; with one stipendiary curate each, 310; with two or more stipendiary curates each, 66. Total number of stipendiary curates, 462; gross amount of their stipend, £28,819 2s. 6½d. Number of benefices with churches, 605; without churches, 188. Total number of churches, 651; total accommodation, 173,961. Number of benefices with glebe-houses, 363; without glebe-houses, 430. Number of benefices with glebe-lands 541; without glebe-lands, 252. Reputed acreable contents of the glebe-lands, 18,537 acres, 2 roods, 10½ perches. Number of benefices in the gift, collation, or nomination of the Crown, 78; of diocesans, 455; of incumbents, 46; of laymen and corporations, 177, including the patronage of two chapelries in the diocese of Dublin, vested in trustees; in alternate parties, 37. Amount of appropriate tithes, £28,281 2s. 10d.; of impropriate tithes, £69,922 4s. Number of dignities held by incumbents, 91; of prebends held by incumbents, 121; of other ecclesiastical preferments held by incumbents, 250.

In reference, however, to both the above summary statements of ecclesiastical revenues in Ireland, and to the detailed statements throughout the body of our Gazetteer, of the incomes of the several and individual benefices, our readers require to note that we follow, as our authority, the third and the fourth Reports of the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenue and Patronage in Ireland, published in 1836 and 1837, that these reports exhibit the income so far back as the average of three years ending in 1831, and that, therefore, the statistics of revenue, even as they came fresh from the press, were to be understood with certain important modifications noticed in the following terms by the Commissioners: “But these, although the apparent are not the real and nett amounts of clerical income at the present time, as none of them are estimated as subject to the charges which have been created under recent enactments since the returns were made to your Majesty’s commissioners, such as the fifteen per cent. abatement claimed in many instances by undertaking landlords, and the tax chargeable on such benefices as may have become liable thereto since the passing of the Church Temporalities Act. In some cases it appears, by the returns, that arrears were due to the clergy for preceding years; but these arrears are so mixed with the relief afforded under the statutable provisions of 1831 and 1832, or so undefined or not otherwise noticed than in a general way, that we have omitted all mention of them in the digest, as any statement connected therewith would necessarily be very incorrect when compared with the arrears due to the clergy at the present time; nor should we have thought it necessary to advert to this subject, otherwise than as an additional reason for taking a distinction between the nominal and actual amounts of nett clerical revenue, as set forth in the digest annexed to our report. The deductions made from the gross amounts of revenue to ascertain the nett incomes of the parochial clergy, consist of the expenses of collection,—the annual charges payable on account of quit, crown, and glebe rents,—visitation-fees and procurations,—diocesan and parochial schoolmasters’ salaries,—the payments made in the way of house rent or lodging-money by resident incumbents, where there are not any glebe-houses,—the annual instalments in repayment of monies lent by the late trustees of First Fruits for building glebe-houses,—as also the interest of monies certified to have been expended by incumbents out of their own funds on glebe-houses, at the rates of 10 per cent. on such proportions thereof as are not recoverable, and of 5 per cent. on such sums as are recoverable from successors,—and the amounts of any stipends that may, by law, be payable to perpetual curates, omitting all mention of yearly payments of a voluntary nature, however indispensable in some cases, particularly in the vicinage of large towns; neither have we credited the clergy with any stipends payable to stipendiary curates, which would form a very important deduction, if taken into account, and whose services are often indispensable in the cases of city and town benefices, or in benefices of large extent, or from age or infirmities of incumbents.”

The following is a summary view of the ecclesiastical statistics of all Ireland in 1834:—Members of the Established Church, 852,064; Roman Catholics, 6,427,712; Presbyterians, 642,356; other Protestant dissenters, 21,608: total, 7,943,140. Proportion per centum to the total population of members of Established Church, 10⁷/₁₀₀₀; Roman Catholics, 80²/₁₀₀₀; Presbyterians, 8¹/₁₀₀₀; other Protestant dissenters, 2⁷/₁₀₀₀. Number of places of worship belonging to Episcopalians, 1,534; to Roman Catholics, 2,105; to Presbyterians, 452; to other Protestant dissenters, 404: total, 4,494. Parishes or districts with provision for the cure of souls, 2,348; without provision for the cure of souls, 57; total, 2,405. Number of benefices consisting of single parishes, 907; being unions of two or more parishes, 478; being unions in which the parishes are not contiguous, 87; in which there is a glebe-house, 850; in which there is no glebe-house, 535. Number of benefices in which there is more than one church, 118; in which there is only one church, 1,057; in which there is no church, 210; in which the incumbent is resident, 889; in which the incumbent is non-resident, but divine service is performed by him or a curate in a place of worship, 339; in which the incumbent is non-resident, and no divine service is performed by him or a curate in a place of worship, 157. Number of benefices in which the entire population is not more than 100, 5; is more than 100, and not more than 200, 7; is more than 200, and not more than 500, 36; is more than 500, and not more than 1,000, 94; is more than 1,000, and not more than 3,000, 368; is more than 3,000, and not more than 5,000, 277; is more than 5,000, and not more than 10,000, 405; is more than 10,000, and not more than 15,000, 125; is more than 15,000, and not more than 20,000, 39; is more than 20,000, and not more than 30,000, 21; is more than 30,000, 8. Number of benefices in which there is no member of the Established Church, 41; in which there is one, and not more than 20, 99; in which there are more than 20, and not more than 50, 124; in which there are more than 50, and not more than 100, 160; in which there are more than 100, and not more than 200, 224; in which there are more than 200, and not more than 500, 286; in which there are more than 500, and not more than 1,000, 209; in which there are more than 1,000, and not more than 2,000, 139; in which there are more than 2,000, and not more than 5,000, 91; and in which there are more than 5,000, 12.

The Presbyterians of Ireland are very numerous in most parts of Ulster, but bulk very considerably in each of the other three provinces, particularly in Connaught. A session, consisting of minister and elders, governs each congregation; a presbytery, consisting of the minister or ministers, and an elder of each of an indefinite number of congregations, governs each cluster of congregations, and forms a court of appeal from the sessions; and a general assembly or a synod, consisting of the minister or ministers, and an elder of every congregation, governs the whole body, and forms a court of appeal from the presbyteries. The ministers are appointed by the election of their congregations, or the vote of the majority; and they are supported partly by regium donum, and partly by salary from the proceeds of seat-rents and voluntary contributions. The regium donum or royal gift was originally a grant, made by Charles II. in 1672, of £600 a-year of "secret service money," to be distributed in equal portions among the Presbyterian ministers; it was discontinued towards the close of Charles II.'s reign, and during the reign of James II.; it was renewed, or rather restored in name and doubled in amount, by William III.; it was increased in 1784 to £2,200, and in 1792 to £5,000; it was subjected in 1803 to a classification of distribution, inversely proportioned to the amount of ministers' salaries from their congregations; and it has, at various periods, undergone augmentation till it now amounts to upwards of £25,000. The classification, adopted in 1803, distributed the ministers of both the Synod of Ulster and the Secession Synod into three classes, and assigned sums to the former of respectively £100, £70, and £50 Irish a-year, and to the latter of respectively £70, £50, and £40, but acted on the extraordinary principle of giving the largest sum to the class who had the largest salary, and the smallest sum to the class who had the smallest salary. In 1831, the classification system was superseded by a rule of giving to every minister £75 Irish.—The first presbytery in Ireland was formed at Carrickfergus in 1642, and constituted the nucleus of the Synod of Ulster. About 1660, the Synod of Munster was formed. In 1727, the Presbytery of Antrim separated from the Synod of Ulster; and, in 1829, the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster separated from the same body. About 1780, the Secession Synod, or more properly, the Presbyterian Synod of Ireland, was formed; and, in 1840, this body and the Synod of Ulster became mutually united, and took the name of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. In 1840, the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ulster, which had gradually sprung up and expanded, was divided into two parts; and in the same year, arose a small Presbyterian Secession body out of dissent from the union of the Secession Synod with the Synod of Ulster, and became very nearly or quite identified with three congregations which had previously dissented from the Secession Synod on the principle of rejecting regium donum. The only other Presbyterian body is one of 8 or 10 congregations, connected with the Original Burgher or Original Seceder Synod of Scotland. The Synod of Munster, the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster, and the Presbytery of Antrim, are understood to be chiefly or wholly Arian or Unitarian; and all the other Presbyterians are understood to be orthodox or Calvinistic. The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland consisted, in 1843, of 457 congregations, 476 ministers with charge, and 82 licentiates and ministers without charge; and its presbyteries, together with the number of ministers with charge in each, were Ahoghill 15, Ardes 19, Armagh 17, Athlone 5 and two vacancies, Bailieborough 9, Ballybay 12, Ballymena 12 and one vacancy, Banbridge 15 and one vacancy, Belfast 35 and three vacancies, Carrickfergus 11, Cavan 9, Clogher 11, Coleraine 19 and one vacancy, Comber 10, Connaught 5, Cork 6 and three vacancies, Derry 15, Donegal 8 and one vacancy, Down 12 and two vacancies, Dromore 11, Dublin 12 and one vacancy, Dungannon 11, Glendernot 12, Letterkenny 15, Magherafelt 14 and one vacancy, Monaghan 14, Newry 19, Newtownlimavaddy 12 and one vacancy, Omagh 19, Raphoe 10, Rathfriland 14 and one vacancy, Route 18, Strabane 11, Templepatrick 11, Tyrone 15, and Ratiawar in India 6.—The smaller of the two bodies into which the Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ulster was divided consists of 6 congregations under 6 ministers and one presbytery; and the larger of the two consisted, in 1843, of the northern presbytery, the western presbytery, the southern presbytery, and the mission congregation, with respectively 7 ministers and three vacancies, 4 ministers and one vacancy, 5 ministers and three vacancies, and 5 ministers and one vacancy.—The Presbytery of Antrim consists of 9 congregations, 10 ministers, and one presbytery; the Synod of Munster consists of 11 congregations, 16 ministers, and one presbytery; and the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster consists of the presbyteries of Armagh, Bangor, and Templepatrick, with respectively 7, 11, and 9 congregations, and aggregately 27 ministers with charge, 3 assistant ministers, and 4 licentiates.—The Congregational Union of Ireland is an association of Independent churches and ministers for promoting the maintenance and diffusion of evangelical truth in Ireland; and in 1843, it numbered 34 stations, pastors, or missionaries,—4 of the stations being churches temporarily without ministers, 3 of the stations having ministers but no churches, and 2 of the ministers having official duties of a different kind from those of either pastor or missionary.—The Wesleyan Methodist Society of Ireland is modelled on that of England, and is distributed into districts and subdivided into circuits, each of the latter having one or more travelling or stated ministers. In 1843, the circuits in the Dublin district, together with the number of travelling or stated ministers in each, were Dublin 12, Kingstown 1, Drogheda 2, Dundalk 1, and Wicklow 2; in Waterford district, Waterford 2, Carlow 3, Newtownbarry 2, and Wexford 2; in Cork district, Cork 5, Bandon 4, Skibbereen 2, and Tralee 1; in Limerick district, Limerick 2, Roscrea 2, and Cloughjordan 1; in Tullamore district, Tullamore 4, Athlone 1, Maryborough and Mountrath 2, and Longford 4; in Sligo district, Sligo 2, Castlebar 2, Ballina 2, and Boyle 1; in Clones district, Clones 3, Killeshandra 2, Castleblayney and Monaghan 2, and Aughnacloy 3; in Enniskillen district, Enniskillen 5, Brookborough 2, Manor-Hamilton 2, Lowtherstown 3, and Pettigoe and Ballyshannon 3; in Londonderry district, Londonderry 2, Strabane 3, and Omagh 4; in Belfast district, South Belfast 4, North Belfast 3, Ballyclare 1, Donaghadee 3, Carrickfergus 3, Coleraine 2, Magherafelt 3, Lisburn 2, and Downpatrick 1; and in Newry district, Newry 4, Dungannon 5, Armagh 2, Lurgan 2, Moira and Dromore 4, Tandragee 2, and Portadown 2. The missionary stations in connection with the conference, together with the number of travelling or stated ministers appointed to each, are Lucan and Trim 1, Kilkenny and Tipperary 2, Youghal 1, Fermoy and Mallow 1, Kinsale and De Courcy Country 1, Kerry and the Mines 1, Killaloe, Ennis, and Kilrush 3, Galway 1, Castlereagh 1, Ballinasloe 1, Barony of Erris 1, Cavan 2, Bailieborough 1, Donegal 2, Rathmelton, Letterkenny, and Stranorlar 1, Newtownlimavaddy 1, Ballymena and Antrim 1, Ballycastle 1, and Comber 1.—The Primitive Wesleyan Methodists differ, we believe, from the Wesleyan Methodist Society in regarding themselves as strictly members of the Established Church, and having no observance of baptism or the Lord's supper within their own places of worship or by their own preachers; but, in other respects, they are constituted very similarly to the English Wesleyan societies, and they distribute their preachers into the ten districts of Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Athlone, Clones, Enniskillen, Ballyshannon, Londonderry, Charlemont, and Belfast.

The Roman Catholic hierarchy consists of the archbishops of Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam, and the bishops of Ardagh, Clogher, Derry, Down and Connor, Dromore, Kilmore, Meath, and Raphoe, suffragan to Armagh,—Ferns, Ossory, and Kildare and Leighlin, suffragan to Dublin,—Kerry, Cloyne and Ross, Cork, Killaloe, Limerick, and Waterford and Lismore, suffragan to Cashel,—Achonry, Clonfert, Killalla, and Galway, suffragan to Tuam,—and Kilmacduagh, and Killenora, suffragan alternately to Tuam and to Cashel. "On the death of a bishop," says MacCulloch, "the clergy of the diocese elect a vicar capitular, who exercises spiritual jurisdiction during the vacancy. They also nominate one of their own body, or sometimes a stranger, as successor to the vacancy, in whose favour they postulate or petition the pope. The bishops of the province also present the names of two or three eligible persons to the pope. The new bishop is generally chosen from among this latter number. But the appointment virtually rests with the cardinals who constitute the congregation de propaganda fide. Their nomination is submitted to the pope, by whom it is usually confirmed. In cases of old age or infirmity, the bishop nominates a coadjutor, to discharge the episcopal duties in his stead. His recommendation is almost invariably attended to. The object of his choice is appointed and consecrated, and takes his title from some oriental diocese which he relinquishes on succeeding to the diocese in which he acts. As long as he retains the oriental title, he is styled a bishop in partibus infidelium, or more usually, a bishop in partibus. The emoluments of a bishop arise from his parish,—which is generally the best in the diocese,—from licenses, and from the cathedraticum. Licenses are dispensations from the publication of banns in cases of marriage. They vary in amount from 5s. to £1, and occasionally more, according to the circumstances of the contracting parties; and as the dislike to a previous public announcement of the marriage ceremony is very prevalent, the income from this source is considerable. The cathedraticum is an annual sum varying from £2 to £10, according to the value of the parish, paid by the incumbent in aid of the maintenance of the episcopal dignity. Every diocese has a dean, appointed by the cardinal in Rome, who has the direction of ecclesiastical matters in Ireland, and is called the cardinal protector. It has also an archdeacon appointed by the bishop. Both these dignities are merely nominal, without either jurisdiction or emolument. The incumbents of parishes are appointed solely by the bishop. If regularly collated, or in peaceable possession of the benefice for three years, they cannot be dispossessed, except for misconduct; otherwise they are removable at pleasure. A collation is a written nomination by the bishop. Coadjutors, or parish curates, are also appointed by the bishop, and removable by him at pleasure. The income of the parochial clergy arises from various sources, all voluntary. The Easter and Christmas dues consist of a certain sum paid by the head of every family in consideration of the spiritual instructions given to it. In country parishes it is generally 1s. at each festival, but is always expected to increase in proportion to the pecuniary circumstances of the parishioner. Marriage fees are another source of income. They are generally fixed at 10s. 6d., but increase in proportion to the circumstances of the parties; and, in addition to this, a collection is often made by the friends of the young couple, for the benefit of the officiating clergyman. The fee for baptisms is 2s. 6d. A small sum is sometimes given for visiting the sick. Masses are paid for at rates from 2s. upwards. The opulent parishioners also send presents of corn, hay, and other agricultural produce to their clergyman, and generally take care that his turf shall be cut, his grain reaped, and his grass mowed, without expense to himself. Stations are half-yearly meetings at places appointed by the parish priest, where he hears confessions, administers communion, and catechises. A dinner is prepared for him in every house at which he holds a station. The customary stipend of a curate is the third part of the general receipts of the parish. Monasteries and convents are numerous. Many of these institutions derive considerable funds from voluntary donations. The nunneries are supported partly by the sums paid by those who take the vows in them, for which from £300 to £400 is usually given, and partly from the annual fees or pensions paid for the education of the daughters of respectable Roman Catholics. The income derived from this latter source is very considerable." In 1841, the number of parochial Roman Catholic clergy was 2,145; and in 1843, the number of parishes in each diocese, together with the name and residence of each bishop, were as follow,—Armagh 51, Dr. Crolly, Armagh and Drogheda alternately,—Derry 35, Dr. MacLoughlin, Londonderry,—Clogher 37, Dr. Kernan, Carrickmacross,—Raphoe 34, Dr. MacGettigan, Letterkenny,—Down and Connor 40, Dr. Denvir, Belfast,—Kilmore 43, Dr. Browne, Cavan; Ardagh 43, Dr. Higgins, Ballymahon,—Meath 68, Dr. Cantwell, Mullingar,—Dromore 17, Dr. Blake, Newry,—Dublin 48, Dr. Murray, Dublin,—Kildare and Leighlin 46, Dr. Haly, near Carlow,—Ossory 35, Dr. Kinsella, Kilkenny,—Ferns 36, Dr. Keating, Ennisecorthy,—Cashel and Emly 47, Dr. Slattery, Thurles,—Cork 33, Dr. Murphy, Cork,—Killaloe 52, Dr. Kennedy, Six-mile-bridge,—Kerry 45, Dr. Egan, Killarney,—Limerick 41, Dr. Ryan, Limerick,—Waterford and Lismore 38, Dr. Foran, Waterford,—Cloyne and Ross 54, Dr. Crotty, Cove,—Tuam 61, Dr. MacHale, Tuam,—Clonfert 23, Dr. Coen, Loughrea,—Achnary 23, Dr. MacNicholas, Ballaghadireen,—Elphin 40, vacant,—Kilmaeduaugh and Killynora 19, Dr. French, Kinvarra,—Killalla 23, Mr. Feeny, Ballina,—and Galway 12, Dr. Browne, Galway.

POOR LAWS.

The "Act for the more effectual relief of the destitute poor in Ireland," received the royal assent on July 1, 1838; the office operations commenced in Sept., 1838; the erection of the workhouses commenced in June, 1839; and relief began to be administered on Feb. 15, 1840, in Cork, and on March 25, 1840, in Dublin. The total number of unions and of workhouses is 130; and 4 of the latter were opened in 1840, 32 were opened in 1841, 33 were opened in 1842, 2 were opened in the early part of 1843, and 49 were in progress on March 25, 1843. The number of paupers in the workhouses on Dec. 2, 1843, was 31,428; the total accommodation which the 130 workhouses, when finished, will afford, is for 92,860 paupers; and, in the event of pressure, this accommodation may be increased from 10 to 20 per cent. The number of unions in operation on Feb. 6, 1843—inclusive of 44 whose workhouses were not opened—was 125; and the total expenses incurred by them previous to the opening of their workhouses amounted to £126,422 1s. 11½d., and from the opening of their workhouses till Feb. 6, 1843, £366,682 0s. 5½d. Of the expenses incurred previous to the opening of workhouses, £9,402 14s. 11d. was for elections of guardians, £37,052 18s. 7½d. for valuation, £3,621 1s. 6d. for vaccination, £11,956 18s. 1½d. for salaries of officers, £11,505 14s. 0½d. for furniture, £2,304 14s. 10½d. for fixtures and fitting, £18,434 18s. 7½d. for bedding, £17,722 14s. 1d. for clothing, £1,322 18s. 9½d. for utensils and materials for setting the paupers to work, and £13,061 18s. 4½d. for other expenses; and of the expenses incurred subsequent to the opening of workhouses, £236,471 11s. 6½d. was for maintenance of paupers in food, medicine, clothing, fuel, &c., £19,183 10s. 1½d. for bedding, £13,586 2s. 11d. for furniture, £12,036 10s. 6d. for fixtures and fitting, £4,770 14s. 1d. for utensils and materials for setting the paupers to work, £2,555 2s. 5d. for vaccination, £1,523 15s. 6d. for elections of guardians, £1,369 6s. for law expenses, £8,870 in instalments of workhouse loan, £34,988 8s. 4½d. for salaries of officers, and £31,326 19s. 0½d. for other expenses. The unions, in the order in which they rank, or in the order of the dates of their declaration, together with the extent of each in statute acres, are Limerick, 124,130; Belfast, 47,702; Rathkeale, 108,340; Newcastle, 132,895; Lisburn, 119,300; Kilmallock, 151,179; Lurgan, 80,120; Londonderry, 139,199; Kinsale, 77,770; Tipperary, 188,561; Cashel, 141,360; Skibbereen, 236,398; Celbridge, 85,400; Clogheen, 73,113; Nenagh, 184,712; Naas, 199,335; Bandon, 143,460; Middleton, 146,683; Banbridge, 124,860; Fermoy, 195,316; Mallow, 151,050; Clonmel, 89,958; Thurles, 125,139; Callan, 106,633; Dungarvan, 163,826; Lisamore, 95,397; Dunshaughlin, 109,096; Balrothery, 76,968; Cork, 142,688; Athlone, 199,109; Strabane, 134,209; Waterford, 146,467; Armagh, 154,281; Newry, 137,911; Edenderry, 140,396; Gortin, 111,248; Castle-Derg, 9,758; Roscrea, 155,374; Parsonstown, 150,140; Omagh, 174,603; Longford, 208,625; Trim, 113,529; Galway, 217,814; Carrick-on-Suir, 105,543; Ballinasloe, 126,944; North Dublin, 38,914; South Dublin, 44,474; Dundalk, 104,372; Drogheda, 101,042; Navan, 93,327; Ennis, 143,339; Kilkenny, 275,825; Kells, 114,520; Shillelagh, 58,577; Sligo, 254,995; Dunganon, 102,474; Kilsrush, 115,746; Scariff, 108,975; Killeek, 81,726; Ennistymon, 152,609; Rathdown, 51,154; Cootehill, 104,988; Gort, 89,828; Boyle, 181,293; Ardee, 95,039; Cookstown, 96,730; Carrick-on-Shannon, 132,616; Manor-Hamilton, 157,159; Newtown-Ardes, 93,924; Mohill, 137,768; Loughrea, 126,095; Roscommon, 176,775; Castlereagh, 239,565; Tullamore, 157,968; Tuam, 115,233; Newtownlimavaddy, 150,625; Rathdrum, 207,358; Mullingar, 251,054; Monaghan, 112,043; Carrickmacross, 60,459; Ballinrobe, 190,635; Castleblayney, 93,504; Castlebar, 148,477; Bailieborough, 88,027; Baltinglass, 143,935; Magherafelt, 155,847; Cavan, 178,723; Coleraine, 112,176; Abbeyleix, 113,400; Mountmellick, 220,968; Gorey, 121,585; Dunmanway, 89,802; Macroom, 194,981; Kanturk, 247,049; Downpatrick, 147,367; Oldcastle, 108,568; Ballymoney, 127,057; Enniscorthy, 192,601; Clones, 71,566; New Ross, 186,596; Listowel, 209,261; Tralee, 350,722; Swineford, 133,026; Ballycastle, 102,530; Ballymena, 161,326; Larne, 117,733; Antrim, 116,342; Granard, 138,970; Wexford, 111,200; Ballyshannon, 137,024; Lisnaskea, 98,147; Ballina, 507,154; Westport, 341,117; Enniskillen, 231,961; Clifden, 191,426; Louthstown, 75,783; Carlow, 179,709; Killarney, 253,269; Innishowen, 159,323; Cahirciveen, 146,296; Kenmare, 271,245; Bantry, 137,256; Donegal, 156,890; Stranorlar, 113,955; Athy, 161,878; Clogher, 101,203; Letterkenney, 101,998; Milford, 112,748; Dunfanaghy, 128,220; and Glenties, 260,625. Sufficiently full and minute statistic notices of each of the unions will be found in our article on the place whence it has its name. As to superficial extent, the largest union is Ballina, the smallest one is North Dublin, and the smallest rural one is Rathdown; and as to population, the largest is South Dublin, 182,755, and the smallest is Gortin, 17,315. The electoral divisions into which each union is distributed vary in number from 8 in South Dublin to 29 in Omagh; and each consists of townlands, and is chargeable with the support of the poor whom it furnishes to the workhouse. The 130 workhouses were estimated to cost between £1,100,000 and £1,200,000; and they have been erected by means of loans from government, free of interest for 10 years, and to be repaid by annual instalments within 20 years. The poor-law commissioner receives a salary of £2000; each of 11 assistant commissioners receives a salary of £700; and the clerk of each union, and the master and matron of each workhouse, receive salaries of respectively £50, £40, and £25 or £30. The clerk of the union, however, is the returning officer of the guardians; and, in that capacity, receives a fee distinct from his salary. The clothing and diet of the paupers, and the structure and economy of the workhouses, are noticed as follows by Mr. and Mrs. Hall:—"The clothing of the adult males consists of a coat and trowsers of barragon, cap, shirt, shoes, and stockings. The female adults are supplied with a striped jerkin, a petticoat of linsey woolsey, and another of stout cotton, a cap, shift, shoes, and stockings. The male children have each a jacket and trowsers of fustian, a shirt, and a woollen cap. The female children have each a cotton frock and petticoat, a cap, and a linsey woolsey petticoat. Each bed is supplied with a straw mattress, with blankets, bolsters, &c. The able-bodied women and children sleep in double beds; the sick, the infirm, and the male persons sleep in single beds. The diet varies in particular unions, chiefly depending on the condition of the poor in the neighbourhood, the object being to give such diet to the inmates of the workhouse as shall not be superior to that obtained by the independent labourer. The principle adopted in affording relief in the workhouses (except in the special cases), is not to admit children without their parents (if dependent on them), nor a man without his wife, nor the latter without her husband,—no more distant members of the family are affected by this principle. If a son be able to support his father, the principle very properly makes this natural duty legally incumbent on him. In England, the workhouses have acquired the name of ‘lastiles,’ chiefly on account of their construction, the windows being very small, and placed above the height of the inmates to prevent their seeing out of them; the yards also have been too much confined in this respect. In Ireland, the houses are in size greatly beyond those erected in England, where a workhouse for 1,000 persons is one of the largest, and one for 500 in the rural districts is considered of large extent; while in Ireland, houses for 800 and 1,000 are common sizes, and they vary, as we have shown, from 800 to 1,200, 1,600, and 2,000 persons. The workhouses in Ireland being of immense size, appear to have been designed with a view to render them picturesque, and to diminish the appearance of their real magnitude; the rooms are placed in double width, to insure effective superintendence. The style of most of the buildings is that of the domestic Gothic, being best suited for the materials available in their construction, the walls being built with rubble masonry which would have required more dressing and cut stone work had the Italian or common domestic style of building been adopted. The use of the dirty and perishable ‘rough casting’ or ‘dashing,’ so common in Ireland, appears to have been avoided as much as possible. The buildings, by their arrangement, are capable of being extended in various ways, and the houses, as constructed, are considered only as portions of buildings, planned to a larger scale, according to drawings which are deposited with the clerk of the union, agreeably to the 35th section of the Poor-law act, which empowers the commissioners to carry into execution the additional buildings contained in the plan,—a portion only of which is considered to be carried into effect originally. The division for classification as contained in the Irish workhouses is greater than in workhouses erected in England, though they were originally intended to be less: the yards are larger, and the rooms are much more lofty and airy. The workhouse may be considered to consist of four separate structures containing as follows:—The entrance building, which contains the waiting-hall for paupers applying for admission, and the porter; the board-room on the upper floor, in which the guardians meet and determine the admission of applicants for relief; the probationary wards, with four separate yards for containing those paupers when admitted, and who are here examined by the medical officer, and washed in a bath supplied with hot or cold water. Paupers affected by any disease are retained in these wards until in a fit state to go into the body of the house. Previously, however, they are deprived of their old clothes, which are fumigated, and deposited for return (if required), and they are then dressed in a comfortable suit of the workhouse clothing. The main building contains, in the centre, the master’s and matron’s apartments, around which are the store-rooms, the kitchen, and workhouse, the school-rooms for boys and girls separate, and the several wards to which they command immediate access. The third division contains the dining-hall, and kitchen and wash-house,—buildings which are all arranged in connection with the yards of the paupers employed or having access thereto, so as to avoid passages and other separations which interfere with proper classification. The infirmary is a distinct building, and conveniently placed for access; on each side is a building reserved for male and female idiots,—a class of inmates unprovided for in buildings of the kind in England, and whose location here greatly relieves the lunatic institutions of the country. The upper floor of the buildings contains dormitories, from which the paupers are excluded in the daytime. The arrangement for sleeping is entirely novel, and, for such large buildings, infinitely beyond the arrangement of bedsteads,—the advantages of which are detailed in the architect’s report to the Poor-law commissioners, as contained in the annual Report for 1841, in which the bedsteads that are used are also described, and are of a kind different from those used in any other buildings, and very conducive to order and cleanliness.”

MEDICAL CHARITIES.

District Lunatic Asylums have already been noticed with sufficient fulness in the chapter on Prisons.—All the other Medical Charities, except in two or three of the large towns, consist wholly of dispensaries, fever hospitals, and county infirmaries. A dispensary is intended to supply medicine to the sick poor of a district, as well as medical advice to such as are able to go for it, and medical attendance to such as cannot leave their own houses. Many districts are accurately defined, and are co-extensive with a barony, a half-barony, or one or more parishes; but others extend to any distance at which a subscriber or any one of his tenants resides. In 1833, the number of dispensaries was 452; in 1839, it was 615. The means of their support are variously subscriptions, county grants, and a portion of the fines imposed at petty-sessions. In 1832 and 1833, the mean annual amount of subscriptions to them was £25,448; and, in 1839, it was £34,604. In 1832 and 1833, the mean annual amount of county grants to them was £25,016; and, in 1839, it was £34,060. Many of the dispensaries keep a full registration of patients; but others register only the number of dispensations of medicine. The dispensaries are usually managed by subscribers of one guinea or upwards, or by five or more of these elected by the others. In 1832 and 1833, the average number of dispensary cases is reported at 1,139,150, and in 1836-1838, at 1,210,143; but, in consequence of the imperfect state of the registration, these totals must greatly exceed the actual number of patients. In 1839, there was, in the county of Meath, one dispensary to a population of 6,545; in co. Dublin, to 6,286; in co. Kildare, to 7,228; in co. Down, to 23,468; in co. Longford, to 22,511; in co. Leitrim, to 20,218; and in co. Sligo, to 19,176. In the other counties, the proportion varied between these extremes; and throughout Ireland, the mean average was one dispensary to 13,520. The difference among counties, however, was even less than the difference among districts of the same county. In co. Down, for example, the Kilkeel dispensary afforded relief to 4 per cent. of the population, and the Donaghadee one to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., while the Seaford one afforded it to 35 per cent.; and in co. Armagh, the Bellatram dispensary afforded relief to 4 per cent. of the population, and the Seagoe one to $9\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., while the Portadown and the Forkhill dispensaries afforded it to respectively 44 and 50 per cent. At Monalea, in co. Westmeath, the surgeon's salary was equal to $10\frac{1}{2}$ d. per head on the population of the district; at Ballinacary, in the same county, to $1\frac{1}{2}$ d.; at Durrow, in the Abbeyfeix Poor-law union, to 8½d.; and at Mountmellick, to $1\frac{1}{2}$ d. At Kilkeel in co. Down, the average cost of medicine was 2s. 5d. per every patient relieved; at Castlewellan, it was 3½d.; at Enfield, in co. Meath, it was 8d.; and at Trim, in the immediate vicinity of Enfield, it was $1\frac{1}{2}$ d.—About 12 of the fever hospitals of Ireland are county institutions, entirely supported by county grants,—the maximum of which is fixed at £500 per annum; but the remainder are district institutions like the dispensaries, and intended for one or more parishes, or for baronies or half-baronies. "The county authorities are empowered to present any sum not exceeding double the amount of the subscriptions obtained within the year, or since the last presentment. This maximum amount is in some counties freely granted; but in others a much smaller sum is invariably presented. The Dublin fever hospitals are supported in a different manner from those in different parts of the country: that in Cork-street is maintained by a large annual parliamentary grant with the addition of some subscription; the Hardwick fever hospital, and the fever wards of the Meath hospital, are supported entirely by the former means. The funds for a few of the fever hospitals are supplied entirely by private individuals: thus the Primate supports the Armagh fever hospitals, and Lord Middleton one in the western part of the same county. A large annual donation from the Marquis of Hertford, added to a voluntary assessment on his property in the county of Antrim, constitutes the means of supporting that at Lisburn. The governors of fever hospitals obtain advances from government through the intervention of the General Board of Health for Ireland, where a local board of health is formed in the vicinity of such hospitals. In other instances these local boards of health disburse the whole of the funds obtained from government, whilst the governors of the fever hospital support in the usual manner. In either case the funds advanced by government are repaid by an assessment upon the county at large." In 1833, the fever hospitals amounted to 70, and were supported or aided with £13,268 from county grants, and £7,543 from subscription; and, in 1839, they amounted to 90, and were supported or aided with £22,072 16s. 2d. from county grants, and £7,168 9s. 8½d. from subscription. The fever hospitals are usually managed by a corporation, or by a committee of subscribers; they generally keep an accurate registration of patients; and they usually admit cases of contagious disease either from all parts of a county on the recommendation of a magistrate, a governor, or a subscriber, or from all parts of a district on the order of a subscriber,—though some admit cases upon the mere application of the patients or their friends.—Infirmaries are intended for patients residing in any part of their respective counties or cities; and they afford relief to them under the classification of intern and extern. Severe casualties and all serious surgical and medical cases, not affected with supposed incurable or contagious diseases, are admissible as interns; those of a less serious nature are attended as externs,—that is, they are prescribed for, and obtain medicine at the surgery. No domiciliary attendance on the externs is expected of the surgeon, even in towns which have no dispensary. The funds for the support of the infirmaries are obtained from county presentments, government grants, petty-sessions fines, and private subscriptions and donations. A grand jury, previous to 1836, could not grant more to an infirmary than £600 per annum; but since that date, it may grant £1,400 for the institution itself, and £100 Irish for its surgeon's salary. In 1839, the number of infirmaries was 39; and, in 1833, they received £16,946 from county grants, and £4,500 from subscriptions and donations,—in 1839, £25,362 4s. 7d. from county grants, and, averagely, on three years, £4,195 from subscriptions and donations. They are governed by corporations composed of ex-officio, life, and annual governors.

At the close of 1843, there were in the county of Antrim, one infirmary, 3 fever hospitals, and 18 dispensaries; in co. Armagh, 1 infirmary, 3 fever hospitals, and 19 dispensaries; in co. Carlow, 1 infirmary, 4 fever hospitals, and 11 dispensaries; in co. Cavan, 1 infirmary, 2 fever hospitals, and 18 dispensaries; in co. Clare, 1 infirmary, 2 fever hospitals, and 24 dispensaries; in co. Cork, 1 infirmary, 14 fever hospitals, and 61 dispensaries; in co. Donegal, 1 infirmary, 1 fever hospital, and 25 dispensaries; in co. Down, 1 infirmary, 1 fever hospital, and 13 dispensaries; in co. Dublin, 1 infirmary, 2 fever hospitals, 35 dispensaries, and various other remedial institutions,—the last all noticed in our article on the city; in co. Fermanagh, 1 infirmary, 1 fever hospital, and 13 dispensaries; in co. Galway, 1 infirmary, 2 fever hospitals, and 25 dispensaries; in co. Kerry, 1 infirmary, 2 fever hospitals, and 25 dispensaries; in co. Kildare, 1 infirmary, 3 fever hospitals, and 15 dispensaries; in co. Kilkenny, 1 infirmary, 4 fever hospitals, and 19 dispensaries; in King's co., 1 infirmary, 2 fever hospitals, and 13 dispensaries; in co. Leitrim, 1 infirmary, 1 fever hospital, and 10 dispensaries; in co. Limerick, 1 infirmary, 5 fever hospitals, and 30 dispensaries; in co. Londonderry, 1 infirmary, 2 fever hospitals, and 22 dispensaries; in co. Longford, 1 infirmary, and 6 dispensaries; in co. Louth, 1 infirmary, and 7 dispensaries; in co. Mayo, 1 infirmary, 1 fever hospital, and 22 dispensaries; in co. Meath, 1 infirmary, 1 fever hospital, and 24 dispensaries; in co. Monaghan, 1 infirmary, 4 fever hospitals, and 14 dispensaries; in Queen's co., 1 infirmary, 2 fever hospitals, and 18 dispensaries; in co. Roscommon, 1 infirmary, and 16 dispensaries; in co. Sligo, 1 infirmary, 1 fever hospital, and 10 dispensaries; in co. Tipperary, 1 infirmary, 12 fever hospitals, and 38 dispensaries; in co. Tyrone, 1 infirmary, 2 fever hospitals, and 20 dispensaries; in co. Waterford, 3 fever hospitals, and 15 dispensaries; in co. Westmeath, 1 infirmary, 1 fever hospital, and 17 dispensaries; in co. Wexford, 1 infirmary, 7 fever hospitals, and 22 dispensaries; and in co. Wicklow, 2 infirmaries, 5 fever hospitals, and 16 dispensaries.

LOAN FUNDS AND MONTS DE PIETE.

The surplus of contributions in Great Britain towards relieving the famine which afflicted Ireland in 1822, was erected into what was called the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund, subdivided into local loan funds throughout the most distressed counties of Ireland, and lent out in sums not exceeding £10 each, repayable by instalments. The local loan funds into which it was divided were 13 in co. Clare, 24 in co. Cork, 26 in co. Galway, 20 in co. Kerry, 9 in co. Leitrim, 5 in co. Limerick, 33 in co. Mayo, 15 in co. Roscommon, 8 in co. Sligo, and 9 in co. Tipperary. An act of parliament was passed in 1823, and amended in 1838, 1839, and 1843, which authorized local loan funds to be formed by contribution, to be controlled and reported on by a Board appointed by government, to pay the contributors 5 per cent. of interest on their contributions, and, after the defraying of all expenses, to devote the whole of the nett profits to charitable purposes. Pawn offices, on the plan and under the name of the French Monts de Piete, to advance money on pledges at more moderate rates than those of the licensed pawnbrokers, were commenced in 1839, and placed under the control of the Loan Fund Board; and their returns were at first mixed up with those of the loan funds, but since 1840 have been separately exhibited. At the close of 1842, the number of loan funds under the control of the Loan Fund Board was 300; the number of loan societies, in connection with the Irish Reproductive Loan Fund, and legally exempt from rendering any account of their proceedings, was about 100; the number of loan funds and loan societies, working illegally under colour of the exemption afforded to the preceding class, was about 30; and the number of Monts de Piete was 8. The following table will exhibit the progress of the system from the period of the Board's first report:—

SAVINGS' BANKS.

In 1810, the system of Savings' Banks was introduced to Ireland from Scotland; in 1817, an act was passed, fixing the interest to the depositors at 4 per cent., and vesting it in public security; and in 1828, the rate of interest was reduced to 3 per cent. The following table shows the annual amount of money paid in and drawn out during the years 1821—1832 :—

Years.	Paid in.	Drawn out.	Years.	Paid in.	Drawn out.

At the close of 1842, the number of savings' banks in the several counties was as follows :—2 in Antrim, 2 in Armagh, 2 in Cavan, 1 in Clare, 4 in Cork, 8 in Down, 3 in Dublin, 1 in Fermanagh, 2 in Galway, 2 in Kerry, 4 in Kildare, 1 in Kilkenny, 2 in King's county, 1 in Limerick, 3 in Londonderry, 2 in Louth, 1 in Mayo, 3 in Meath, 2 in Monaghan, 3 in Queen's county, 1 in Roscommon, 1 in Sligo, 7 in Tipperary, 4 in Tyrone, 1 in Waterford, 2 in Westmeath, 2 in Wexford, 2 in Wicklow, and none in Carlow, Donegal, Leitrim, and Longford.

WAGES.

The extraordinary reduction of wages in Ireland, is a topic of intense economical interest, and may be proximately estimated by the aid of the following extract from the Report of the Irish Hand Loom Weavers' Commission :—

"In the septennial period from 1792 to 1799, the weavers' weekly average earnings at the before-mentioned fabric would be £2 6s. 8d.

From 1806 to 1813	.	.	1 11 8
Average price per ell, 1s. 7d.

£1 11s. 8d. would, at the then price of potatoes, purchase 1,284 lbs. at 2s. 9d. per 112lbs., or 192 lbs. of oatmeal at 18s. 6d. per 112 lbs. Divide each of them by 2, and it will show the command his wages gave him over each of these two necessities of life.

From 1813 to 1820	£1 1s. 8d.
Average price per ell, 1s. 1d.

This would purchase 939 lbs. of potatoes at 2s. 7d. per 112 lbs., or 132 lbs. of oatmeal at 18s. 4d., showing a decline of 203 lbs. of food between the two periods last named.

From 1820 to 1827	12s. 6d.
Average price per ell, 7½d.

This would purchase 600 lbs. of potatoes at 2s. 4d., or 104 lbs. of oatmeal at 13s. 3d., showing a command of 352 lbs. of food.

From 1827 to 1834	6s. 8d.
Average price per ell, 4d.

This would purchase 448 lbs. of potatoes at 1s. 8d., or 59 lbs. of oatmeal at 12s. 7d. per 112 lbs., showing an average command of 234½ lbs. of food.

From 1834 to 1838

6s. 3d.

Average price per ell, 3½d.

This would purchase 400 lbs. of potatoes at 1s. 9d. per hundred, or 69 lbs. of oatmeal at 11s. 5d., showing an average command of 234½ lbs. of food.

The average prices of oatmeal and potatoes, above given, are taken from the books at the poor-house, taken on the 1st January each year. The weavers have to buy from the retailer, and pay from 4d. to 7d. for the hundred above the current price of the market. The poor-house contract for their potatoes and meal, and get each at the cheapest period of the year, and at the best market. The weavers buy usually upon credit, from week to week, and generally only from half a stone to a whole stone.

From 1800 to 1816, the rents of houses increased considerably. A house capable of containing three looms would be almost six guineas a-year; latterly they have declined, and now perhaps would be £5 or £5 10s. a-year."

EMIGRATION.

The extent of emigration from Ireland to Great Britain and to foreign countries was well ascertained in the course of the census investigation of 1841. Emigrants to Great Britain consist chiefly of labourers in search of agricultural employment; and their numbers, as far as could be ascertained by an enumeration of the deck passengers who embarked on board the packets in the summer of 1841, were—

"The large amount of labour represented by the number of emigrants to the British colonies and foreign countries," say the Commissioners of the Census, "is in itself of great interest in whatever light it is regarded. We have, however, no certain information respecting the particular occupations of these emigrants before they left the country, and have thus no means of following out the very interesting inquiry, whether the individuals, who are guided almost entirely by casual choice, and fix their destination with a very slender knowledge of the circumstances on which their success must depend, have been conveyed to the colonies in which their labour or skill is most likely to be useful to themselves and to the community. Some inferences of the kind, however, may be drawn in a general way from the particular circumstances of the localities from which they have gone. The largest number of those who have gone from Ireland direct to colonies or foreign countries embarked at Belfast, viz., 20 per cent. of the whole number; from Cork nearly the same; then from Sligo, Dublin, and Londonderry. On the whole, from the ports of Ulster there went 76,905; from the ports of Munster, 70,046; from Leinster, 34,977; from Connaught, only 32,119. The ports of Leinster, especially Dublin, can scarcely be considered as giving forth the population of their own province so exclusively as those of the other provinces, being, from its central position, and the convergence of the roads and canals upon it, a common outlet for all. But we may fairly assume, that the emigration from the other provincial ports consisted chiefly of persons belonging to the provinces in which they are situated. It will be seen that Ulster contributed largely to both British and foreign emigration, and that Munster, which contributed so small a number of harvest labourers, has supplied a very large proportion of colonial and foreign emigrants; whilst Connaught, whose harvest labourers were by far the most numerous, appears to supply but a small proportion of foreign emigrants. There is, however, no reason to suppose that in reality a smaller foreign emigration from Connaught has existed, as many may have sailed from other ports, and, as they migrated so largely to England, may have contributed to swell the numbers proceeding from Liverpool to foreign countries. These numbers, however, can only be considered as approximations, and are only of interest as leading to some inference respecting the localities which have supplied the greatest amount of foreign emigration. Even for this it must be at best but indefinite. The countries for which the emigrants were bound who embarked at Irish ports, are shown in the following statement:—

	British America.	United States.	Australian Colonies.	West Indies.	Total.
Males, - -	107,792	10,725	2,300	300	121,117
Females, - -	81,433	9,050	2,253	194	92,930
	189,225	19,775	4,553	494	214,047

In regard to age, three-fourths of the foregoing were under 30; but the awkward division of years in the emigrant returns, which classify all from 10 to 30 together, and make no other division till they reach the advanced age of 50, prevents our following the subject as far as we could wish. The males exceed the females by about one-fourth, though the sexes of the children and the aged are nearly equal. It would be fallacious to estimate any common sum of money or value taken from the country by these emigrants so various in circumstances. It has been estimated as high as £10 and even £20 from some ports; but the numbers of such can be but small. The counties, however, which supply the greatest amount of emigrants are not those which seem the poorest in point of stock; still there can be no doubt that immense numbers carry no capital but their manual labour, and that the great majority are of agricultural habits, without acquired skill of any kind."

In the General Report of the Colonial Land and Emigration Commissioners, the numbers who emigrated from Irish ports in 1842, and in the first six months of 1843, are stated to be, in HOUSE-ACCOMMODATION.

So much is usually said, both vaguely and violently, by tourists, declaimers, and politicians of all classes respecting the house-accommodation of the Irish, that some statistics on the subject have long been rendered exceedingly desirable. The Census Commissioners of 1841, therefore, rendered an important service by giving for every inhabited district of the kingdom, not only a return of the number of houses built, in the course of erection, inhabited, and uninhabited, but also a classified return of the structure and accommodation of the inhabited houses. "Under the head Houses," say they, "is given the number inhabited and uninhabited,—the latter being divided into building and built. In addition to this, a further classification of the inhabited houses, in respect to their condition, has been attempted, with the view to correct an error into which the mere number of inhabited houses is calculated to lead the statistical inquirer. . . . The necessity of some classification is so obvious, and the want of it so serious, that we proceed at once to describe the mode we adopted. The value or condition of a house, as to the accommodation it affords, may be considered to depend mainly on—1st, its extent, as shown by the number of rooms—2nd, its quality, as shown by the number of its windows—and, 3rd, its solidity or durability, as shown by the material of its walls and roof. If numbers be adopted to express the position of every house in a scale of each of these elements, and if the numbers thus obtained for every house be added together, we shall have a new series of numbers, giving the position of the house in a scale compounded of all the elements, i. e., their actual state. We adopted four classes, and the result was, that in the lowest, or fourth class, were comprised all mud cabins having only one room—in the third, a better description of cottage, still built of mud, but varying from 2 to 4 rooms and windows—in the second, a good farm house, or in towns, a house in a small street, having from 5 to 9 rooms and windows—and in the first, all houses of a better description than the preceding classes. We tested the rule practically on several houses in different localities, both town and country, and found the result sufficiently satisfactory. We, at first, intended to have thrown the third and fourth classes together, and it is to be hoped that hereafter they may be consolidated. But we thought it desirable to retain at present a separate column for the mere hut, still too common throughout the country. The floor of a cabin is a very essential criterion of its quality, which perhaps, we might, with advantage, have also inquired into, and used as an element of classification for houses of the third and fourth classes. The whole, however, is but an approximation, as the state of repair, a most important matter in estimating the comfort of a house, could not be brought into the calculation. It is, therefore, the more gratifying to find that the results of several other sections of the General Table, which will be noticed hereafter, tend to give considerable confidence in the results of this section. It would have seemed natural to have used Value as a basis of classification, as embracing all the above conditions. But to have made a valuation on purpose would have been out of the question, both as to time and expense, and none of the existing Valuations extend uniformly over the whole country, besides which, they embrace out-houses and offices, which have no bearing on our immediate object, viz., the personal accommodation occupied by families.

"The following table shows the total number of houses in the years 1821, 1831, and 1841:—

		1821.	1831.	1841.
Inhabited,		1,142,002	1,249,816	1,328,839
Uninhabited,	{ Built,	35,251	40,654	52,208
	{ Building,	1,350	15,308	3,313

The increase in the number of houses between 1821 and 1831 is $9\frac{6}{10}$ per cent., and from 1831 to 1841, 7 per cent. It will be seen that the number of houses building in 1841, is very small; but there is no reason to suppose that any real pause in building has taken place during the last ten years, or is now taking place. On the contrary, the numbers in the several years will be seen to give a somewhat increasing ratio for the recent period. One reason for the smallness of the number in the column 'Building,' may be found in the enumerators having returned a house as inhabited when only occupied by a caretaker, and still in progress of building, which we have reason to think was not the case in 1831. The number of houses building in 1821 appears to bear a much smaller proportion to the total number than even in 1841, and we are unable to penetrate the cause. The number itself is altogether unequal to maintain the number of houses then standing. If we reckon that the generality of houses last for 60 years, and that it takes 4 months to build, or advance them to an inhabitable state, it will be found, that to maintain 1,177,853 (the number of houses in 1821) it would require 6,544 to be in progress of erection at any one period. Upon the same principle, there should have been 7,169 houses in progress of building in 1831, and 7,672 in 1841. It will be found that these three numbers are nearly a mean between the three actual numbers in 1821, 1831, and 1841. It would appear that building was partly suspended in 1821, and that in 1831 it was resumed with great activity, which would in some measure have caused the inertness now apparent; but we are not in possession of any facts from other sources which support such an assumption. It must also be remarked, in connection with this subject, that the houses 'building' include only private houses, and among other causes of the smallness of their number in 1841 may probably be, that at the period of the Census, no less than 100 of the Union Poor Houses were in progress of erection, distributed over all parts of the country; and it appears from information with which we have been supplied by the Poor-law Commissioners, that the following number of artificers and labourers were employed on them,—

Masons, Bricklayers, and Paviors	2,614
Carpenters	962
Slaters and Plasterers	263
Plumbers, Painters, Glaziers, and Smiths	216
Labourers	6,759

so that it is probable that a larger amount of capital was actually at that period in process of investment in buildings than at almost any former time, instead of the reverse, as would at first sight appear, from the smallness of the numbers in the column referred to. If the houses of former years had been classified, it would have enabled us to show whether the increase in numbers afforded a corresponding increase of accommodation or the reverse—that is, whether the houses which have been built have been of the best or worst class. But the number of houses in each class is not in itself a direct measure of accommodation, as we shall endeavour to show when we speak of the 'families' who occupy them.

"The definition of the term 'FAMILY' to be generally understood and of easy application for the purpose of a Census, is more difficult than the usually accepted meaning of the word would lead one to conclude. By Dr. Johnson it is explained as 'those who live in the same house'—a definition which is obviously incomplete. In the early Census Returns of Great Britain, there appears to have been much misunderstanding on this head. In the Preface to the Irish Returns of 1821, the subject was, however, carefully considered, and all the persons residing in the same house and supported by the same head, were to be deemed one family. Resident apprentices and labourers thus belonged to the family they boarded with. So also did servants, and an individual occupying a house was considered to constitute a family. In 1831, the rule both in Great Britain and Ireland was, that those who used the same kitchen, and boarded together, were to be considered one family; and an individual either occupying a house, or living as a lodger, but not boarding with the family, was considered to be a distinct family. The rule we adopted was substantially the same as these, namely, that by a family was to be understood either one individual living independently in a house or part of a house on his or her own means of support, or several individuals related to each other, with the addition of servants or visitors living together in the same house or part of a house upon one common means of support. On this principle the number of families in these Returns has been compiled. The following table shows the total numbers at the under-named periods:—

Number of Families	1,312,062	1,385,066	1,472,787
Average number of persons to a Family	5.18	5.61	5.55

And as it is usual to contrast the number of families with the number of houses, we annex the following table, which gives the relative increases under these heads during the above periods:—

	Families.	Houses.
Increase per cent., from 1821 to 1831	5 $\frac{7}{10}$	9 $\frac{7}{10}$
„ „ from 1831 to 1841	6 $\frac{7}{10}$	7

But from what has been previously stated, it is evident, that if all the houses in some districts were thrown down, and only half the number of moderately good buildings erected in their stead, the household accommodation of the people would be improved, although the number of houses would be diminished by one-half. Consequently, the mere contrast of the number of houses with the number of families, is a very imperfect guide. The rule we adopted for classifying accommodation was but an extension of the principle which guided us in classifying the houses themselves. According to it, First class accommodation consists of first class houses, each containing one family. Second class accommodation consists of second class houses, each containing one family, and of first class houses, each containing two or three families. Third class accommodation consists of third class houses, each containing one family,—of second class houses, each containing two or three families,—and of first class houses, each containing four or five families. Fourth class accommodation consists of all fourth class houses,—all third class houses containing more than one family,—all second class houses containing more than three families,—and all first class houses containing more than five families. The following table contains the result of its application to the families of the kingdom:—

NUMBER OF FAMILIES WHICH OCCUPY EACH CLASS OF ACCOMMODATION.

The following statement shows the proportion per cent. which the number of families in each class of accommodation bear to the total number of families:—

	1st Class.	2d Class.	3d Class.	4th Class.
Rural District	1·2	15·3	40·	43·5
Civic District	7·	22·4	33·9	36·7

Thus, nearly half of the families of the Rural population, and somewhat more than one-third of the families of the Civic population, are living in the lowest state, being possessed of accommodation equivalent to the cabin, consisting but of a single room. In the third class, but little removed in comfort, are nearly the same proportion, while of the other class the number is extremely small. These averages are tolerably consistent both in towns and in the country. Still there are considerable special differences which will repay the trouble of examining the tables themselves.

“As this is the first attempt which has been made to classify House-accommodation in these kingdoms, it must be received with some indulgence, and it will doubtless be followed by more perfect efforts. Of its necessity in Ireland there can be no doubt; whilst the able Report recently published on the sanitary condition of the working classes in Great Britain, affords melancholy proof of a frightful extent of the worst accommodation even in England. With a view of giving a general graphic representation of the relative prevalence of the worst class of lodging, we annex a map, shaded in the usual way, for that purpose.” A copy of this map accompanies the Parliamentary Gazetteer.

VITAL STATISTICS.

The Reports and the separate tables of the Commissioners of the Census of 1841, on the subject of ages, births, marriages, diseases, and deaths, are so vastly voluminous in proportion to the necessarily limited space which we could devote to a notice of them, that we must refer our readers to some well-prepared excerpts and digests of them in Thom's Irish Almanac,—an elaborate and valuable yearly compilation commenced in 1844, and abundantly entitled to general support.—The following table exhibits the population of Ireland in 1841, classified, male and female, according to their respective age, from 1 month and under to 113 years:—

The want of registries of births, marriages, and deaths, in Ireland, has been supplied by other means. The number of births for the 10 years ending 1841, inclusive, has been ascertained by adding the numbers now alive at every year of age, for the last 10 years, to the number whose ages at death show them to have been born the same year. The following is the number of births from 1832 to 1841 :—

PROVINCES.	Males.		Females.		Total.	Annual proportion of births to mean Population.
	Rural.	Civic.	Rural.	Civic.
Leinster . . .	225,629	66,257	215,484	63,566	570,936	1 in 32·3
Munster . . .	318,268	61,603	304,725	58,449	743,045	1 in 29·5
Ulster . . .	328,739	35,098	315,902	33,872	713,611	1 in 31·1
Connaught . . .	226,119	13,379	217,235	12,501	469,234	1 in 28·
	1,098,755	176,337	1,053,346	168,388	2,496,826	1 in 30·3
	1,275,092		1,221,734
Proportion of Males to 100 Females, . . .						104·3

The number of deaths, ascertained from a return of all the deaths within the last 10 years, and from returns sent in by every Sanitary Institution, gives the mortality of the country :—

Years.	Population.	Deaths.	Average Mortality.
1834 . . .	7,943,940	96,623	1 to 82·2, or 1·22 per cent.
1839 . . .	8,092,947	140,239	1 — 57·7, — 1·73 —
1840 . . .	8,133,934	141,536	1 — 57·5, — 1·74 —

As the errors of voluntary returns are naturally corrected by being spread over a number of years, it is probable that the most satisfactory result will be obtained by using the average population and average deaths of the years from 1836 to 1840, which are of equal value, thus :—

Year.	Population.	Deaths.	Average Mortality.
1838 . . .	8,052,470	135,359	1 to 59·5, or 1·68 per cent.

POPULATION.

The population of Ireland was estimated, in 1695, at 1,034,102; in 1712, at 2,009,094; in 1726, at 2,309,106; in 1731, at 2,010,221; in 1754, at 2,372,634; in 1767, at 2,644,276; in 1777, at 2,690,556; in 1785, at 2,845,932; in 1788, at 4,040,000; and, in 1805, at 5,395,456. The first census of Ireland was taken in 1813, but was so imperfect as not to be officially published; the second census, taken in 1821, was very superior in character to the former, yet considerably defective; and the third census, taken in 1831, has been much denounced for inaccuracy, and was practically revised by the Commissioners of Public Instruction in 1834. The following table exhibits the population of Ireland in 1813, 1821, and 1831, according to the censuses of these years, and shows the increase per cent. in the intervening periods, and the respective numbers of males and females in 1831 :—

"We annex," say the Commissioners of the Census, "a map shaded so as to assist the eye in seizing a general view of the comparative density of the rural population.* The figures under the towns indicate their population, and the figures in the body of the map the population of the localities within which they are placed. The population of the towns has been deducted before taking the averages, a precaution which we thought necessary, though we believe it has not been usually done, so that the shading only exhibits the rural population. It will be seen that the greater portion of Ireland does not contain a higher average than 200 to the square mile. But the deduction of towns, while it avoids a great source of inaccuracy, does not wholly remove it, as when towns are excluded a limit must be drawn. We have taken, of course, that already explained as marking our civic district, viz. 2,000 inhabitants; but there are many towns very little below this limit, and in such cases, especially when two or more happen to lie together, the rural population appears more dense than it really is. An instance of this may be seen in the southern portion of the county of Leitrim, where there is no town above 2,000 inhabitants. But the towns of Carrick-on-Shannon and Mohill, approaching to that number, are retained in the rural population. That district, accordingly, appears more densely peopled than it probably will be in ten years more, when the towns may be expected to contain more than 2,000. A similar case occurs in the district around Clonakilty. These anomalies, however, do not disturb the general effect of the map as a graphic representation; and the shading on such maps ought never to be considered in any other light."

P R E F A C E.

THE plan and the peculiar claims of the PARLIAMENTARY GAZETTEER of IRELAND, were briefly stated in the Prospectus; and, though possibly regarded by many persons as ambitious, they have, it is believed, been fully maintained in the execution of the Work. Exceedingly voluminous and diversified as the materials were when the Prospectus was written, new and in some instances most valuable ones were subsequently obtained; and these not only made large contributions to the later portions of the Work, but very considerably enriched nearly the whole of the revision. The limits originally assigned as sufficient were afterwards extended one-half, so as to stretch the book to three volumes instead of two; yet, in spite of the utmost prudent compression being uniformly practised, they have with difficulty admitted a fair digest of the enormous mass of facts placed at the disposal of the writer. The Work contains at least twice as many articles, and probably thrice as many facts, as are found in the largest previous Gazetteer of Ireland; and it presents them in less than double the number of words, and with the most studied attempts at clearness, precision, and general utility. Separate articles are given, not only on counties, parishes, islands, towns, and considerable villages, but on each of the four provinces, on all the baronies, on the principal mountains, headlands, and bays, on all the fishing-harbours, on all the rivers, on the principal lakes and rivulets, on very nearly all the bogs, both in entire pieces and in sections, on the chief mines and mineral districts, on all villages which contain at least twenty houses, and on hundreds which contain fewer, on the principal demesnes, on the principal rural antiquities, and on all other objects which possess either remarkable features or interesting associations; all long articles, and thousands of short ones, exhibit profuse information in several most important departments, such as true areas of land and water, the altitudes of hills and plains, the elevation and falls of streams, and the statistics of agriculture, commerce, productive industry, railways, navigations, poor-law unions, and ecclesiastical interests, which are either totally omitted, or but slightly noticed, by any previous topographer; articles and paragraphs on subjects which have been often treated, possess some novelty in the fairness of proportion between their length and their interest, in their notice of many fine scenes which have hitherto been obscure or unobserved, and in their endeavouring to give superior tone and fulness to description; and the entire Work, whether as to its general spirit, or as to the composition of its particular articles, spurns adaptation to any peculiar tastes in preference to others, and aspires to be the informant and the guide, on all Irish affairs, of alike the Protestant and the Roman Catholic, the landlord and the tenant, the farmer, the merchant, and the tradesman, the statist and the political economist, the tourist, the antiquarian, the historian, and the general scholar.

Difficulties in securing accuracy, and risks of giving offence, incumber every work of a minutely topographical character, and are very specially incident to a Gazetteer of Ireland. A composition so exceedingly comprehensive, and compiled from such numerous and often conflicting authorities, can hardly be altogether free from error; and the present GAZETTEER only professes to have made so near an approach to perfection as fearlessly to challenge comparison with even the smallest and the least elaborate of its predecessors. It investigates or succinctly settles the multitudinous discrepancies and contradictions which exist among the very best authorities, and even among different sections of the same authority, respecting the number, the names, and the extent of parochial divisions in baronies or counties; it notices all, and reconciles many, of the perplexing differences which exist between the limits of respectively the civil and the ecclesiastical parishes of one locality and designation; it carefully records the very numerous changes which have recently occurred in the modification of benefices as affecting civil parishes, and in the transferences of townlands as affecting baronies; and it even, as far as practicable, exhibits the present condition, both in itself and in its connection with civil topography, of the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement. A given parish may seem to have strictly one identity, and yet may at three different dates have been three different things, and may at present be one thing as a civil parish, another thing as an ecclesiastical parish, and a third thing as a Roman Catholic parish; so that any well-informed and judicious reader will rather wonder at our clearing away fifty discrepancies, than feel surprise at our being misled by one. The Ordnance Survey has afforded invaluable aid in settling differences; yet it is sometimes silent, and at other times indiscriminating, when other high authorities are at variance,—and hence is very far from being, in every case, a final appeal. Such statistical discrepancies as are consequent on topographical ones, have occasioned little difficulty; but others of various kinds have been excessively embarrassing; and a few could be satisfactorily disposed of only by exhibiting both their phases, and leaving them unreconciled. Diversity of names to the same place, and diversity of spellings of the same name, though seemingly matters of most trivial moment, have occasioned us an amount of trouble which might seem almost incredible, but which has, we hope, saved us from the ludicrous predicament of describing one place in two or more articles, and under two or more names. Conflicting data in history, antagonist theories in antiquities, and contradictory statements in all matters kindred or analogous to these, have, as much as possible, been determined by simple reference to the highest evidence. Traditionary tales, in particular, and also such documentary stories as are manifestly mere echoes of them, have not been thoughtlessly and untruly regarded as of partisan character, but have been treated as open questions among men of all creeds, and consequently disposed of according to their intrinsic merit. Conflicting testimonies respecting individual localities, and general discrepancies in other departments than those we have named, are sufficiently many and great to have made the task of harmonizing the GAZETTEER exceedingly onerous; and, when combined with the larger and far more prolific sources of difficulty, they can scarcely fail both to evince the value of such a comprehensive and minute compilation as constitutes the present Work, and to apologize for any unimportant mistakes into which we may have fallen.

We do not expect our GAZETTEER to be pronounced faultless; but we confidently anticipate that men of the most opposite creeds will feel it to be impartial, and that competent judges will see it to have been written with no common degree of care.

We have endeavoured to produce uniformity in the spelling of proper names, up to the limit between creating facility and causing confusion; and, therefore, have, on the one hand, adopted general rules with respect to Irish prefixes, and, on the other, avoided all interference with either Irish radices or Saxon designations. Thus, we have always written Innis with two n's, as Innistigue, not Inistigue; always Kill before a vowel and Kil before a consonant, as Killalla, and Kilbeggan; and always Balli before n, and Bally before any other letter, as Ballinakill and Ballymahon; but we have studiously refrained from imitating such capricious, unwarrantable, and confusing innovations upon Erse etymology as are exhibited by the Ordnance Survey and the Census of 1841, in the examples of Tullyhunco for Tullaghonoho, or Tullyhaw for Tullaghagh. In the numerous instances in which two or more names for one locality are in use, or two considerably different modes of spelling one name are practised, we have selected the fittest as the headings for our articles, and then made references to these in the alphabetical places of the others; and though the attempt in the Ordnance Survey and the Census of 1841 to introduce an improved orthography, appears to us exceedingly injudicious, we have attempted to gratify every reader who thinks differently of it, by introducing all the new spellings to their appropriate places, and linking to them the older spellings under which we have described the localities. Multitudes of minor scenes and objects which we omitted either intentionally or through oversight to notice under separate articles, are referred to in their respective alphabetical places; and some thousands more, as well as persons, remarkable events, and interesting circumstances, will be named in a very copious, general Index. Our miles are all Irish, and our acres all English, except when the contrary is expressly mentioned; and our incidental statements of population, when no year is named, are all of 1831. Our measurements of areas within all the counties, except Dublin, Monaghan, Cork, Kerry, and Limerick, are those of the Ordnance Survey; and of these five counties are those adopted, as in the highest degree authoritative, in the Census of 1841. Our statistics of ecclesiastical property are from the four large folio reports of the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenues and Patronage; of church and chapel attendance, of the numbers of religious denominations, and of the attendance and endowments of schools, are from the two thick folio reports of the Commissioners on Public Instruction; of the National Schools, are from the annual reports of the National Board; of poor-law affairs and medical charities, are from the many and voluminous reports of the Poor-law Commissioners; of railways and traffic, are from the Second Report of the Commissioners on Railways, published in 1838; of constituencies, crime, prisons, and constabulary, are from the latest annual public reports on these topics; of loan funds, are partly from the report of 1842, and partly from that of 1843; of fisheries, fishing-harbours, and coast-guard stations, are from the report of the Commissioners of Enquiry into the State of the Irish Fisheries, published in 1836; of trade and commerce, are partly from the Railway Commissioners' Report, partly from various reports on canals, partly from the Census of 1841, and partly from other reports and sources of miscellaneous character; of harbours and other matters on the main-stream, lakes, and affluents of the Shannon, are from the large and costly reports of the Commissioners for Improving the Navigation of the Shannon; of bogs, are from the four folio reports of the Commissioners on Bogs in Ireland, published in 1812-14 ; of trees, live stock, farms, occupations, and other matters of mere enumeration, are from the Census of 1841 ; of the constitution, officers, and property of boroughs, are from the voluminous reports of the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations ; and of a variety of other matters, are from miscellaneous parliamentary reports too numerous to be mentioned, and from an exceedingly scarce and very curious digest of official documents by Cæsar Moreau, Esq., published in 1827. In instances where Presbyterians or other Protestant dissenters amounted to only one or two or sometimes three, we have usually classed them with members of the Established church, under the common name of Protestants ; but in all instances in which their numbers exceeded three, we have mentioned them separately, and, for the sake of distinction and brevity, have noticed the members of the Establishment as Churchmen. An awkward circumstance in the First Report of the Commissioners on Public Instruction is, that it exhibits all Methodists as members of the Established church, and all their places of worship as Meeting-houses of Protestant dissenters ; and as we possessed no means of accurately distinguishing between these Meeting-houses and those of real Protestant dissenters, we were obliged to imitate the awkwardness of the report, even at the expense of nominally representing the persons of Protestant dissenters as in two dioceses fewer, and in others not much more numerous, than their Meeting-houses. Our rule for managing the exceedingly numerous instances in which the Census of 1831 and the Ecclesiastical Authorities differ from each other in the statement of parochial population, has been to follow the latter in cases where the ecclesiastical limits and not the quondam civil ones were adopted by the Ordnance Survey, to copy both statements in other cases of very wide discrepancy, and to follow the census in all cases in which the discrepancy is small. The maps we have used for country districts are those of the Ordnance Survey, checked in matters not quite recent by those of Arrowsmith and Beaufort ; and the maps we have used for towns are those of the Parliamentary Reports on Proposed Boundaries and on Municipal Corporation Boundaries, published in respectively 1832 and 1837. We conclude by transfusing into direct statement two promises made in our Prospectus :—" All mutually related articles are so harmonized with one another, and the smaller so carefully subordinated to the larger, that a reader may rise through a gradation of views, from the parts of a district to the district itself, and from a series of districts to a county or a province, so as to acquire a far more comprehensive knowledge of the whole than could be obtained from the perusal of any number of general works, whether tours or consecutive descriptions. An Introductory Article is also given, exhibiting at one view the Position, Extent, Coasts, Marine waters, Islands, Surface, Rivers, Lakes, Mineralogy, Botany, Climate, Soils, Agriculture, Manufactures, Commerce, Fisheries, Internal Communications, Political and Ecclesiastical Divisions, Public Revenue, Civil Constitution, Religion, Education, Economical and Population Statistics, Literature, Antiquities, and Civil and Ecclesiastical History of the whole Kingdom."

ABBERT. See MONIVAE, and MOYNE.

ABBEY, or CONCOMROE-ABBEY, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Burren, and on the north border of co. Clare, Munster. It lies 8½ miles west-north-west of Gort; and partly skirts Galway-bay, directly opposite the town of Galway. Area, 4,714 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,493; in 1841, 1,442.* Houses 223. The surface, in a general view, is green and pastoral, boldly tumulated, much diversified in outline, and not a little prominent among the features of the rich southern hill-screen of the brilliant and far-expanding bay. A rocky mountain which overhangs the sea exhibits some curious marks of ancient and unrecorded mining operations. At its foot is a large chasm, which appears to have been partly formed by the quarry, and whence local tradition asserts the stones to have been taken for the construction of the well-known monastic pile of the parish; and on the mountain's side are two mining-shafts, one of which is computed to be about 900 feet deep, exclusive of an unknown depth of water at the bottom.—In a lonely winding vale, near the northern boundary of the parish, stands the splendid ruin of the abbey of Concomroe. A spectator who stations himself near one of the angles at the west end of the nave, immediately under the square steeple or belfry, commands an interesting view of the interior, and one which forms a fine subject for the pencil. The choir, in front, exhibits a groined arch, inferior, perhaps, to none in Ireland, except those of Holycross; the north and south transepts, on the right and left, open by large plain circular arches, and show two small pointed-arched chapels, immediately flanking the choir; and the foreground, or open area, is an impressive and almost chaotic assemblage of human bones, rugged monumental stones, and earthless fragments of rock. A square plot of ground, about six acres in extent, and with the abbey in its centre, was enclosed with a wall ten feet high, and entered by an arched gateway opposite the west end of the pile. Concomroe, the present designation of the ruin, is a corruption of 'Corcum-rundh,' the confluence of the three Erse words, Cor, Cam, and Rundh, which mean, respectively, 'a district,' 'a quarrel,' and 'red;' and the name seems commemorative of some signal, though unrecorded one, of the early sanguinary fights which occurred in the vicinity. Another ancient name of the fabric was the abbey De viridi saxo, or 'of the green rock;' and alluded to the amazing fertility of the circumjacent mountainous and stony land. According to the red book of Kilkenny, the abbey was founded, in 1194, for Cistercian monks, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary, by Donald, king of Limerick; but, according to other authorities, it was founded, in 1200, by his son, Donogh Carhrac. The monastery was colonized from that of Suir; it had afterwards annexed to it the cell of Kilshanny, in the barony of Corcomroe, and became subject to the celebrated abbey of Furnes in Lancashire; and, according to Archdall, it was eventually, with eleven quarters of land, granted to Richard Harding. The Cistercian monks continued to cling to it so late as at least 1628; but, from the date of the suppression, appear to have been subject to the Cistercian abbot of Holycross. John O'Dea, a Cistercian monk, formerly of the Irish college of Salamanca, and possessing some obscure claims to the honours of authorship, was appointed superior of the abbey about the time we have named, and probably was the last who ever nominally held the office. An abbot of Corcomroe, of the name of John, was, in 1418, made bishop of Kilmacduagh. In 1267, Donogh O'Brien, king of Thomond, was killed at the battle of Sindaine in Burren, and solemnly interred in the abbey; and, in a niche on the north side of the choir, may still be seen the mutilated remains of a grand monument and effigies which were erected to his memory.—The village of Abbey, to which, as well as to the parish, the monastic edifice gives name, claims to be superior to the latter in antiquity. Though now an obscure place, inhabited, in 1831, by only 128 persons, it figures, in the remote year 1088, as the scene of three successive plunderings by Roderick O'Connor and Dermot O'Brien. In 1317, not far from the village, was fought a great battle, in which Teige and Murtogh Garbh, sons of Brien Ruadh, king of Thomond, and many other leading persons among the O'Briens, were slain. The scene of action was along the skirt of a height which is now called the Hill of the Gallowa; and it still occasionally yields up doleful memorials of slaughter and internment. Other matters of interest in the parish, including fisheries and trade, are connected with the villages of BURREN, BEHAGH, and CURRENROE: which see.—This parish is in the dio. of Kilfenora; but excepting the townlands of Aughinish, Behagh, Finavara, and Kiltmacrane, which are annexed to Kilcorney, it is wholly inappropriate. There is neither parish church nor Roman Catholic chapel. The commissioners of Public Instruction computed the parishioners in 1834 to be 4 Churchmen, and 2,673 Roman Catholics; and they found only one school, a hedge-school, with an average attendance of 40.

ABBEY, or INNISLONNAGH, or INNISLONAGHTY, a parish, partly in the barony of Glenahiry, co. Waterford, and partly in that of Iffa and Offa East, co. Tipperary, Munster. The Tipperary section contains the villages of ABBEY and TOBERAHEENA. Area of the whole 9,378 acres; of the Glenahiry section, 2,970 acres; of the rural districts of the Tipperary section, 6,354 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,271; of the Gl. section, 1,256. Pop. of the whole, in 1841, 4,764; of the Gl. section, 1,499; of the rural districts of the Tip. section, 1,814. Houses in the Gl. section, 233; in the Tip. section, 511. The Waterford section seems sometimes to monopolize the name of Abbey; and the Tipperary section, that of Innislonnagh, or Innislonaghty. The two are mutually separated by the beautiful and majestic Suir. The entire parish is physically distributed into about one-tenth of hill, pasture, or mountainous ground, and about nine-tenths of arable and grazing land of a fine quality. Its name is derived from a monastic, or more properly a Culdean, establishment, alleged to have been founded by St. Mochoemoc, who died in 635. The building is said, but on very questionable authority, to have possessed singular beauty, and to have contained a chapel which was consecrated by St. Patrick. A holy well at the place possesses part of the same kind of fame which has been assigned to the fabric.—The village or town of ABBEY stands 2½ miles west by south of Cloumel, and is inhabited principally by an agricultural population. Area 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,123; in 1841, 998. Houses 176.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Lismore; and, together with the rectory of Monksland, forms the benefice or union of Innislonaghty. Gross income £688 19s. 3½d.; nett £593 0s. 2½d. Patron, the Crown. The two parishes of the benefice are separated from each other by the intervening parishes of Rossmire, Feus, and Churchtown. A curate is employed for Monksland, at a stipend of £75. Abbey, or Innislonaghty parish-church was built in 1818, at the cost of £830 15s. 4½d.; of which £553 16s. 11d. was a loan from the late board of First Fruits. Sittings 200. Monksland church, 20 miles distant, was built in 1832, by means of a gift of £900 from the late board. Sittings 200. A school-house in Monksland is also used for religious service in the Establishment. There is no other place of worship in the benefice. The parishioners of Abbey were reported, in 1834, to consist of 115 Churchmen, 4,270 Roman Catholics, 65 Presbyterians, and 9 other Protestant dissenters,—in all 4,459; and those of Monksland, to consist of 89 Churchmen and 1,020 Roman Catholics,—in all 1,109. The schools of Abbey, in 1834, were a day-school, aided by £10 and other allowances from the rector, and £5 from the Distillery company of the parish; a day-school, kept by the ladies of the Presentation Convent, and attended by 600 girls; and 3 hedge or day-schools, supported wholly by fees. See MONKSLAND.

ABBEY-ISLE. See AGHAMORE.

ABBEY, or KNOCKMOY, or ABBEYKNOCKMOY, a parish, 7 miles south-east of Tuam, and partly in the barony of Clare, but chiefly in that of Tyquin, co.

Galway, Connaught. Length 6 miles; breadth 3; area of the whole, 12,386 acres; of the Tyquin section, 10,913 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,806; in 1841, 3,846; of the Tyquin section in 1841, 3,533. Houses in the whole, 704; in the Tyquin section, 642. The surface of the parish is drained by the river Moyne; and consists, in a general view, of light sheep pasture-ground, with a large interspersion of bog. What the Commissioners on bogs in Ireland call distinctively the bog of Abbeyknockmoy, comprehends 1,137 English acres, and was pronounced reclaimable at the cost of £1,579 10s. It lies 121 feet above sea-level, has a mean depth of 16 feet, and is a firm black bog, superincumbent on marl and gravel. On the north is very high ground, whose soil is chiefly the debris of limestone; and on the south is a high hill called Knockrue, washed along its base by the Moyne. Other bog-lands of the parish are reported on jointly with those of Abbert and Windfield: see MOYNE. Much of the district immediately upon the river is pleasant in contour, and rich in the dress of cultivation.—The name 'Knockmoy' signifies 'the hill of the plain'; and the abbey which shares with it in the designation of the parish, was anciently called 'Monasterium de colle victorie.' The establishment is said to have been founded and endowed in 1180, by Cathal O'Connor, monarch of Ireland, in commemoration of a victory obtained by him at its site over Almericus de St. Lawrence. Considerable ruins of the edifice, which still exist, contain some frescoes, which, though rude in design, and faded in colour, possess uncommon interest for the antiquary, as the most authentic memorials anywhere to be found of ancient Irish costumes. These paintings occur on the north side of the chancel, and owe their conservation to the circumstance of that part of the fabric being vaulted with stone; but they are now waning rapidly into decay. The figures are somewhat larger than life, and are arranged in an upper line of six kings, and a lower line representing a youth naked, tied to a tree, and transfixing with arrows shot by two archers, while the brehon or judge, who had pronounced sentence, sits by with a roll of laws in his hand. Three of the kings appear as crowned skeletons, and are usually conjectured to be the most distinguished regal ancestors of the house of O'Connor, but seem, from the highly antique character of their crowns, a character much known in the latter ages of the Roman empire, to be patriot monarchs of very early Irish times. The other three kings are painted as in life, and represented each with the accompaniment of a fighting bird, in the same manner as the Anglo-Norman kings on their seals, and Harold the Norman king in the Bayeux tapestries; and they seem, from the form of their crowns, to have belonged to the 12th or 13th century, and been among the distinguished native princes who defended their country against the aggressions of adventurers. The opinion respecting them which has hitherto been copied by almost every compiler, and which has the high apology of being sanctioned by Dr. Ledwich, is that "the centre one is Roderick O'Connor, who was monarch of Ireland at the period of the English introduction, supported by two vassal kings, one his grand falconer, the other his grand marshal." But Dr. Ledwich mistakes a bird in the hand of the central figure for a trefoil or shamrock, and employs his blunder as a chief argument for his opinion; he gives in his Antiquities an utterly incorrect engraving of the frescoes; and he destroys all confidence in his judgment by venturing the grossly improbable conjecture, that the paintings were the work of the confederate Roman Catholics of the 17th century.

The lower line of figures represents the death of the young son of Dermot M'Murrough, for that ambitious man's perfidy in calling over the English. The youth was delivered to Roderick O'Connor as a hostage for his father's fidelity; and, according to Cambrensis, was abandoned by the inhuman parent to his fate. The figure of the brehon is now nearly destroyed by the oozing of rain from an opening in the roof.—The villages or hamlets in the parish, with their respective pop. in 1831, are Abbey, 352; Ballinamona, 157; Newtown, 216; and Poullavarla, 204.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Tuam, and forms part of the benefice of KILLERBAN: which see. Its Roman Catholic chapel has an average attendance of 1,500. Its inhabitants, in 1834, were computed to amount to 3,094; all of whom, with the exception of 22 Churchmen, were Roman Catholics. A school at Briarfield, attended by 70 boys and 43 girls, is in connection with the National Board of Education, and receives from it £14 a-year.

ABBEYDARIG, a village in the barony of Moydoc, co. Longford, Leinster. It stands a little north of the village of Keenagh, on the road from Ballymahon to Tarnonbarry, and is overhung on one side by the Slieve Gaudry hills.

ABBEYDORNEY, ABBEY-O'DORNEY, or MONTNAGUE, a village in the parish of O'Dorney, barony of Clannaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands near the river Brick, and on the west road from Limerick to Tralee; 5 miles east by north of Tralee, and 8 south-west by south of Listowel. Area 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 338; in 1841, 418. Houses 57. The abbey from which the place derives its name was founded in 1154, called Kyrie Eleison, and dedicated to the Virgin Mary. It was colonized with Cistercian monks from the abbey of Magio, in the county of Limerick; and its abbot sat as a lord in parliament. The abbey and its possessions were conferred, at the dissolution, on Edmund Lord Kerry, who was created Baron O'Dorney in 1537; but they were to revert to the crown in the event of a default of heirs male; and some of the lands were granted by Queen Elizabeth to the provost, fellows, and scholars, of Trinity college, Dublin. The ruins which remain are of no note.

ABBEYFEALE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the western border of the barony of Glenquin, co. Limerick, Munster. Area of the rural districts, 18,099 acres; of the village, 51 acres. Pop. of the rural districts in 1831, 3,635; in 1841, 4,793. Houses 724. Pop. of the village in 1831, 607; in 1841, 699. Houses 131. The village stands on the western verge of the parish, on the left bank of the Feale, and on the mailroad from Limerick to Tralee; 12 miles south-west of Rathkeale, 30 south-west of Limerick, and 124 south-west of Dublin. The Feale is here spanned by a bridge, and separates the parish from Kerry. The village is the eyecore of an extensive mountainous district, rich in its upland capacities, replete with interest to the mineralogist and the georgic improver, naturally all but impervious and inaccessible, and only a few years ago laid open by means of government roads. "It so happened," says P. Mahone, Esq., before the Select Committee on Public Works in 1835, "that I had not seen the new government roads in the neighbourhood of Abbeyfeale and Castle-island until last September; and having known that district before they were projected, I confess I felt astonished at the extent of the general improvement which the opening of these roads has produced." A miniature copy of a picture which Mr. Bryan's 'Practical View of Ireland,' gives of "a circle of 20 miles in diameter, having Abbeyfeale for its centre," will at once fully exhibit the parish, and clearly show the economical importance of the village. The tract within the circle presents an area of 314 square miles, or 201,062 Irish acres. It forms a main portion of the great group of hills which rise between the Shannon and the Blackwater; and extends 4 miles southward into Cork, 10 eastward into Limerick, and 10 westward into Kerry. A few towns or villages stand at long intervals near the circumference; but the least remote is 8 miles from Abbeyfeale, and the others are from 10 to 12. Mansions occupied by proprietors occur nowhere to exert an influence upon the district, except in a few instances near these villages, or below the bases of the hills. Though less than one-fourth of the area has ever been cultivated, the whole affords great natural advantages to the improver, whether his object be agriculture or manufacture. The hills, tame, uniform, and uninteresting in outline, have an average altitude of about 1,000 feet above sea-level, and are not too high for luxuriant vegetation. They all rest on limestone, which is everywhere found round their bases; they consist chiefly of highly indurated sandstone, and variously hardened black slate clay; and they possess beds of culm, some of which, though dipping at a steep angle, and seldom more than 12 inches thick, have been worked. A coating of clay, from 3 to 30 feet thick, covers the rock; a stratum of peat, from 6 inches to 3 feet thick, overlies the clay on the summits and the higher acclivities; and a vegetable soil, tolerably productive, and not a little improvable by lime, prevails over all the lower declivities and the valleys. "If," says Mr. Bryan, "the light bog were drained and dug up, and some of the clay substratum got up and mixed with it, along with a proper proportion of lime, a very superior vegetable soil may be made on every perch of the whole surface, and acres of barren heath may be made to produce the finest oats, potatoes, or hay. If three-fourths of the district be in a state of nature, the land now waste could, by industry, be made capable of maintaining 452,390 persons, or nearly half-a-million. Here might the labour of emigrants be well directed at home, which is now in active operation clearing the wastes of America, if advantage were taken of resources which our own country possesses. The manufacturers will here find advantages not less interesting: a constant supply of water in the Feale, the Smerla, the Ullahaw, the Clyda, the Brina, and several other rivers, with from 40 to 50 feet of fall, upon an average, on every mile of their length, offering a boundless field for their operations." The village of Abbeyfeale is 24 statute miles distant from a point of junction near Askaton, with the Shannon line of railway, as laid down by the public commissioners. The dispensary at the village had, in 1840, an income of £207; but is 13 statute miles distant from Newcastle, the seat of the poor-law union to which it belongs, and of the medical attendant's residence. It has branches at Attia and Ardagh. The abbey, which gave name to the place, was a Cistercian one of some celebrity, founded in 1188, and afterwards made a cell to the abbey of Monasterenagh in Kerry. Half-a-mile below the village, and overlooking the Feale, are the ruins of Purt-castle; and at 5 miles, well-situated on the Feale, is Riversdale, the seat of David Mahony, Esq.—Abbeyfeale parish is an improper vicarage, in the dio. of Limerick. "Although," say the Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenue, "there is a church in this improper parish, it does not appear that there is any provision made by the proprietor for the maintenance of an officiating minister." The vicar, who officiates, resides at Rathkeale. The average attendance at the church is about 15; and, at the Roman Catholic chapel, about 900. The parishioners were computed, in 1834, to consist of 27 Churchmen and 4,393 Roman Catholics. The schools, in the same year, were 4 daily schools, all supported by fees, and aggregately attended, on the average, by 255 children. A school, attended by 109, was taken into connection with the National Board in 1840, and salaried with £4.

ABBEYGORMAGAN, a parish partly in the barony of Leitrim, but chiefly in that of Longford, and 8½ miles west by north of Eyrecourt, co. Galway, Connaught. Area of the Leitrim section, 3,440 acres; of the Longford section, 8,318 acres. Pop. of the Leitrim section, in 1831, 427; in 1841, 791. Houses 129. Pop. of the Longford section, in 1831, 2,233; in 1841, 2,139. Houses 356. The land is, in general, of good quality; and the surface declines to the south. The abbey, whence the parish has its name, was called Monaster O'Gormogan, or De Via Nova; it was for canons regular of the order of St. Augustin; and, in the 34th year of Henry VIII., it was granted to Ulick, the first earl of Clanricarde.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Clonfert; and forms part of the benefice of KILTORMER; which see. Title composition £108. But a portion of the tithes, compounded for £110 15s. 4½d., is appropriated to the bishop and five cathedral dignitaries of the diocese. The Roman Catholic chapel at Mullagh, within the parish, is attended, on the average, by 900 persons. The parishioners were computed in 1834, to consist of 38 Churchmen, and 3,019 Roman Catholics. There were, in the same year, 2 schools, wholly supported by fees, and attended jointly by 130 scholars.

ABBEY-JERPOINT, or JERPOINT-WEST, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Gowran, 1½ mile south-west of Thomastown, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Much confusion and discrepancy occur in the statements of parliamentary and other documents respecting it.* Following the census of 1841—whose authority must, for several reasons, be regarded as final—we represent Abbey-Jerpoint and Jerpoint-West as two entirely distinct parishes, with each its defined area and separate statistics. Abbey-Jerpoint is all in the barony of Gowran. Area, 1,008 acres. Pop., in 1841, 375. Houses 77. Jerpoint-West is in the baronies of Gowran, Ida, and Knocktopher. Area, of the Gowran section, 1,819 acres; of the Ida section, 1,167 acres; of the Knocktopher section, 2,530 acres. Pop., of the Gowran section, in 1841, 336; of the Ida section, 294; of the Knocktopher section, 576. Houses in the G. section, 53; in the I. section, 46; in the K. section, 68.—This parish, or pair of parishes, is clustered with 13 other real or reputed parishes to form the union or benefice of Burnchurch, in the dio. of Ossory. The Commissioners of Public Instruction computed 'Abbey-Jerpoint' to contain 5 Churchmen, 1 Presbyterian, and 1,884 Roman Catholics; and 'Jerpoint-West' to contain 6 Churchmen and 865 Roman Catholics; and in neither district did they find any school.

The abbey of Jerpoint, whose name figures in such a tumult of topographical nomenclature, is situated on the right bank of the river Nore, nearly two miles west of Thomastown. The ruin, though grievously dilapidated, possesses an extent and a beauty which command the admiration of at once the antiquary, the architect, and the lover of the picturesque; it is one of the best specimens in Ireland of the mixed Anglo-Norman and early English styles of architecture; and it, at the same time, presents less ancient parts which, while strictly in the pointed style, and probably contemporary with the abbies of Tintern and Dunbrody, excel these edifices both in artistic execution, and in lightness and elegance of general design. The ruin occupies an area of nearly three acres. The church was cruciform; and consisted, as usual, of nave, choir, and transepts. Six pointed arches, with a corresponding number of massive columns, supported the roof of the nave; and above and between these arches, are the remains of six clerestory windows, narrow, and rather rounded at their top. The western, or great window of the nave, is in similar style to these windows; but consists of three distinct arches, separated by two single mullions. The pinnacled tower, which rises from the intersection of the nave and the transepts, is supported by four massive square pillars, and the arches which spring from them; and its roof is curiously groined with springers, which are supported on each side by neatly ornamental corbels. The arches of the transepts and the nave, at the intersection, are in the pointed style, while the arch which leads to the choir is circular. The roof of the choir also is circular; and yet the eastern or altar window, now built up to a smaller dimension, is pointed. The nave and the transepts have been unroofed. A tomb, sculptured in rude though bold relief, and situated in the choir, opposite the grand altar of the south cross-aisle, is said to have been erected over the remains of Donogh, king of Ossory, who died in 1185. Two figures repose on it, habited, the one as a male and the other as a female, in the costume of the 12th or 13th century; and the former holds a crucifix in his right hand, and extends his left toward a small harp which hangs from his side. Various images of the apostles appear in compartments round the base of the tomb. Two crowned figures stand at the foot of the monument; and beside them kneels an angel, whose hands are uplifted in devotion. Two conspicuous ancient monuments occur of ecclesiastics. On the one, which is of black marble, lies the full length figure of an abbot, in his proper habit; his head reposing on a pillow of much elegance; his right hand uplifted as if in the act of swearing an oath of fidelity; and his left holding a crozier, whose lower end is gnawed by a serpent, and whose volute contains a well-sculptured Agnus Dei. On the other monument is a statue, executed with conspicuous skill and delicacy; the hands holding respectively a sprig of trefoil, and a crozier of excellent workmanship; and the altar-slab on which the figure rests, displaying a profusion of trefoils and roses. Several other monuments of ecclesiastics, but in quite a defaced condition, may be seen amidst predominant rubbish. The abbey, according to Archdall, was

* The census of 1831 does not name 'Abbey-Jerpoint,' and states the population of 'West-Jerpoint' at 1,767. Both the fourth Report on Ecclesiastical Revenue, and the first on Public Instruction, state the population of 'Jerpoint-West,' in 1831, at 553. The latter of these authorities exhibits Abbey-Jerpoint as a different parish from Jerpoint-West, with a population, in 1831, of 1,851; but mentions that, "under Abbey-Jerpoint are comprised the reputed parishes of Abbey-Jerpoint, Meberstown, Arderra, and Lisnattigue." The Ecclesiastical Revenue Report says, that the three districts thus associated with Abbey-Jerpoint, "are townlands, not parishes." Other authorities before us are equally conflicting, no two of them being, in all respects, agreed; and they seem to us to have been whirled into discrepancy by a war of facts respecting the distribution of the Jerpoint-abbey lands. Following Brewer's Beauties of Ireland, we represent the abbey-manor as now subdivided into Abbey-Jerpoint, the property successively of the families of Marsh, Holson, and Greene.—Church or Town-Jerpoint, the estate of the Huntly family.—Waste-Jerpoint, now possessed by Mr. Marsh of Stradbally,—and Mill-Jerpoint, inherited from Sir William Petty by the marquis of Lansdowne, and not long ago sold to Mr. Franks of Dublin; following the Ecclesiastical Revenue Report, we represent the parish of Jerpoint-West as comprising 8,349 acres, 1 road, and 21½ perches, and as consisting of arable land.

founded in 1180, by Donough, king of Ossory, for Cistercian monks. It was richly endowed both by Donough and by other distinguished persons; it was confirmed to the monks by John, Lord of Ireland, afterwards King John; and it was surrendered or dissolved in 1539. Its abbot was a lord of parliament; and the last person who filled the office, was Oliver G. Fitz-Oliver, a younger brother of Baron John Grace, of Courtstown.

ABBEYKNOCKMOY. See ABBEY.

ABBEYLARA, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the eastern border of the barony of Granard, co. Longford, Leinster. Its length, including an intersection $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles broad of the parish of Granard, is 14 miles; its breadth is 2 miles; and its area, including 626 acres of water, is 9,150 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,112; in 1841, 3,084. Houses 505. The land is, in general, of a good quality. Lough-Coonoh, though not distinguished for beauty or for great extent, is a conspicuous feature. On the south-west shore of the lake are the village of Abbeylara, and the site of the abbey whence it and the parish have their name. The village stands on the road from Granard to Dublin; $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Granard, and $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Castle-Pollard. Area 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 316; in 1841, 194. Houses 28. The abbey of Larah or Lerha claims, but on no feasible evidence, to have been founded by St. Patrick. In 1205, it was refounded, or more probably founded, by the Tuite family, for Cistercian monks. Richard O'Ferrall, the last abbot, became bishop of Ardagh in 1541. Part of the abbey's site is now occupied by the parish-church.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardagh. Vicarial title composition, £105. Gross income £127 6s.; nett £109 11s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are inappropriate; they have been compounded for £155; and, excepting those of three town-lands, they belong to the Marquis of Westminster. The parish-church was built in 1803. Sittings 70. Two school-houses at the extremities of the parish are also used as parochial places of worship. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended, on the average, by 1,075 persons. In 1834, the Churchmen were computed to amount to 167; and the Roman Catholics to 3,114. In the same year there were two day-schools, aided by respectively £12 and £6 from the Ardagh association, and three hedge-schools, the whole attended, on the average, by 164 scholars.

ABBEYLEIX, a parish, partly in the barony of Fassading, co. Kilkenny, but chiefly in the baronies of Cullinagh, Clarmallagh, and West Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. The Cullinagh section contains the town of ABBEYLEIX: see next article. Area of the Fassading section, 681 acres; of the Cullinagh section, 11,246 acres; of the Clarmallagh section, 1,475 acres; of the Maryborough section, 145 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,990; in 1841, 6,719. Pop., in 1841, of the Fassading section 166; of the Cullinagh section 6,091; of the rural portion of that section 5,070; of the Clarmallagh section 413; of the Maryborough section 49. Houses of the four sections respectively 23, 916, 65, and 6. The township of Corballyogue is 5 miles distant from the rest of the parish; separated from it by Ballinakill; and surrounded, on other sides, by Clounagh. The mansion of Abbeyleix, the seat of Viscount de Vesey, and erected in 1774, is a capacious and handsome quadrangular building, four stories high, and faced with cut stone. The demesne, comprehending about 700 acres, is profusely embellished with noble and venerable trees, now amassed in woods, and now drawn out in splendid avenues, or disposed in ornamental arrangements. But the ground is low, flat, naturally poor, and encompassed with great expanses of bog. Though now smiling in cultivation, and rich in dresses woven for it by judicious and persevering exertion, it is part of a tract which, while under the sway of the O'Mores, was utterly cheerless and unpromising. Even yet the aggregate land of the parish is poor in quality. Abbeyleix bog, as reported on by the Commissioners on Bogs in Ireland, comprehends 964 English acres; lies from 298 to 324 feet above sea-level; skirts both the demesne and the town of Abbeyleix, consists principally of fibrous peat or red bog, of a wet and spongy nature, interspersed with pools; discharges its surface-water by three rivulets to the Nore; and could be improved at the cost of £1,208.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Leighlin. Vicarial title composition £169 4s. 7½d.; glebe £5 15s. 5d. Gross income £175 0s. 0½d.; nett £138 11s. 6½d. Patron, the Viscount de Vesey. The rectorial tithes are inappropriate, belong to the Viscount de Vesey, and are compounded for £338 9s. 2½d. A curate has a salary of £75. The parish-church was built in 1830, at the cost of £2,215, lent by the late board of First Fruits. Sittings 500. Another place of worship exists in connection with the Establishment; but is not generally used. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended, on the average, by 2,000 persons; and a Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house by 70. The parishioners were, in 1834, classified, by computation, into 1,028 Churchmen, 4 Protestant Dissenters, and 4,907 Roman Catholics. The schools, in 1834, were a parochial day-school, averagely attended by 120; a Hibernian school society's day-school, by 18; a girl's work-school, by 40; an infant-school, by 30; and two pay day-schools by jointly 45.

ABBEYLEIX, a post and market town in the above parish, stands on the left side of the river Nore, and on the road from Dublin to Cork, 5 miles north-north-east of Castle-Durrow, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Stradbally, and 49½ miles south-west of Dublin. An ancient town of its name, and near its site, having sunk into insignificance, was razed by Lord de Vesey during the latter half of last century, to be succeeded by a new town or village. The present Abbeyleix was patronized and beautified by the son and successor of its noble founder; and has become one of the neatest and most pleasing villages in Ireland. Its houses have most of the ornaments which comport with the true and rustic cottage character; they possess the agreeable and useful appendage of garden-plots; and they combine the appearance of rural beauty with that of domestic comfort. The parish-church is a commanding and seemly feature. A small bridewell in the village is kept in a creditable state, and is under the immediate control of the board, and superintendence of the governor of the county gaol. The village will be touched, at the distance of 60 statute miles from the Dublin terminus, by the Kilkenny line of railway projected by the commissioners; and will be placed by it at only 2½ hours' travelling distance from Dublin, and 18½ from London. Its public conveyances, in 1838, were a car to Maryborough, and a caravan in transit between Mountrath and Dublin. The town is the seat of some noticeable manufactories.

The Abbeyleix Poor-Law Union ranks as the 89th; and was declared on December 3d, 1839. With the exception of part of its electoral division of Durrow, which belongs to co. Kilkenny, it all lies in Queen's co.; and it comprehends an area of 113,400 acres, with a pop., in 1831, 35,597. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are, Abbeyleix, 4,958; Ballinakill, 5,926; Timahoe, 1,591; Ballyroan, 5,748; the Raheen, 5,559; Castletown, 5,130; Aghaboe, 2,915; Killelmore, 1,398; Coolkerry, 1,947; Aughmacart, 2,279; and Durrow, 4,146. The ex-officio guardians amount to 8, and the elected guardians to 24; and of the latter, 4 are chosen by each of the divisions of Abbeyleix and the Raheen, 1 by each of the divisions of Timahoe and Killelmore, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £72,816 2s. 8d.; the total number of persons rated in the first rate was 6,125; and of this total, 1,397 persons were rated for a valuation, not exceeding £1,—817 not exceeding £2,—539 not exceeding £3,—374 not exceeding £4,—and 352 not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on June 16th, 1840,—to be completed in October 1841,—to cost £5,850 for building and completion, and £1,020 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 5 acres, 3 roods, 11 perches, obtained for £6 12s. 8d. of annual rent, and £130 of compensation to occupying tenant; and to contain accommodation for 500 paupers. The workhouse was opened for the admission of paupers, on June 6th, 1842; the total expenses incurred thence till Feb. 6th, 1843, amounted to £2,246 16s. 10½d., and the total amount of previous miscellaneous expense was £551 12s. 4d. There is no fever hospital in the union. The dispensary districts are six in number; they contained in 1831, a population of 33,112; and they have their seats at Abbeyleix, at Ballacolla and Swan, at Ballinakill, at Durrow, at Offerlane, and at Raheen. The Abbeyleix dispensary serves for a district of 10,818 acres, with a population of 5,816; and in 1839, it expended £175 19s. 6d., and administered to 1,200 patients. In 1842, the Abbeyleix Loan Fund had a capital of £6,984, circulated £32,586 in 8,674 loans, cleared a nett profit of £771 6s., and expended for charitable purposes £1,488; and from the date of its institution till the close of 1842, it circulated £121,676 in 32,903 loans, cleared a nett profit of £3,047 4s. 6d., and expended for charitable purposes £2,462 18s. 11d.

A religious house is said to have been founded on or near the site of Abbeyleix, about the year 600. The monastery, however, from which it and the parish derive their name, was founded only in 1183, under the auspices of Coroheger O'More, and colonized by him with Cistercian monks from the abbey of Baltinglass. A town arose under monastic influence, and soon acquired importance by becoming the principal seat of O'More, the head of a powerful native sept who inhabited the very extensive territory anciently known as Leix. See LEIX.—In 1421, a serious skirmish took place at Abbeyleix, between the partisans of the earl of Ormonde and the sept of Fitzpatrick; the former were routed with considerable loss; two distinguished gentlemen of the county of Tipperary were slain; ten persons of rank were made prisoners; and two hundred fled for protection to the interior of the abbey. The lands of the monastery, according to Archdall, amounted, at the dissolution, to 820 acres; and, in the 5th year of Elizabeth, 20 of the acres, together with the abbey, were granted to the earl of Ormonde. No vestige of either the monastic buildings or the castle of the O'Mores, has existed within the recollection of the oldest inhabitant.

ABBEYMAHON, a parish on the north-east border of the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, 7½ miles south of Bandon, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3 miles; area, 4,482 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,563; in 1841, 3,261. Houses 545. The parish lies along the west shore of the bay of Courtmacsherry; and contains the small village of LISLIVANE; which see. The general quality of the land is good arable. "On the west side, as you go down the bay of Courtmacsherry," says Dr. Smith in his History of Cork, "is a good house, in a grove of trees, inhabited by Mr. Arandel; and about half-way down, close to the shore, stand the ruins of Abbeymahon. It was founded by the Bernardine monks, at their own expense; who were a very rich order. The Lord Barry gave them 18 plough-lands, which constitute the parish of Abbeymahon; but this estate was only given them till the building was finished, which never happened; for, soon after, the dissolution of monasteries took place, and these lands were seized into the hands of the crown. The walls of the church are standing, and an house is built on part of the ruins, round which is a grove."—This parish is a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Ross. Gross income, £50; nett, £34. Patron, the earl of Shannon. The tithes are wholly inappropriate in the earl of Shannon, and are compounded for £699. A licensed school-house, capable of accommodating about 40 persons, is the only parochial place of worship. The Roman Catholic chapel has an average attendance of 1,500. The parishioners were stated, in 1834, to consist of 63 Churchmen, and 3,508 Roman Catholics. There were, in 1834, a day-school, attended by 23; a hedge-school, by 80; and a Protestant Sabbath-school, by 14.

ABBEY-O'DORNEY. See ABBEYDORNEY. ABBEYSHRUEL, or SHRUE, a barony in the south-east corner of co. Longford, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north and north-east, by Ardgagh; on the east and south, by co. Westmeath; and, on the west, by Rathcline and Moydow. Its length, south-south-westward, is 7 miles; its breadth, in the opposite direction, is 4½ miles; and its area is 21,006 acres. Its surface consists of part of the valley of the Inny, that stream traversing it from end to end; and, with unimportant exceptions, it is low or strictly champaign.—This barony contains part of the parishes of Killecommagh, Kilglass, Noughaval, Taghsheenid, and Taghsheeny, and the whole of the parishes of Abbeyshrue, Agharra, and Forgney. The towns are Barry and part of Ballymahon. The townland of Annagh and a portion of Lough-Ree, which are included in Noughaval parish, and formerly belonged to Abbeyshrue barony, have been transferred to Rathcline. Pop., in 1831, 9,719; in 1841, 9,546. Houses 1,614. Families 1,766; of whom 1,309 were employed in agriculture, 313 in trade and manufactures, and 144 in other pursuits.

ABBEYSHRUEL, a parish in the barony of Abbeyshrue, 4½ miles north-east of Ballymahon, co. Longford, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½ mile; area, 2,340 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,236; in 1841, 1,283. Houses 217. The land is, in general, of a good quality; and is watered by the river Inny. The parishioners enjoy the advantages of communication by the Royal canal westward to the Shannon, and eastward to Dublin. A fair is held on the first Wednesday after Trinity Sunday. A Cistercian abbey is said to have been founded at Abbeyshrue by O'Ferrall; but even its date, and much more its history, are unknown.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardgagh, and is united with Tashinny, to form the benefice of TASHINNY. [See that article.] The tithes are compounded for £87 13s. 10d. Two day-schools, the one for boys and the other for girls, are aided with respectively £12 and £8 from Lady Rosse, and with each £4 from the Ardgagh society; and these, together with a hedge-school, had, in 1834, an average attendance of 87. The population of the small village of Abbeyshrue, on the eastern verge of the parish and county, is returned with that of the parish.

ABBESIDE, a district and town, in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, and suburban to the borough of Dungarvan, co. Waterford, Munster. The district is described by the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations as one of three parishes which compose the union, or manor of Dungarvan, as forming with Dungarvan-West the parish of Dungarvan mentioned in the ancient charter of the borough, and as now a distinct parish in itself; and it is laid down in one of two maps of Dungarvan in the Report on Borough Boundaries, as "Abbeyside parish, now part of East Dungarvan; but, in all the other parliamentary documents before us, both it and 'East Dungarvan' are treated as strictly a part of Dungarvan parish. Yet in the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical division, it forms a distinct parish in the dio. of Waterford and Lismore. See DUNGARVAN.—The town of Abbeyside extends along the north-east or left side of Dungarvan harbour, directly opposite to the borough; and is included in both the municipal and the parliamentary boundaries. In 1832, it had 40 tenements of value to qualify for the franchise. A very handsome bridge, built solely at the expense of the duke of Devonshire, was erected in 1816 to connect it with Dungarvan; and previous to that time communication could be maintained only by means of a ferry. The ruins of an ancient castle, and of the abbey whence the suburb is named, combine with the harbour to form a pleasant view from the Dungarvan side. The castle belonged to the Magraths, and, along with some adjacent lands, was given by them to the monks. The abbey, an Augustinian one, was founded in the 13th century, patronized by the earls of Desmond, and endowed partly by the magistrates, and partly by the O'Briens of Cumeragh. It had also the rectorial tithes of the parish. The cells have nearly or quite disappeared; and, together with the refectory and other monastic parts of the pile now in ruin, occupied a very considerable area. "The walls of the church and steeple," says Dr. Smith, "still remain, and show it to have been a neat light Gothic building. The steeple is about 60 feet high; and is supported by a curious Gothic vault, sustained by ogyves passing diagonally from one angle to another, forming a cross with four arches, which make the sides of the square of the building. The key-stone in the centre of the vault is very exactly cut, being shaped into a union cross of eight branches, four of which being the diagonal ones, constitute the ogyves; the other four send members to the key-stones of the lateral arches, which are acute at the top. The key-stone of each arch sends members to the contiguous arches in the same manner, as do the imposters of the pilasters, which support the whole, each affording three branches from the same stone." On the north side of the church, near the altar, is the tomb of Donald Magrath, who was interred there in 1400. Pop. of the town, in 1831, 1,859; in 1841, returned with Dungarvan.

ABBEYSTRAND, a hamlet in the parish of Tullagh, east division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 164. Houses 28.

ABBEYSTOWRY, a parish in the eastern division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It contains part of the town of SKIBBEREEN; which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 4; area, 9,390 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,573; in 1841, 6,225. Houses 988. Pop. of the rural districts in 1831, 3,738; in 1841, 4,358. Houses 720. The surface is bisected by the river Ilfen, immediately above that stream's embouchure in the inlet estuary which becomes lost in the ocean at the entrance of Baltimore harbour. The lands near the town are well-cultivated, and afford excellent cereal crops. The soil is a grey clay, and, in some places, red; with a slaty bottom; but has been extensively worked into a loam by cultivation, and by manuring with sea sand. No limestone occurs nearer than Muskerry. Much the larger proportion of the parochial area is rough ground, impervious to the plough. The ecclesiastical edifice whence the name of the parish is taken, stands west of Skibbereen. It was originally a priory, and was long used as a parish-church; but has, for generations, been a ruin. In its interior are a large tomb of the Roches, and some other old memorials of the dead.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial tithe composition, £18 9s. 2½d.; glebe, £45 4s. 10½d. Gross income, £137 12s. 1½d.; nett, £118 9s. 6½d. Patron, John S. Townsend, Esq. The rectorial tithes, which are inappropriate, belong to the patron, and have been compounded for £699. The parish-church was built in 1827, at a cost of £1,181 10s. 9d. British; of which £830 15s. 4½d. were given, and £276 18s. 5½d. lent, by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings, 360; attendance, 250. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 400; and a Wesleyan Methodist chapel, of 40. The parishioners, in 1834, consisted of 246 Churchmen, and 5,344 Roman Catholics. Five day-schools, in 1834, had aggregately on their books 81 boys and 72 girls: one had £8 from the society for discountenancing vice; one had £6 from the Ladies' Hibernian society; one was an infant-school and had £14 10s. from local subscriptions. Three other schools, open only in summer, had jointly 133 scholars. A Protestant Sunday-school had on its books 90 boys and 70 girls.

ABBEYTOWN. See CROSSMOLINA.

ABHAIN-NAILLE, a small but curious stream, one of the head-waters of the Shannon, in co. Leitrim, Connaught. A little lake which emits it, called Killowmawn, or Leacka Mountain lake, is situated on the loftiest summit of the Leacka Mountain range, between Manor Hamilton and Lough Allen; and though overlooked by no ground or slope which can bring to it surface-water, is never dry, and always lacustrine. The stream, at its efflux, is about 10 feet broad; it soon acquires volume from affluents, and velocity from declination; and dashing rapidly down a run of 5 miles, insulates with the Shannon about a mile from Lough Allen. "It has its name," says Dr. McParlan, in his Statistical Survey of the County of Leitrim, "from St. Naill or St. Natalis, who built a monastery in that strange situation, that is, on the top of this [Leacka] mountain. The antiquaries not being agreed upon the county to which this monastery belonged, in search of it I traced this river to its source."

ABINGTON, a parish, 4½ miles south-south-east of Castle-Connell, and partly in the barony of Ownay and Arra, co. Tipperary, but chiefly in the baronies of Ownaybeg and Clanwilliam, co. Limerick, Munster. A section of it also lay till lately within the co. of the city of Limerick, but has been transferred to the barony of Clanwilliam. Length, 15 miles; breadth, 3; area, 30,400 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,564; in 1841, 8,314. Houses 1,248. Pop. of the Tipperary section, in 1831, 792; in 1841, 1,043. Houses 161. Pop. of the Ownaybeg section, in 1831, 5,502; in 1841, 6,173. Houses 920. Pop. of the Clanwilliam section, in 1831, 913; in 1841, 1,098. Houses 167. Pop. of the co. of the city of Limerick section, in 1831, 101. Houses 14. Over nine miles of its length, and the whole of its breadth, it is mountainous, and, for the most part, ruggedly and wildly upland. So large a proportion as 3,240 acres of the remaining part of the area, is waste or of very little value. The village of Abington, with about 150 inhabitants, stands in the Ownybeg section, on the river Mulkern, 4½ miles south-south-east of Castle-Connell. Fairs are held on May 27th, and Aug. 31st. An abbey for Cistercian monks was founded here in 1205, by Fitzwalter, Lord of Carrick, and became the resting-place of his mortal remains. In the parish are the village of MURROE, [which see,] and several hamlets.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Emly; and is united with the parish of Tough, to form the benefice of Abington. See TOUNG. Tithe composition of the parish £650. Gross income of the benefice, £936 18s. 5½d.; nett £787 12s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church, situated in Abington, at the extremity of the union, is old, of unascertained date, and yet in perfect repair. Sittings, 100; average attendance, from 10 to 15. A Roman Catholic chapel at Murroe is attended, on the average, by about 1,450; one at Boher, by from 500 to 600; and one in Tough, by about 1,800. The inhabitants of Abington parish were computed to amount, in 1834, to 126 Churchmen, and 7,762 Roman Catholics; and those of the united parishes, to 143 Churchmen, and 11,398 Roman Catholics. In 1834, there were in Abington 2 national schools and 6 pay day-schools, aggregately attended, on the average, by 465 scholars. Grants were made in 1839 and 1840, by the National School Board, to 3 schools, of respectively £126, £74 3s. 4d., and £160.

ACHILL, a parish in the barony of Burrisboole, on the west coast of co. Mayo, Connaght. Length, 22 miles; breadth, 14; area, 51,522 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,277; in 1841, 6,392. Houses 1,158. It consists of the islands of Achill and Achillbeg, and the peninsula of Corann Achill, each of which will be noticed below.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition £100; nett income £89 1s. Patron, the diocesan. There is no parish-church. Two clergymen of the Established church reside and officiate as missionaries. "The Mission to Achill and the Islands" was commenced about 1832; and, while it has for its grand object the propagation of those doctrines which are maintained by the evangelical section of the Established clergy, it has, from the outset, included and propelled moral mechanism for diffusing Protestant education, disseminating general knowledge, improving the useful arts, and conducting georgic operations. The missionary clergymen preach or expound daily in Erse and English; and, in 1834, had an attendance of from 15 to 35. A printing-press has for some time been in operation at the seat of the mission. A Roman Catholic chapel at Dookanella is attended, on the average, by from 350 to 500 persons; and another at Kildenvett, by from 350 to 400. In 1834, the Protestant parishioners were stated to amount to 156; and the Roman Catholics computed at 5,583. In the same year, there were 4 free schools, under the mission, each salaried with £20; 3 free schools, each salaried with £8 by the Roman Catholic parish priest, pending on application to the National Board; and 2 hedge-schools,—the whole having aggregately on their books 261 scholars. In 1840, the National Board made a grant of £107 10s. to each of 3 schools.

ACHILL, a district consisting of the peninsula of Corann Achill and the island of Achill, and possessing at once a melancholy, a wild, and a sublime interest. The peninsula, whose name means 'the Hook of the Eagle,' is connected with the mainland by the narrow isthmus of Molyrany; and extends about 6 miles westward, with a mean breadth of about 4 miles. It is a huge alpine mass of conglomerate sandstone, with flat bogs on the north shore; dismally barren and desolate; and peopled by about 600 mountaineers and bog-trotters of most primitive manners. The only spot on its coast where the construction of a harbour seems practicable, is at Doobeg, behind a spit of boulders at the mouth of two mountain-streams. See DOOBEG. A strait, less than half-a-mile in mean breadth, and extending north and south, separates the peninsula from the island. This island is approximately triangular in form, and about 30 miles in circumference; but is so indented as to possess 80 miles of coast. Its area is 35,283 acres; and its population nearly or quite 4,000. Its surface is, for the most part, mountainous and extremely wild, consisting of large flat bogs on the east, and lofty hills of quartz rock on the other two sides; and its shores, or rather alpine sea-walls, are more mural and stupendous than those of any equal extent of coast in Ireland. Its great height, combined with its seclusion, renders its cloud-cleaving summits such fit spots for the eyre, that almost any stranger ignorant of its name might call it Achill Island,—the Island of Eagles. A part of the mountain which forms the western extremity, and terminates in the noted cape of Achill Head, seems as if it had suffered disavement from a sunk continent by some tremendous convulsion of nature, and sends down a shelving precipice of about 2,200 feet right to the water's edge. Menaan Head, on the south coast, presides over mural and projecting cliffs of 700 feet and upwards, of altitude; and commands a sublime view of the entanglement of mountain and ocean, the labyrinth of islands and bays, and the intricacy of a boldly and singularly featured landscape from the Alps of Cunnemara and Joyce country, to those of Erris and the Mullet, with the intervening tracery in Clew-bay and around Croaghpatrick, and the interior heights of Corann, Ballycro, and Nephin. Achill Sound, which has a common opening from the ocean with Blacksod-bay, and extends between Achill and the mainland, is, in one place, occupied athwart more than half its breadth by the island of INKISKEGILL: which see. The intervening strait is called the Bull's Mouth, and is swept by a careering and dangerous tidal current. The southern part of the sound, or that which washes Corann, is forlorn at low water, and "seems," says Mr. Nimmo, "the natural place for establishing anything like a village or seaport-town." Achill, with the exception of a small part which belongs to the marquis of Sligo, is all the property of Sir Neil O'Donnell. Its inhabitants, till within the last 8 or 9 years, were in a condition, as to manners, ideas, and arts, little if at all different from their ancestors of the 14th or 15th century. In dress, habitations, agricultural instruments, and many other particulars which immediately meet the eye of a stranger, they were rude, poor, and outre, to a degree which provoked sharp competition between wonder and compassion. Though greatly improved by the influence of schools, of public works, and especially of the Achill mission, they still very generally possess the old peculiarities. They reside principally in hamlets, each of which has been described as "a congeries of hovels thrown indiscriminately together as if they fell in a shower from the sky." Little of their land has yet been cultivated; and the little that has, is chiefly manured with sea-weed and shell-sand from the shores, for the rearing of a precarious potatoe crop. They possess altogether about 100 boats, and employ them principally in carrying turf to Westport. They are regarded by the fishermen of Clew-bay as quite ignorant of the craft of fish-catching; and, though haunted by shoals of the finny tribes, they continue to do no more than catch, by means of the rod and hand-line, enough for their own subsistence. A road, the first in the place which admitted the use of even the meanest wheeled vehicle, began to be constructed a few years ago across both the peninsula and the island; and near the part of the sound where it connects the two, at a point where Achill and Achillbeg are nearly united, a small pier was partially built by the Mansion-house Committee in 1822, but, at the date of the 10th Report on Irish Fisheries, remained incomplete. The cost of erection was £304 ls. Fifty sail-boats averaging 8 tons, and 100 yawls averaging 2 tons, frequent the harbour, and give occasional employment to about 500 persons. At this point salt works were, at one time, established. Mr. Nimmo reports that a good winter harbour for small craft, however desirable, cannot be constructed on the ocean side of Achill, and that the best which could be made would be at Keem, near Achill Head, and would cost at least £1,500. Achill is included in the Westport poor-law union. In 1840-41, a dispensary, then newly established for the district, expended upwards of £22 in making 4,933 dispensations of medicine,—very nearly a dose for each inhabitant! In Achill are found beautiful pink crystals called "Achill diamonds."

ACHILLBEG, an island, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile long, so stretching out from the south-east corner of Achill, as in a great measure to cover the south entrance of Achill sound. The west end of the channel between it and Achill dries at low water; and the east end forms the harbour in which the pier noticed in the preceding article is constructed. Pop. about 120.

ACHONRY, a parish in the south-east of the barony of Leney; 5 miles west-south-west of Ballymote, co. Sligo, Connaught. It contains the hamlets of Achonry, Corrowtubber, and Kilcummin, and the villages of CURRY, BELLAGHY, and TUBBERCURRY: see these articles. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 7; area, of the whole, 60,896 acres,—of the rural districts, 60,831. Pop., in 1831, 15,357; in 1841, 17,986. Houses 3,186. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 16,803. Houses 2,977. About one half of the area is arable and pasture land; and the remainder is bog, moor, and barren mountain. The surface is drained southward by the nascent river Moy. Limestone abounds. The hamlet of Achonry, though poor and small, claims high connection with antiquity. Its ancient or uncorrupted names were Achad-Conaire and Achad-Chaoin. "The dynast of the territory of Luigny," says Dr. James McParlan, "granted Achad-Conaire, called also Achad-Chaoin, to St. Finiard of Clonard, where he erected an abbey, and appointed his disciple St. Nathy, commonly called Cruimther Nathy, or Nathy the priest, to be the first abbot, whose feast is celebrated August the 9th. The abbot Robertagh MacNaserda, who was made bishop of Kiltare, died A. D. 874." Some fine monastic ruins stand 3 miles west of Achonry, at COURT: which see.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Achonry; and is united with the rectory of Cloonoghill to form the benefice of Achonry, and corps of the deanery of Achonry. See CLOONOGHILL. Tithe composition of the parish, £646 3s. 1d. Gross income of the benefice, £754 3s. 1d., besides £147 4s. 8d. enjoyed, without cure, as dean of the diocese; nett £613 10s. 1d., besides £139 17s. 5d. as dean. Patron, the Crown. The parish-church was built in 1823 at the cost of £1,476, lent by the late Board of First Fruits.ittings 250. A chapel-of-ease was built at Tubbercurry in 1830, at the cost of £900, gifted by the late Board.ittings 180.

The right of nomination to the chapel belongs to the incumbent of the benefice. Stipend of the chaplain, and of a second curate, £75. The average attendance at the two places of worship is 200; that at three Roman Catholic chapels in Achonry, is respectively 800, 750, and 600; that at three Roman Catholic chapels in Cloonoghill, is respectively 1,200, 1,200, and 700. In 1834, the Churchmen, in the parish, were 983, and in the benefice 1,054; and the Roman Catholics, in the parish, were 15,160, and in the benefice 2,256. The schools, in 1834, were 2 day-schools of the London Hibernian Society, 2 day-schools of the Baptist Society, 8 pay or hedge-schools, and 1 Sunday school, aggregately, with the exception of the last, having on their books 701 children.

THE BISHOPRIC OF ACHONRY is said to have been founded in the 6th century. It was permanently united to the see of Killalla in the commencement of the 17th century; and, along with that see, it was united to the diocese of Tuam by the Ecclesiastical Reform Act of 1833. The diocese comprehends the greater part of the county of Sligo, and a broad band of the eastern division of Mayo. Its length is 35 miles; its breadth 27; and its area 231,121 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 108,144. Its parishes are 25. Its benefices are 9, with a gross aggregate income of £4,429 14s. 2d., and a nett income of £3,879 6s. 11d. Of its 9 beneficed clergymen, 5 are reported as resident, and 4 as non-resident; 3 have no curates, 4 have one curate each, and 2 have two curates each. The aggregate stipend of the 8 curates is £600. One of the benefices is in the patronage of the Crown; and all the others is in that of the diocesan. Appropriate rectorial tithes amount to £147 4s. 8d.; and inappropriate, to £2,791 ls. 11d. The average gross amount of vestry assessments, for three years preceding 1831 or 1832, was, for church purposes, £578 6s. 2d., and, for general purposes, £205 10s. 9d. The nett episcopal revenue, in the average of three years, which ended at the close of 1831, was £1,363 18s. 11d. The diocesan is patron of the precentorship, the archdeaconry, and the prebends. The cathedral is simply the parish-church of Achonry; under the name of the Cathedral Church of St. Crumathy; and it has no economy fund. The chapter consists of a dean, a precentor, an archdeacon, and the prebendaries of Killaright, Ballysadere, and Kilmovee; and it has no corporate residence, no patronage, and, in its corporate capacity, no property. The corps of the deanery consists of the benefice of Achonry and Cloonoghill with cure, and the rectorial tithes of Killooran and Kilvarnet without cure; and the additional or separate revenue is £920. The precentor has, in right of his dignity, a separate revenue of £92 6s. 1d.; the archdeacon, of £150; the prebendary of Killaright, of £31 9s. 6d.; and the prebendary of Ballysadere, of £275. The prebend of Kilmovee is merely nominal. There are neither minor canons nor vicars choral.—The Roman Catholic diocese of Achonry is distributed into 23 parishes; three of these, Castlemore, Kilcolman, and Kilmactigue, are bishop's parishes or the seat of the diocese, and are served by the diocesan and 4 curates; and the others are served by 22 officiates, and 16 coadjutor officiates.—In 1834, there were in the diocese 11 places of worship connected with the Establishment, 2 meeting-houses of Protestant dissenters, and 33 Roman Catholic chapels; the inhabitants consisted of 5,417 Churchmen, 143 Presbyterians, 27 other Protestant dissenters, and 108,835 Roman Catholics; and 67 daily schools wholly supported by fees, 14 salaried by the National Board, 11 aided by the London Hibernian society, and 15 others supported wholly or partly by subscription or endowment,—in all, 107, had on their books 3,470 boys and 3,028 girls.

ACHRIS, a peninsula, a headland, and a hamlet, on the west coast of Cunnemarra, or the barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connought. The headland is the south screen of the entrance of Cleggan bay; and lifts a watch-tower into surveillance of the poor and straggling hamlet.

ACLARE, a hamlet in the parish of Kilmactigue, barony of Leney, co. Sligo, Connought. Area, 7 acres. Pop., in 1841, 159. Houses 26.

ACRE, a beautiful rivulet of the barony of Glenarm, on the west coast of co. Antrim, Ulster. It has a course of only about 6 miles; traverses the scenic vale of Glenariff; and falls into the North channel at Nairnabb, near the caves of Red Bay, through the little neglected village of Waterfoot. The stream forms, in one place, the cascade of Isnaleara; and over only about 100 perches above its embouchure is it affected by the tide. See RED BAY.

ACTON, a quoad sacra parish and a village, within the quoad civilia parish of Ballymore, in the barony of Lower Orier, co. Armagh, Ulster. See BALLYMORE. The parish lies on the eastern verge of the county; and is touched or traversed from north to south by the Newry canal. Its land is, in general, of good quality, and in fine cultivation. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, about 4,500 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,843.—This parish is a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Armagh. Gross income £100; nett £98 0s. 11d. Patron, the incumbent of Ballymore. The church was built, in 1788, at the cost of upwards of £300, gifted by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250. Average attendance, 200 and upwards. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses in the parish were formerly Secessional, but are now in the Newry presbytery of the General Assembly; and have an average attendance of, respectively, 400 to 500, and 300 to 350. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 600. The parishioners were computed, in 1834, to consist of 617 Churchmen, 1,948 Presbyterians, and 1,423 Roman Catholics. Five day-schools, in 1834, had aggregately on their books 247 boys and 195 girls; and one was aided with £10 from the National Board, one with £7 from the London Hibernian Society; and two with, respectively, £7 and £5 from Colonel Close.—The village of Acton stands on the west bank of the Newry canal, and on the road from Newry to Portadown; 2½ miles south-south-east of Tanderagee, and 58 north of Dublin. The place is built on a regular plan, with one street intersecting another at right angles; and has a neat and pleasant appearance. The houses are constructed with hewn stone, well-slatted, and proportionally arranged. The situation is both very favourable for trade, and naturally beautiful. The mansion, demesne, and manor of Acton, are in the vicinity. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 257; in 1841, 210. Houses 47.

ADAMSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Bantry, 7½ miles north-east of New Ross, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area 8,134 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,388; in 1841, 2,037. Houses 355. This parish, and that of NEUBAWN, [which see,] have long formed the union or benefice of Adamstown. The land, throughout the union, is in general light and sharp, producing barley, oats, and potatoes, but not favourable for wheat-crope, meadows, dairies, or grazing. Adamstown consists of 12 townlands,—Newbawn of 13; and the two are separated throughout by a rivulet. The surface is rolling and tumulated; and shoots up, in one place, in the acclivities, rocky, and soaring mountain of Carrick-Burn, whose summit commands, on a clear day, a distinct view of the coast of Wales. A good granite and a bad building-stone are quarried. The antiquities are one of 'Strongbow's castles,' and numerous small raths, and the ruins of several small ancient churches. Near the foot of Carrick-Burn rock or mountain, stood Scallabogue barn, in which 195 Protestants were burned to death in the rebellion of 1798.—Both parishes are rectories in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition of Adamstown, £410 13s. 1d.; of Newbawn, £360 4s. 8d. Gross income of the benefice, £796 11s. 3d.; nett, £625 6s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The benefice forms the corps of the archdeaconry of Ferns. A curate has a salary of £75 and the use of the glebe-house. The church was built, in 1806, at a cost of £692 6s., gifted chiefly by the late Board of First Fruits, and partly by the earl of Rathdown. Sittings 120; attendance 40. Two Roman Catholic chapels in Adamstown are attended by respectively 1,200 and 1,400; and one in Newbawn, by 550. In 1834, there were in Adamstown parish 61 Churchmen, and 1,833 Roman Catholics; and, in the union, 105 Churchmen, and 3,427 Roman Catholics. In Adamstown parish, in 1834, were a Protestant Sunday school, two hedge-schools, and a day-school,—the last salaried with £6 from local subscription and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice. A National school was commenced in the last quarter of 1840.

ADARE, or ADAIR, a parish in the three baronies of Coshma, Kenry, and Upper Conello, co. Limerick, Munster. The Coshma section contains the town of ADARE; see next article. Area of the Upper Conello section, 1,004 acres; of the Kenry section, 4,358 acres; of the Coshma section, 6,631 acres. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 4,913; in 1841, 4,902. Houses 723. Pop. of the Coshma section, in 1831, 2,270; in 1841, 3,148. Houses 439. Pop. of the Kenry section, in 1831, 1,474; in 1841, 1,362. Houses 228. Pop. of the Upper Conello section, in 1831, 403; in 1841, 392. Houses 56. The modern name is a corruption of Athdare or Ath-daar, 'the ford of oaks.' The river Maig traverses the parish northward; and luxuriates between banks which are rich in the soft and sylvan features of beauty. Most of the land is good and highly improved; and much of it is sheeted with wood, or disposed in opulent and tastefully ornamented demesne. A British traveller entering it from the north, forgets the bog and moor and miserable cultivation which had figured largely in some previous views; and sees in joyous combination around him the luxuriousness of a warm district of merry England, with the picturesqueness of a brilliant nook of lowland Scotland. Fine crops of wheat, neat enclosures, tidy cottages, noble mansions, numerous little gardens, clumps of orchard, and a profusion of wood, decorate an undulating and gently featured surface. Currish, the seat of De Vere, Bart., is an elegant edifice encompassed by a demesne, both extensive and replete with varieties of beautiful scenery. Adare Castle, the seat of the Quin family, earls of Dunraven, situated on the west bank of the Maig in the vicinity of the village of Adare, is a splendid edifice, commenced only a few years ago on the site of a former mansion, affording a fair imitation specimen of the later pointed style of architecture, and rivaling the first residences in the kingdom for at once taste, beauty, and chasteness of design. The extensive plantations, gardens, and pleasure-grounds around it exhibit richness, variety, and extreme neatness.—The parish of Adare is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £301 16s. 11d.; nett, £284 0s. 7d. Patron, Edward Croker, Esq. The rectorial tithes are inappropriate, and compounded for £506 17s. 6d. A curate is salaried at £75. The parish-church was built, in 1811, at a cost of £923 1s. 6½d. British, granted by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, about 180. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by about 2,000; and a Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house by about 130. The Churchmen, in 1834, amounted to 663; and the Roman Catholics to 4,456. A parochial school, salaried with £34 and house and garden from Lord Dunraven, had, in 1834, 128 scholars; and a pay-school had 36.

ADARE, a market and post-town in the Coshma section of the cognominal parish, stands on the Maig, at the point where it is crossed by the post-road from Limerick to Kerry, 9 miles south-south-west of Limerick, and 110 south-west of Dublin. The place, though of small modern importance, is notable for ancient consideration, great beauty, fine architectural ruins, and singularly charming environs. "Nothing," says Holmes, in his Sketches of Ireland, "can be more serenely beautiful than this little spot. Silent and retired, its inhabitants few, and apparently mixing little with the world, its venerable castle, with its surrounding groves, infuse in the beholder a calm sensation of pleasure truly delightful. The first view as we entered was most striking. On the left, a large ruined castle of the Desmonds rose from the brink of the river, which flowed into the old fosse. In front, the river Maig glided smoothly under an antique bridge of nine arches; its battlements overhung with ivy nearly to the water edge, the opposite banks swelling into beautiful undulating lawns, backed by the shady groves, and delightful grounds of the Quin demesnes, through which the turrets and ivied windows of a ruined abbey half disclosed themselves. On the right of the village, another monastic ruin lifted its venerable head amidst clustering ivy and alder."—"The ruin of the castle evinces the pile to have been of great strength, and occupies such a site of guard and command over the passage of the river as must have been selected only by a keen-eyed warrior. In the time of Elizabeth, the English sustained a sharp and prolonged contest from the Irish and Spanish followers of Desmond for the possession of this strength; and, being driven to extremity by a blockade, they were compelled to hazard a desperate excursion into the Knight of Glin's country, where they fought a warm skirmish of eight hours, but came off without much loss. Shortly after the death of Desmond, the castle was seized by Lord Kerry, and its garrison put to the sword; but it was recaptured by Captain Zouch; and, in the rebellion of 1641, it was finally and completely dismantled. The most prominent parts of it still standing are three unroofed and partially dilapidated round towers. The bridge which groups with it in the view from the north, though narrow, antique, and small-arched, is, as to picturesqueness, in good keeping with the objects around.

While some ancient and interesting ecclesiastical edifices at Adare are either extinct, or traceable only in slender vestiges, three monastic ruins of considerable attraction and extent still remain, and not long ago underwent efforts for their conservation,—two of them in consequence of being fitted up as places of worship, and one in consequence of its being an ornamental feature in the earl of Dunraven's demesne. Serious difficulty exists in identifying, from Archdall's confused account of their origin and relative position, the precise monastic community to which each belonged; and this has occasioned discrepancies and conflicting statements among topographers and tourists as to their respective designations, which we have no space to attempt to settle. Crossing the bridge from the north, and turning to the right, we enter by a low Gothic door, into a well-enclosed field or park, bounded on the village side with walls, and on the other sides by deep groves. Here stands the White or Augustinian abbey, completely sheeted on two sides with ivy. The steeple is lofty, and very slender, and tapers to the battlements. The cloisters, all of marble, and supported by low, slender, and handsomely ornamented columns, are in a well-preserved condition. This abbey was founded in 1315, by John, earl of Kildare, son of Thomas, surnamed Nappagh, or the Ape.—"At the extremity of the village stand the ruins of the abbey of Trinitarians, founded for the redemption of Christian captives. Of this structure very little remains except the steeple. Its founder was Thomas Fitzgerald, seventh Baron of Offaly, and father of the first Earls of Desmond and Kildare. Very large possessions were attached to it, which, with all their premises and appurtenances, were given by Elizabeth to Sir H. Wallop. A rather curious circumstance in monastic history is, that the rectory of Adare belonged at one time to the nunnery of this abbey.—The Franciscan abbey, founded in 1464, by Thomas, earl of Kildare, and his Countess, Joan, for minors of the observance, stands within the Quin demesne, and, being surrounded by venerable trees, is an impressive and romantic object. Its ivied steeple and lofty pinnacles, its simple windows and projecting buttresses, its deep shadings with ash and ancient yew trees, fitfully gilded with straggling sunbeams, combine with the beauty and seclusion of its situation to excite poetic feelings in the mind. Wild ash trees spring from the very tops of the ruinous walls of the cloisters, rise in large stems, and send out waving boughs, flinging them downward in umbrageous profusion, and, in one place, fantastically mixing them with the arms of an old yew-tree. The interior of the abbey, about 30 or 35 years ago, was almost putrescent with the remains of the dead; and was ordered by the noble proprietor to be levelled and cleared of its tombs and its heaps of skulls and bones, in order to prevent its being any longer used as a place of sepulture. The peasantry around could not be induced to aid so unwonted a purpose; and a party of military required to be brought from Limerick. The soldiers, says a tourist of 1824, "soon completed the work; and the trim grassy aisle replaced the legends commemorative of the old fathers and feudal chiefs. Some monumental and confessional niches have escaped and may still be seen. In the cloisters I found two little carved fragments; one of these was an escutcheon charged with a cross saltire; the other a figure in rude bas-relief, about 18 inches high, representing a Grey Friar."

The river Maig, from its confluence with the Shannon up to Adare, is navigable for small vessels at high water. Many years ago the navigation was improved near the town, by the excavation of a new channel and the formation of a small basin or harbour. At present these works are much out of order; and in the recent surveys for the improvement of the Shannon navigation, improvements were suggested and planned, to cost £2,770. "The canal, in its present state," says the Report, "is too insignificant to be of any essential benefit; it requires its section to be considerably enlarged; and a basin should be formed at the head of it to enable several boats at the same time to take or discharge their cargoes, and to give it a greater depth of water. The banks of the river, as far down as Mack's quay, require to be improved in order to increase the waterway, and to make the navigation easier." Yet Adare is so very much nearer Limerick by an excellent road than by what every effort could render only an indifferent navigation, that the improvements suggested can be considered only as matter of minor importance. See MALO, (THE). The town stands within 5 miles of a point of junction by lateral road, with the Shannon line of railway, as laid down by the railway commissioners; and from that point to Dublin, the time of travelling will be 6 hours,—and to London, 22 hours. Its present public conveyances are all in transit between Limerick and places to the south-west,—a mail-coach and a car to Tralee, a car to Killarney, and two cars to Rathkeale. Its returns of postage, in 1830 and 1836, were, respectively, £101 and £134, exclusive of its sub-office of A-keaton. Adare is in the Rathkeale Poor-Law Union, and has a fever hospital and a dispensary. In 1839-40, the fever hospital's income was £92 6s. from subscriptions, and £184 12s. from parliamentary and county grants; its expenditure was £140; its internal patients were 170; and the population of its district was 8,340;—the dispensary's income and expenditure were respectively £35 6s. and £88; and the number of applications to it, was 2,038. The hospital was built by the earl of Dunraven; contains 18 beds in the fever wards, besides a residence for the medical attendant; and is given rent free to the public. Its objects are frequently refused admission from the paucity of funds. Fairs are held in the town on Jan. 20, Feb. 20, March 27, April 27, May 27, Sept. 15, Oct. 14, and Dec. 15.—Adare has long ceased to possess either a municipal character, or any of that importance which looks out from an ancient date through the windows and vistas of its architectural ruins. A charter 4^o Edward II., dated the 10th of July, 1310, grants murage to "the bailiffs and good men" of Adare; and another, 51^o Edward III., dated 20th Feb., 1376, grants to "the provost and commonalty" of Adare, exemptions from subsidies, &c., till their town should be rebuilt; but these are the only municipal documents which can now be traced, and they have, for a very long period, been in abeyance. Additional to the objects of interest noticed in connection with the parish and the town, are mount Shannon, the seat of the earl of Clare, in the vicinity, the ruin of Grannebruc-castle, 2 miles south-west of the town, and Annigan-castle farther on. Area of the town, 30 acres. Pop., in 1831, 766; in 1841, 1,095. Houses 140.

* So strange a surname is assigned by story to a strange origin. While Thomas was an infant, and was in his cradle, the McCarries slew his father and grandfather; and his nurses forgot him, and fled in terror from the castle. A watchful baboon or ape, which was kept in the family, took advantage of the nurses' absence, seized the infant, and carried him to the battlements; and, having there for some time paraded him in view of the astonished spectators, deliberately descended and laid him again in his cradle. However questionable or apocryphal this tale may be, it is regarded by works on heraldry as the reason of the present Leicester family bearing baboons for their armorial crest and supporters.

ADAR (THE), a rivulet of the basin of the Moy, and in the barony of Gallen, co. Mayo, Connaught.

ADDERGOOLE, a parish in the south-east of the barony of Tyrawley, 8 miles north-west by west of Foxford, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 36,630 acres, of which 3,763 acres are water, principally in Lough Conn. Pop., in 1831, 6,714; in 1841, 7,379. Houses 1,285. A district of waste mountain, not included in the above statement of length and breadth, has an extent of 4 miles; so that the parish, taken in the direction of a long glen which runs into the mountains, measures 9½ miles by 5. The land of even the chief district is prevalently poor, and in miserable cultivation; yet on its eastern margin, where it is laved by Lough Conn, it possesses considerable beauty.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Killalla, and forms part of the benefice of CROSSMOLINA: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £125; and the rectorial tithes are partly impropriate and partly appropriate. See CROSSMOLINA. Two Roman Catholic chapels in the parish are averagely attended by respectively 900 and 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 93 Churchmen, and 7,126 Roman Catholics; and the schools were a day-school, aided by about £12 from the London Hibernian society, and 7 hedge or pay schools.

ADDERGOOLE, co. Galway. See ADRAGOOLE. ADERRIG, a parish in the barony of Newcastle, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area 759 acres. Pop., in 1841, 127. Houses 21. It figures very obscurely in topography, and does not seem to be recognised in the ecclesiastical divisions.

ADNITH, or ATWITT, a small parish, drained by the Suir, in the barony of Eliogurty, 4½ miles south by east of Templemore, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 855 acres. Pop., in 1831, 253; in 1841, 293. Houses 42. The land is in general good, and lets at a high rent.—Adnith is a vicarage in the dio. of Cashel, and forms part of the benefice of THURLES: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £33; and the rectorial tithes, which are impropriate, and belong to J. Bagwell, Esq., are compounded for £39. In 1834 the parishioners amounted to 266, and were all Roman Catholics. There is no school.

ADRAGOOLE, ADRIGOOLE, or ADDERGOOLI, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Dunmore, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies 3 miles west of the town of Dunmore, and belongs to the exterior or northern edge of the basin, whose waters concentrate in Lough Corrib. Area, 8,442 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,532; in 1841, 3,321. Houses 577. The surface, in a general view, is carpeted with boggy and moorish soil, and is partly upland. In March, 1745, a bog on the eastern border, and about 1½ mile from Dunmore, burst its bounds, and travelled from its site in a march of devastation. About 11 o'clock on a sultry day, while the proprietor was superintending his men cutting turf in the bog, he observed a sudden gathering of the clouds, and had hardly time to bid the men flee from the approaching storm, when the most violent rain ever remembered, fell, accompanied with a dreadful noise, not so loud, but as appalling as thunder. Though all ran for the village, they were drenched before they had gone half-way. After little more than half-an-hour, when the rain ceased, the bog, consisting of about 10 acres, was observed by the turf-cutters to be moving toward their retreat; and it rolled on till it reached a low pasture-ground, called Higgin's park, by the side of a stream; and there it rested, spread, and completely choked the channel, and dammed up the current of the rivulet. The bed of the stream below, for upwards of a mile, became so dry, that children picked up the fish from even the deepest holes. There evening, a lough of nearly 53 acres was formed over the fields behind; and eventually it increased to about 300 acres. The proprietor in a few days collected labourers, and began to make a large drain to carry the lacustrine water by the shortest line to the bed of the stream below; but observing that the lake was forcing its superfluous body into another line, he, without much trouble, formed the present course of the rivulet to its junction with the ancient channel.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Tuam, and forms part of the benefice of TEAM: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £34 7s. 1d., and the rectorial tithes for £103 1s. 11d.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and provost of Tuam. The Roman Catholic chapel in the parish has an average attendance of from 2,500 to 3,000. In 1834 the parishioners were 10 Churchmen, and 3,036 Roman Catholics; and the schools were 3 pay-schools at Cloonagh, Shanballymore, and Miltown.

ADRAGOOLE, the site of a quondam village on the coast of Bantry bay, co. Cork, Munster. "This place," says Dr. Smith, "was probably named from a clan of the Gauls or Celtiberi who landed here. Ardgoal or Ardgyle in Scotland is the same name."

AELWYN, a lake about half-a-mile north of the village of Ballinlough, and on the western border of the barony of Ballintobber, and of the co. Roscommon, Connaught. It is oblong in form, and about $\frac{3}{4}$ miles in circumference. Though its immediate shores are nowhere much elevated, its scenery derives interest from the distant perspective of the mountains of Mayo and Sligo. Willsborough, a small old country-seat, 200 or 300 yards to the south, has an agreeable appearance as seen from the margin of the lake. In the immediate vicinity are extensive bogs. See BALLINLOUGH.

AFFADOWN, a demesne in co. Cork, 3 miles west of Skibbereen. A round tower which surmounts a rising ground within its limits, commands a good view of the adjacent coast and islands, with the ruins of several old castles. The proprietor is H. Beecher, Esq.

AFFANE, a parish in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, containing a small village of the same name, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5; area, 7,773 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,879; in 1841, 2,115. Houses 301. The Blackwater runs southward along the western boundary, and the Phinisk runs westward to it near the village of Affane. The land in general is excellent, and in high cultivation. The parish has long been noted for its fine cherries, introduced to it from the Canary islands, by Sir Walter Raleigh. The chief seat is DROMANA: which see.—The village of Affane stands 4 miles south-east by east of Lismore. It has fairs in May, August, and November. Its ancient or uncorrupted name was Aghmean; from agh, 'a ford'; the Blackwater being fordable in the vicinity. In 1564, a conflict occurred here between the clans of Butler and Fitzgerald; when the leader of the latter, Gerald, earl of Desmond, was wounded, and 300 of his followers slain. The discomfited earl, who was taken prisoner in his gore, and carried on the shoulders of some of his antagonists from the field, was exultingly asked by a leader of the Ormond party, "Where is now the great earl of Desmond?" when he indignantly replied, "Where, but in his proper place? on the necks of the Butlers!" The occasion of the feud is said to have been a litigation respecting some lands, covetousness leading to bloodshed, and bloodshed to glorification in culpable principles. "The lands of Affane," remarks T. C. Croker, Esq., "are said to have been given by Garret Fitzgerald, for a breakfast to Sir Walter Raleigh."—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £184 12s. 3d.; and the rectorial tithes, which consist of one moiety of the whole tithes, and are inappropriate, and belong to the duke of Devonshire, are compounded for the same sum. The vicarage, and that of AOLISM [which see], constitute the benefice of Affane. Gross income £378 2s.; nett £289 7s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. Within the benefice is the chapel of VILLIERSTOWN: see that article. The church of the united parish was built in 1819, at a cost of £646 3s. 1d. Brit.; of which £461 10s. 9½d. was granted by the late Board of

First Fruits. Sittings 200; average attendance from 25 to 30. Four Roman Catholic chapels, one of which is in Affane, and the others in Aghlish, are attended by, respectively, from 300 to 400, 700, 275, 12. The last is the chapel of a friary. In 1834, the inhabitants of Affane parish consisted of 49 Churchmen, and 1,952 Roman Catholics; and those of the benefice, of 156 Churchmen, and 5,631 Roman Catholics. In the same year a National school in Affane had 330 children on its books, and received £20 from the Board.

AGHA. See AUGHA.

AGHABE, a village on the southern border, and in the south-west corner of the barony of Upper Masserine, and of the co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands 2 miles north of Moira. Pop. not specially returned.

AGHABOE, or AUGHABOE,* a parish in the baronies of Clandonagh and Clarmallagh, Queen's co., Leinster. The Clandonagh section contains the town of BORRIS-IN-OSSORY, and the Clarmallagh section the village of BALLYCOLLA: see these articles. Length and breadth, each 8 miles. Area of the whole, 18,702 acres; of the rural districts of Clandonagh section, 6,460 acres; of the rural districts of the Clarmallagh section, 12,182 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 6,198; in 1841, 6,310. Houses, 1,031. Pop. of the rural districts of the Clandonagh section, in 1841, 2,132. Houses, 351. Pop. of the rural districts of the Clarmallagh section, in 1841, 3,189. Houses, 519. The surface gently undulates, and is part of a very rich valley which is screened or flanked at some distance by two ranges of hills. The soil is in general excellent, yet consists partly of reclaimed moor and bog. The streamlet Gully separates the parish and its diocese, on the east, from the diocese of Ferns; the river Nore separates them on the north-west from the diocese of Killaloe; and the river Arcany or Erkenny separates the southern border from the parishes of Aghmacart and Durrow. Granite rocks occur at Carrig and Carrigen; brown slate occurs at Knockarudh, or the red hill, and has been quarried; and limestone underlies by far the greater part of the parish, and has been extensively worked for manure. The only villages are poor and tiny hamlets. Aghaboe, 5 miles south-east of Borris-in-Ossory, though now a small and humble cluster of cabins, comes into notice in the 6th century, as the seat of a Culdee establishment under St. Canice, and is mentioned in Adamnan's Life of Columba, under the name of Acheb-bou. It rose, under St. Canice, into a town; was favoured, and probably adopted as the seat of a royal residence by the princes of Ossory; and from the death of St. Canice in 598, till the erection of the see of Kilkenny in the reign of Henry II., or during upwards of 600 years, was the ecclesiastical metropolis of the Ossory territory. Even subsequent to this period, an episcopal palace at Aghaboe was repaired and beautified; and in 1234, 'a great church' was built, the chance of which was thought by Dr. Ledwich, the well-known Irish antiquary, and long the incumbent of this benefice, to constitute the parochial place of worship in which he officiated, and which continued to be in use some time after the commencement of the present century. "The belfry," says he, "is a small hexagonal structure, closed with a cap of masonry, and is on a line with the roof of the church. Round the fabric are buttresses, except to the south: on that side is a door, the arches are concentric, enriched with carving and foliage. There are three

* In ancient documents occur the names Aghveoe, Aghbovo, Aghboo, and Achebbou; and these, as well as the two still in use, are all corruptions of Achab-dho; 'the field of an ox.'

windows: the eastern one is divided by stone-mullions, and branched out into trefoils. Within, the northern wall is adorned with niches, canopies, and concentric mouldings; and near the communion-table is a curious confession-box in the thickness of the wall." In 1250, according to Archdall, or in 1382, according to other writers, an abbey for Dominican friars was founded by Florence Fitzpatrick, prince of Ossory, on or near the site of the Culdean establishment. The church of the monastery stands but a few yards from the remains of the great church. It is 100 feet long, and 24 feet wide, and has three pointed windows on the south, one on the east, and one on the west. The eastern window is ramified, and the western door has concentric arches. There are two tabernacles, and an inverted cone for holy water, and a small tabernacle for the utensils of the altar. On the south side of the building, and connected with it by an arch, is a projecting structure, called Phelan's chapel; and on the north side was a quadrangle 60 feet each way, with ten monks' cells, some servants' apartments, and various attached offices. The cellars were spacious, and over them were the refectory and a large dormitory,—the former, 46 feet by 17. Dr. Ledwich's predecessor used most of the monastic part of the pile as a quarry for enclosing a demesne. During the incessant feuds among the neighbouring townships, the abbey was frequently plundered and burnt; and, in 1346, the shrine, the alleged relics of St. Canice, and the town of Aghaboe were reduced to ashes by Dermot Mac Giolla Phadraig. Two cells of the abbey stood upwards of a mile from it; the one at Ballygowden, and the other, for females, on the glebe of Farran-Eglis. From the colour of the clothes worn by the inmates of the latter, the church adjacent to the cell was called Teampul-na-Cailleachdubh, or 'the church of the black old women.' Ancient places of worship stood, and cemeteries around their site still exist, at Knockseera, Lismore, and Kilmunfoyle. To the north of the abbey church is an artificial mound, similar to the Welch Gorsedde, and the mounds of Scotland, on which feudal justiciary courts were held. It is about 45 feet in diameter at the top, has a stone wall round the edge of the summit, and was ascended by a spiral pathway. Distant from the hamlet, but still within the parish, is a large earthwork, called by some the Rath of Lava, and by others the Mote of Monacoghlan. It crowns a hill of considerable altitude, protected by ramparts and fosse, and was evidently the rudely-fortified residence or retreat of an ancient tribe.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithes composition, £263 1s. 6d.; glebe, £277 4s. 4d. Gross income, £540 5s. 10d.; nett, £461 18s. 5d. Patron, the Rev. George Carr. Two curates are employed at stipends of respectively £83 1s. 6d., and £69 4s. 7d. The rectorial tithes, consisting of two-thirds of the tithes of the parish, and compounded for £526 3s. 1d., are appropriate, and belong to the dean of the cathedral church of St. Canice, Kilkenny. The present parochial church was built in 1818, at a cost of £461 10s. 9d. Brit., lent by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; average attendance 100. The court-house of Borris-in-Ossory is used as a chapel-of-ease, and attended by 60. Three Roman Catholic chapels respectively at Knockra, Ballincolla, and Borris-in-Ossory, are attended, the first by 850, the second by 930, and the third by 1,230. The parishioners consisted, in 1834, of 556 Churchmen, 10 Protestant dissenters, and 5,787 Roman Catholics. The schools, in 1834, amounted to 11, and had on their books 348 boys and 233 girls; one was a school of the Society for Discountenancing

Vice, salaried with £8, and a piece of land worth £2; another was a National school, salaried with £13 from the Board, and £28 10s., besides house and land, from James Grattan, Esq.; one was a Sunday-school, connected with the Sunday-school Society in Dublin; and all the others were pay-schools. In 1840, the National Board salaried two schools,—one at Cuffsborough with £8, and one at Borris-in-Ossory with £5 5s.

AGHABOG, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Dartry, 5 miles east-south-east of Clones, co. Monaghan, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 11,549 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,442; in 1841, 7,530. Houses 1,319. Leysborough is the only demesne. Large patches of bog occur on the north; and extensive tracts of bog expand on the east and west. The aggregate soil is tolerably good for oats. A lake near Leysborough is the largest in the barony; and there are four other lakes. The road from Monaghan to Cootehill passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Clogher. Gross income, £402 12s. 6d.; nett, £357 17s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has £69 4s. 7d., with fuel and the use of the rectory-house. The church was built in 1775, at a cost of £360, gifted by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 450; average attendance 250. A Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly Secessional, but now belonging to the General Assembly, is attended by 325; and a Roman Catholic chapel by 850. In 1834, there were 1,567 Churchmen, 1,753 Presbyterians, 1 other Protestant dissenter, and 4,121 Roman Catholics. In the same year, there were four schools of the London Hibernian Society, two National schools, and two hedge-schools, with aggregately 458 boys and 292 girls on their books.

AGHABOLOGUE, or AGHABULLOGUE, a parish in the barony of East Muskerry, 4½ miles north-east of Macroom, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 18,733 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,054; in 1841, 6,001. Houses 994. One-third of the parish consists of unreclaimed mountain and bog, worth from 6d. to 3s. 6d. per acre; and the remainder consists of cultivated land, worth from 8s. to 9s. per acre. Mount Rivers, a mansion of the parish, commands a fine view to the south. Near this mansion, a human skull, almost double of the common size, was dug up about the middle of last century. Near the old parochial church is a celebrated well dedicated to St. Olan. The common people of the circumjacent country swear on solemn occasions by a stone called St. Olan's tomb, and situated in the churchyard; and they pretend that, if it were carried off, it would of itself return to its old place; yet, with the usual inconsistency of the blindly credulous, they have taken alarm at its swerving from the perpendicular, and propped it with small stones to prevent its falling prostrate. "The man who brought me to it, and related its wonders," says a writer in the Dublin Penny Journal, "dug round its base, and raised it nearly upright. His so doing discovered an inscription, written in the Ogham or old Irish character. This inscription, and that on the upper part of the stone, I was unable to decipher. The stone stands about 8 feet high, exclusive of the round stone resting on the top, which the guide called Olan's Cap. The inscriptions are written on two sides, the angle serving as the branch line on which the Ogham character was usually written."—A dispensary in the parish is within the Macroom Poor-law union—Aghabologue is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cloyne. Gross income, £784 9s. 2d.; nett, £673 2s. 4d. Patron, the dieresail. The half-tithes of 1,000 acres are appropriated to the economy of Cloyne, and compounded for £37. A curate has a stipend of £90. The church was built about 150 years ago, at an unknown cost; and thoroughly repaired in 1828, for £50, raised by parochial assessment. Sittings 120; average attendance, from 25 to 30. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Aghabologue and Rusheen, are attended by respectively 1,900, and 1,000. In 1834, there were 113 Churchmen, 5,062 Roman Catholics,—a week-day school superintended by the Protestant clergymen, 3 hedge-schools, and 112 scholars.

AGHACREW or AUGHACREW, a parish in the barony of Lower Kilmeneagh, 7 miles west by south of Holycross, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 1,231 acres. Pop., in 1831, 390; in 1841, 409. Houses 56. The quality of the land is various.—This parish is annexed to the rectory, recently the perpetual curacy of Toem, or it forms, with Castletown, a parochial union for which neither church nor clergyman is provided. See TOEM and CASTLETOWN. The Protestant parishioners attend Toem church, which is only three miles distant from the remotest part of Aghacrew. The tithes are compounded for £40 10s. 4d., and wholly appropriated to the see of Cashel. In 1834, there were in the parish 9 Churchmen, and 401 Roman Catholics. There is no school.

AGHACROSS, or AHACROSS, a parish, 4 miles west by north of Mitchellstown, and on the northern border of the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, 1; area, 355 acres. Pop., in 1841, 104. Houses 15. The surface is part of the skirts of the Galtee mountains, which form a water-shed between the counties of Cork and Limerick. Fairs are held on 20th Jan. and 3d Oct.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne, and forms part of the benefice of Clenore. Tithe composition, £30 5s. 7d. See CLENORE and TEMPLE-MOLLOGA.

AGHADA, a parish on the western border of the barony of Imokilly, 4 miles south-west of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the villages of Lower Aghada, Upper Aghada, Farsid, and Whitegate. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the rural districts, 2,349 acres; of the whole parish, 2,459 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,512; in 1841, 2,835. Houses 496. Pop. of the rural districts in 1841, 1,147. Houses 193. Area of Lower Aghada village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 106. Houses 21. Area of Upper Aghada, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 241. Houses 34.—The parish extends along the eastern shore of Cork harbour, between Rostellan and Corkbeg; and contributes fine features to that beautiful marine inlet's intricate intermixtures of land and water. The soil is, for the most part, excellent.—Aghada is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £292 15s. 6d.; glebe, £17 10s. Gross income, £310 5s. 6d.; nett, £258 6s. 4d. Patron, the Crown. Previous to the passing of the Church Temporalities act, this benefice was, from time immemorial, united to those of CORKBEG, INCH, ROSTELLAN, KILTERRIN, and part of GARRANE-KENEFECK, [see these articles,] and held in commendam with the see of Cloyne.—These parishes are all contiguous, and constituted an union about 7 miles long, and the same distance broad. The church of the present benefice was built in 1817, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; average attendance, 140. Two Roman Catholic chapels are attended by respectively 600 and 150. The parishioners consisted in 1834, of 111 Churchmen, and 2,514 Roman Catholics. There were, in 1834, a National school, aided by £10 from the Board, and a bequest of £20 Irish from the Rev. John Roche; a day-school, aided by the interest of £500, the bequest of Colonel Fitzgerald; and two pay-schools. Aggregate average attendance of scholars, 185. A dispensary in the parish, in 1839-40, received £134 6s. 2d., expended £141 2s. 5½d., and relieved 1,722 patients. Its district has a population of 14,421. The Aghada Loan Fund, during 1842, had a capital of £296, circulated £829 in 338 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £16 8s. 4d.

AGHADE, a parish in the barony of Forth, 2½ miles south of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 1,098 acres. Pop., in 1831, 368; in 1841, 521. Houses 89. The land, aggregately viewed, is of but middling quality.—This parish is an impropriate curacy in the dio. of Leighlin; but, jointly with the vicarage of Ballon, forms the benefice of Aghade. See BALLON. The tithes of the parish are compounded for £135; and belong, two-thirds to the incumbent, and one-third to Lord Downes. Gross income of the benefice, £170; nett, £106. Patron, the diocesan. The church of the union, situated in Aghade, is so old, that the date and cost of its erection are unascertainable. Sittings 250; attendance 170,—two-thirds of whom come from neighbouring parishes. The Roman Catholic chapel is averagely attended by about 600 of the inhabitants of the union. In 1834, the Roman Catholics of Aghade amounted to 332, and of Ballon, to 1,406; and the Churchmen of both parishes, to 109. In Aghade are a pay-school, and a school salaried with £4 from the incumbent, and £8 from the society for Discountenancing Vice.

AGHADERO or AGHADERRICK, a parish partly in the barony of Lower Iveagh, but chiefly in that of Upper Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. The Upper Iveagh section contains the town of LOUGHBRICKLAND, the village of SCARVA, and part of the village of POYNTE-PASS: see these articles. Length and breadth of the parish, each 4 miles. Area of the whole, 13,920; of the Lower Iveagh section, 1,078 acres; of the Upper Iveagh section, 12,842 acres; of the rural districts of the Upper Iveagh section, 12,780. Pop. of the whole in 1831, 8,981; in 1841, 9,240. Houses 1,608. Pop. of the Lower Iveagh section in 1831, 889; in 1841, 1,022. Houses 177. Pop. of the rural districts of the Upper Iveagh section in 1831, 7,254; in 1841, 7,166. Houses 1,307.—The parish is intersected northward by the post-road from Dublin to Belfast, and is bounded on the west, and separated from the county of Armagh, by the Newry canal. The entire surface is carpeted with good soil, and shows pleasing effects of cultivation. Sir Marmaduke Whitchurch, who removed into Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth to clothe the army, received the estate of Loughbrickland and other lands in guerdon of his service; and built on the margin of a lake at the place, a strength or castle whose ruins not very long ago survived.—The site of the parish-church and capital was at Aghaderg, half-a-mile north-west of Loughbrickland, till Sir Marmaduke built the latter town, and invested it with the metropolitian honours of the district. On the western border, through grounds which were then boggy, morassy, and wooded, were formerly three difficult passes, affording a bad and dangerous communication between Down and Armagh, each commanded by a fortalice, and called respectively the path of Ulster or Scarva pass, Poyntz or Fenwick's pass, and Lamb's or Tuscan pass, or Pass Turri-hane. The Erse of 'the Path of Ulster' is 'Bealach-Ullagh'; and this name is used in a manuscript Journal of a march of the Lord-deputy Fitzwaters against the Islanders of the north in 1556, preserved in the library of Trinity College. Nearly midway between the first and the second passes is a small lake, called Lough-shark, from its abounding in pike, often provincially termed shark. In 1690, King William encamped within a mile of Loughbrickland; rendezvoused there, for the first time, his forces in this part of the north of Ireland; and drew them out in two lines, of respectively horse and foot, as far as Scarva and Poyntz passes. The ground on which the army lay, was, at a prior period, stained with the blood of not a few Protestants who were vainly fleeing before overpowering numbers.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Dromore. Vicarial tithe composition, £248 18s. 1d.; glebe, £48. Gross income, £296 18s. 1d.; nett, £234 0s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £497 16s. 2d., and belong to the dean of the cathedral church of Dromore. The church was built in 1608, at an unknown cost, and received the addition of a tower and spire in 1824, at a cost of £461 10s. 9½d., granted by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance from 200 to 250. One Presbyterian meeting-house in Loughbrickland is attended by from 350 to 400; another in Scarva, by from 200 to 300; and a third in Glaskerbeg, by from 300 to 400. A Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by 300. One Roman Catholic chapel in Loughbrickland is attended by 1,000; and another in Lisnagad by 750. The parishioners consisted, in 1834, of 1,352 Churchmen, 3,864 Presbyterians, 58 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,903 Roman Catholics. The schools, in 1834, were 13 in number; they had aggregately on their books 509 boys and 360 girls; and, excepting one which was aided with £12 by subscription, they were all pay schools. In 1840, the National Board had two schools in Loughbrickland and Meenan, on salaries of respectively £12 and £2; and made grants of £126 and £98 toward building and fitting up a boys' school and a girls' school in Ballyvarey.

AGHADOE, a parish, partly in the barony of Dunkerron, but chiefly in that of Magouihy, co. Kerry, Munster. The Magouihy section contains part of the town of KILLARNEY: which see. Area of the parish, 19,888; of the Dunkerron section, 14,095 acres; of the rural districts of the Magouihy section, 15,772; of water, chiefly in the lower lake of Killarney, in the Dunkerron section, 1,200 acres,—in the Mahonihy section, 1,761 acres. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 4,819; in 1841, 4,897. Houses 681. Pop. of the Dunkerron section, in 1841, 134. Houses 21. Pop. of the rural districts of the Magouihy section, in 1841, 3,600. Houses 524. The surface is partly a plain, now stony, and now rich lawn and arable ground; and partly the boldly featured heights which environ the lower lake of Killarney. The old decayed episcopal town of Aghadoe, now noticeable only for some ruins which evince its ancient importance, surmounts a bare green eminence ¼ mile north-west of Killarney, and commands a view, at once broad, extensive, and various, a view quite magnificent and thrilling, over the lower lake. "It was morning," says an anonymous but tasteful writer, "when, accompanied by a friend, I visited this elevated upland. What a contrast between the cold, comfortless ruin, whose interior was yet in deep shadow, and the luxuriant scenery spreading far around! Before us lay the lake, one bright, sparkling, inland sea, with its dark boundary of towering mountains sloping away to the horizon. Ross-castle stood glittering in the early sunbeams, with its finely wooded peninsula, running into the lake; and that little gem of the waters, the fairy islet of Innisfallen, appearing like a shining emerald in the bosom of the wave. Turk, and Mangerton, and Glenna, were still, dark, and sombre; the sun had not yet shined on their dark sides; whilst Mucross, amidst its thick monastic groves, enjoyed all the blush and brilliancy of the hour. Truly, all that the imagination can conceive of the wild and romantic, the magnificent and beautiful, is here brought before the eye; and dull and insensible must be that mind which would not feel it luxury to gaze upon such a landscape. My companion's spirit was up and sooting: he himself declared he was spell-bound as he looked out upon the blue waters of O'Donoghue, and viewed his fairy kingdom; all the varied and vivid associations hanging over that wide-spread scene, with its castles, towers, monastic shrines, and sainted isles, passed in rapid succession before his teeming fancy. I could scarcely restrain a smile, as, contrasting his warm enthusiasm with my own more stayed emotions, I heard him, with tremulous tone, sing out,—

'Of all the blue lakes where day-light leaves
His lingering smile on golden eves,
Fair lake, fair lake, thou'rt dear to me!'

But the scenery thus noticed is only what belongs in a strict or predominant sense to Aghadoe, and forms but one picture in a gorgeous natural gallery, whose other contents will be exhibited principally in the article on Killarney. The ruins at Aghadoe are those of a round fortalice called 'the Bishop's Chair,' a turrageon or round tower called 'the Pulpit,' and the ancient cathedral. 'The Bishop's Chair,' situated on the declivity of a hill, about 260 feet south-west of the cathedral, was built probably in the 9th or 10th century, but is in a very dilapidated condition. Its windows are so destroyed that only one with a round arch remains sufficiently entire to indicate their form. The turrageon and the cathedral, at the mutual distance of 54 feet, crown the summit, or dot the table-land, of the hill; and are surrounded by a thickly tenanted burying-ground. All that remains of the turrageon—called the Pulpit only by the peasantry—formed but part of the basement, and does not reach even to the aperture of the door. Its height is about 12 feet; its exterior circumference is 52 feet; its diameter within the walls is 6 feet; and its thickness of wall is 3½ feet. The stones of which it consists are large, regular, and well-dressed, and exhibit a style of masonry quite superior to that of the cathedral; but they have been peeled from the north-west face for transmutation into tomb-stones; and the whole ruin walls beneath the inflections of 'the gold-seekers,' and other prosaic spoilers of ancient buildings. The tower, to which this melancholy fragment belonged, must have fallen before the commencement of the 18th century, but is not noticed, in its unfallen state, in any record. The cathedral is a low oblong building, of two parts, a nave and a choir, unequal in antiquity, and divided by an unperforated wall. The whole is about 80 feet long and 20 broad. The choir, which belongs apparently to the 13th century, was lighted on the south by a window of 5 feet by 3, and above the altar by a double but exceedingly narrow lancet window, having an inward slope. The nave, which has been assigned so high an antiquity as the 7th or 8th century, and most of whose southern wall has nearly all fallen, was lighted by two small circular-arched windows, the one in the north wall now closed up, and the other in the unfallen part of the south wall. The ancient Romanesque door-way of this division of the building is an architectural relic interesting, not only for its beauty of detail, but for the light which it throws upon the condition of national art and taste at a very remote period. A semicircular arch springs from small round pillars, about 3 feet high, and surmounted by simple capitals. The face of the arch displays two courses of the chevron or zigzag in basso-relievo, and an intermediate series of beads or bosses in mezzo-relievo. The parts between the pillars and the jambs are wrought into fanciful fretwork; and this, in common with the carving of the entire door-way, is executed with both skill and taste. In the choir are three tombs; and at the north-west corner of the nave was an Ogham-inscribed brown rough stone which has disappeared; and, according to report, was barbarously converted into a plain vulgar tomb-stone in the circumjacent cemetery. The chief writer who has guided our compiled account of these ruins, wrote in 1835, and says, "I understand that it is intended to erect a new church at Aghadoe. No site certainly could be better chosen; but I trust there will be no meddling with or displacing of the ancient structure." Vestiges of another ancient ecclesiastical ruin in this parish will be noticed in the article INNISFALLEN: which see. Various beautiful mansions and demesnes mingle their features with the landscape on the east side of Lough Lane: the chief are Aghadoe-house, or Meenisk, an elegant edifice in the Italian style.—Fossa, in the vicinity of the Roman Catholic parish chapel,—and Lakewell, the seat of a brother of Daniel O'Connell, M. P.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardferf and Aghadoe, and forms the corps of the archdeaconry of Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £372 18s. 5½d.; glebe, £49. Gross income, £421 18s. 5½d.; nett, £394 6s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. The incumbent is non-resident, and holds also the sinecure deanery of Lismore. A curate employed for occasional duty has a stipend of £20. In 1834, there was no church. Three Roman Catholic chapels have each an average attendance of 500. The Churchmen, in 1834, amounted to 102, and the Roman Catholics to 4,820. Two schools, in 1834, had jointly on their books 93 boys and 8 girls; and one of them was aided with £8 a-year from Lord Kenmare. In 1840, a National school in Killarney was salaried with £36, and attended by 682 girls; and another at Fossa was salaried with £12, attended by 129 boys and 84 girls.—The ancient diocese of Aghadoe, once distinct, has for ages been merged in that of Ardferf,—or, according to the Roman Catholic nomenclature, in that of Kerry; and, though associated with the latter in name, has no separate statistics; and, with the exception of its archdeaconry and its cathedral, no distinguishing memorials. See ARDFERT and KERRY.

AGHADOWN, or AUGHADOWN, a parish on the coast of the eastern division of West Carbery barony, 34 miles south-west of Skibbereen, co. Cork, Munster. It, for the most part, lies along the river Ilen and the west shore of Baltimore harbour; but it includes also the islands of East Calf, Hare, East and West Innisbeg, and Schemas. Navigation for sea-borne vessels of 200 tons burden is practicable to near the northern boundary. Most of the land is light, tractable, and tolerably productive. Fairs are held on 6th May and 2d October. Length and breadth of the parish, exclusive of the islands, respectively 5 miles and 2½; area, 8,952 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,419; in 1841, 5,757. Houses 968.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial tithe composition, £300; glebe, £34 4s. 6½d. Gross income, £334 4s. 6½d.; nett, £272 8s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £300, and appropriated to the archdeaconry of Ross. The church was built in 1813, at a cost of £646 3s. 1d.; partly raised by parochial assessment and subscription, but chiefly lent by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 180; average attendance 90. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 1,300. The Churchmen amounted, in 1834, to 506; and the Roman Catholics to 5,117. Five day-schools, in 1834, had aggregately on their books 165 boys and 124 girls; one received £9 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; one had £2, and another about £5, from subscription; and two were pay-schools. In 1842, the Aghadown Loan Fund had a capital of £101, circulated £296 in 208 loans, and cleared £1 1s. of nett profit.

AGHIADOWY, AGHADWEY, or AGHADOEY, a parish near the middle of the half-barony of Coleraine, 6½ miles south by west of the town of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5; area, 16,346 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,634; in 1841, 7,884. Houses 1,359. The rivulet which drains the parish is cognominal with it, rises on the east side of Boyd's mountain, and has a course of 8 or 9 miles eastward to the Bann near Cross-Ferry. About one-fifth of the parochial surface consists of bog; and the remainder varies from good arable soil to rough, bold upland. Favourable and fertile swells and alluvial grounds occur near the water-courses; but almost all the rest of the region is naturally bleak and sterile,—"deaf soil, or rust of basalt, ridges or tummocks of rude basalt, bereft even of the sloe and the bramble." Within the parish are the village of Caheny and the hamlet of Meohill. See CAHENY.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardferf. Tithe composition £500. Gross income, £970 14s.; nett, £912 17s. 6½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church was built at an unascertained date, and thoroughly repaired in 1760 at the expense of the parish. Sittings 200; average attendance 175. Of 4 Presbyterian places of worship, the largest is averagely attended by 1,100, that at Kingsend by 150, that at Ballylough by 300, and that at Killeague by 300. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 400 to 500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 326 Churchmen, 6,161 Presbyterians, and 1,456 Roman Catholics. In the same year, 4 schools at Mullabinch, Droghed, Collins, and Drumsteepie, had each £6 a-year from the Ironmongers' Company of London; one at Blackheath was a girls' free-school supported by the rector's lady; one at Ballinakelly had £5 a-year from Mr. Knox; two at Gorran and Cullgrammer, were free-schools, salaried each with £26 from the Methodist Missionary Society; and one at Ballygally was a private or pay-school; and the nine had aggregately on their books 548 boys and 374 girls. In 1840, eight schools at Collins, Aghadowy, Killeague, Miltown, Droghed, Trinalinagh, Bovah, and Moneycarrie, were salaried with £4 each from the National Board, and had aggregately on their rolls 342 boys and 417 girls. In 1839-40, a dispensary in the parish, and within the Coleraine Poor-law union, received and expended £120 6s., had a district with a pop. of 8,572, and administered to 1,172 patients.

AGHADRUMSEE, a chapelry in the parish of CLONES: see that article.

AGHAGALLEN, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Upper Massarene, co. Antrim, and 3 miles north-north-west of Moira, Ulster. It claims 2,415 acres, 21 perches of the area of Lough Neagh, which bounds it on the west; and has a superficies in land of 5,469 acres, 3 rods, and 34 perches. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2. Pop., in 1831, 3,573; in 1841, 3,862. Houses 720. Upwards of 100 acres are bog; and the rest of the surface is for the most part arable. Lough Neagh expands on the west; and the Lagan navigation traverses the interior.—This parish is a vicarage, in the dio. of Connor; and forms part of the benefice of AGHALEE: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £140; and the rectorial tithes are of small value, and are inappropriate in the Marquis of Hertford. The Roman Catholic chapel is averagely attended by upwards of 800. The parishioners, in 1834, consisted of 1,262 Churchmen, 42 Presbyterians, 6 other Protestant dissenters, and 2,443 Roman Catholics. In 1834, three hedge-schools were averagely attended by 97, and a Sunday school by 100.

AGHAGOWER. See AUGHAGOWER.

AGHALEE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the south-west corner of the barony of Upper Massave, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1; area, 2,499 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,411; in 1841, 1,450. Houses 280.—The surface is low and level, or but gently undulated, and declines with a westerly dip toward Lough Neagh. Nearly all the land is arable; and, either as tillage-ground or as meadow, is in good cultivation. The Lagan navigation, and the near vicinity of the post-road from Armagh to Belfast, afford facilities of communication. The village of Aghalee stands on the road from Lurgan to Coleraine, 1 mile south-south-west of Ballinderry, and 4 north-north-east of Lurgan. It is a straggling place, but boasts the presence of the parish-church. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 143. Houses 29. The inhabitants are employed principally in agriculture and in the linen manufacture.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Dromore; and, along with the vicarages of AGHAGALLAN and MAGHERAMESK, [see these articles,] forms the benefice sometimes designated AGHALEE, and sometimes Magheramesk. Composition for the vicarial tithes of the parish, £79. Gross income of the benefice, £334 5s.; nett, £285 2s. Patron, the Marquis of Hertford. The patron is inappropriate of the rectories of the three parishes, and receives £62 in lieu of their tithes. Two curates are employed at salaries of respectively £70 and £50. The church of the union at Aghalee, is supposed to have been built in the reign of Charles II. Sittings 300; average attendance 300. A Quakers' meeting-house in Magheramesk is attended by from 20 to 50. In 1834, the Churchmen of the parish amounted to 1,180, the Presbyterians to 50, other Protestant dissenters to 17, and the Roman Catholics to 226; and the Churchmen within the benefice to 3,735, the Presbyterians to 138, other Protestant dissenters to 187, and the Roman Catholics to 2,935. In the same year, two day-schools in Aghalee had on their books 59 children, a parochial school had 27, a National school 102, a girls' school of the Ladies' Hibernian Society 21, and a Sunday school 79; and the schools within the benefice amounted to 12, and had on their books 283 boys and 149 girls.

AGHALOO. See AUGHALOO.

AGHALURCHER, a parish, partly in the barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, but chiefly in that of Magherastephana, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. The Fermanagh section contains the small towns of LISNASKEA and MAGUIRE'S BRIDGE: see these articles. Length, 15 miles; breadth, 4; area, 48,017 acres,—of which 3,130 acres consist of some small lakes and a portion of Upper Lough Erne. Pop., in 1831, 15,201; in 1841, 16,740. Houses 2,949. Pop. of the co. Tyrone section, in 1831, 1,247; in 1841, 1,304. Houses 221. Pop. of the co. Fermanagh section, in 1831, 13,954; in 1841, 15,436. Houses 2,728. Pop. of the rural districts of the Fermanagh section, in 1841, 13,836. Houses 2,453. One-eighth of the surface is prime land; one-half is land of middling qualities; and three-eighths is principally mountain. The Upper Lough Erne extends along the western border, and contributes features of decided beauty to a pleasing landscape. See ERNE (LOUGH). Maguire's river rises near the moorish and upland watershed between Fermanagh and Tyrone, and makes a run of about 11 miles, all within the parish, south-westward to Lough Erne. The stream is spanned by substantial bridges, and, in a small degree, lends its current and volume as a facility of communication. Limestone abounds, and sandstone is extensively quarried. Spinning, weaving, and some kindred crafts afford considerable employment. Numerous mansions and demesnes reciprocate embellishment with the finer localities. Besides the post-town of Lisnaskea, and the market-town of Maguire's Bridge, there are several villages.—Aghalurcher is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition £831. Gross income, £1,021 15s. 6d.; nett, £821 14s. 3½d. Patron, Trinity College, Dublin. A chapelry within the benefice has its seat at Lisnaskea. A curate serves the chapelry at a stipend of £73 16s. 8d., and the use of the glebe-house, worth £20; and another curate has a stipend of £69 4s. 8d.—The parish church was built in 1768, at a cost of £830 15s. 4½d.; all of which, excepting about £92, was contributed by the parishioners. Sittings about 300; average attendance 300. The chapel at Lisnaskea was rebuilt about the year 1814, at the cost of about £369, raised off the parish. Average attendance 350. A Roman Catholic chapel at Goresbridge is averagely attended by 800; another at Moat by 900; and a Presbyterian meeting-house by 200. There is also a Primitive Wesleyan Methodist place of worship. The parishioners, in 1834, consisted of 7,490 Churchmen, 1,430 Presbyterians, and 9,005 Roman Catholics. In 1834, 17 day-schools had on their books 735 boys and 362 girls; and 5 Sunday schools had 241 boys and 139 girls; and of the former, 2 were National schools, 4 were schools of the London Hibernian Society, one had £34 a-year and three acres of land from endowment, and the rest were day-schools.

AGHAMACART. See AUGHMACART.

AGHAMORE, or AUGHAMORE, a parish, 4½ miles north of Ballyhaunis, and on the eastern border of the barony of Costello, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6; area, 22,820 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,062; in 1841, 7,675. Houses 1,411. The surface is diversified by some small lakes; and, though generally good in the quality of its soil, has a considerable extent of bog. The name Aghamore is a corruption of Achad-mor, and refers to a monastery which rather apocryphal authority asserts to have been founded on the site of the ancient church by St. Patrick for his disciple St. Loarn.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Tuam; and forms part of the benefice of KILTULLAGH: which see. Tithe composition, £158 4s. 10d. According to an agreement between the incumbent of the benefice and the diocesan, the latter of whom wished virtually to divide the benefice, though he could not succeed in disuniting its parishes, a curate receives the tithe composition of Aghamore, Knock, and Bekan, amounting to £323 7s. 1d. There is no church or other parochial place of worship. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 1,200 to 1,500. In 1834, the parishioners amounted to 7,485, and were all Roman Catholics; and the schools, 7 in number, and situated at Coogera, Carnageagla, Woodfield, Cappagh, Aghamore, Annagh, and Bruff, were all supported wholly by fees. In 1840, the National Board granted £73 10s. for building and fitting up a school-house at Cahir.

AGHAMORE, AHAVORE, or ABBEY-ISLE, a peninsular of land, and a fishing-station, alternately an islet, and a small peninsula, between the entrance of the river Kenmore and that of Ballinskelligs bay, in the parish of Kilerohan and barony of Dunkerron, co. Kerry, Munster. It derives its name from an abbey, said to have been founded in the 7th century, and some vestiges of which still remain. Its harbour is difficult of entrance, but perfectly sheltered, and would be greatly improved by the construction of a pier.

AGHANAGH. See AUGHANAH.

AGHANCON, or AGHINCON, a parish, partly in the barony of Clonlisk, but chiefly in that of Ballybrit, King's co., Leinster. It lies $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north of Roscrea in Tipperary. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,544 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,131; in 1841, 1,310. Houses 200. Pop., in 1841, of the Clonlisk section, 177; of the Ballybrit section, 1,131. Houses in the former 26; in the latter 174. The Slieve Bloom mountains screen the district on the east, and form a water-shed between it and Queen's county. The general quality of the land is poor. The ruins of Ballybrit-castle, a mineral spring, and one or two mansions, are the chief objects of interest.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £150. Gross income £168; nett, £112 9s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £50. The church was built in 1787, at an unknown cost. Sittings 300; average attendance about 200. In 1834, the Churchmen amounted to 412, and the Roman Catholics to 1,059; and the day-schools, 3 in number, had on their books 112 boys and 90 girls. One of the schools is free and parochial; and is salaried with £50 a-year from Mr. Darby of Secuscaule.

AGHANLOO, a parish on the coast or north-west border of the barony of Kenaught, 2 miles north of Newtownlinavaddy, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 8,251 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,159; in 1841, 1,841. Houses 343. The broad and beautiful estuary of the Foyle expands on the north-west; and the river Roe, a stream of much character and picturesqueness in its landscape, runs northward through the interior. A vale of varying breadth, and hill-screens of basaltic formation and considerable force of contour, compose the surface. Alluvial flats along the Roe, clayey and gravelly swells on the skirts of the heights, and a soil of basaltic debris, producing a rich grass, on the loftiest acclivities, render the land, in a general view, good, and the arable portions of it fruitful. Benyevenagh, 'the terrifying promontory,' which soars up from the edge of Lough Foyle to an altitude of about 1,280 feet, is greedily frequented to its summit by sheep; and, instead of coarse and aquatic plants, presents an elegant carpeting of shamrock, daisy, butter-cup, and plantains. In 1619, the fortalice of Ballycastle in the parish was built by the Haberdashers' Company of London; and, in 1641, it was besieged by the insurgents, but stoutly and successfully defended. Aghanloo was as remarkable for its comparative freedom from the rebellion of 1641, as for its busy bravery in resisting the effects; for, as appears from the Down Survey, only one of its townlands—that of Ballycarton, belonging to O'Magilligan—was forfeited.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £315. Gross income, £350; nett, £295 13s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1826, by means of a donation of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 230; average attendance from 40 to 70. Two school-houses in distant parts of the parish are also used alternately as parochial places of worship, and attended by about 100. In 1834, the Churchmen amounted to 203, the Presbyterians to 1,220, and the Roman Catholics to 797; and, in the same year, 5 daily schools were attended by 155 boys and 93 girls, and 3 Sunday schools by from 92 to 122 children. Two of the schools, at Lisnagrib and Stradragh, and also an evening school, were supported by the London Hibernian Society; and one at Ballycarton received £8 a-year from the National Board. The Rev. G. Vaughan Sampson, the able writer of 'the Statistical Survey of the County of Londonderry,' was rector of Aghanloo at the time of publishing that work.

AGHAVALLAH, or AGHAVALLIN, a parish on the northern border of the barony of Iraghticonnor, 4½ miles west-south-west of Tarbert, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the town of BALLYLONGFORD: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 16,743 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,698; in 1841, 6,606. Houses 1,072. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 4,398; in 1841, 5,463. Houses 862. The surface declines northward to the Shannon, and skirts part of its noble and far-prolonged estuary. A considerable proportion of the land is marsh, bog, and coarse mountain pasture. The parochial area includes the island of CARRIGAFOYLE: which see. A castle, the ruins of which still exist on the south-west of the strait between the mainland and Carrigafoyle, once belonged to the O'Connors of Kerry; and, along with all Iraghticonnor, their peculiar territory, was forfeited by them in 1666, and bestowed upon Trinity College, Dublin.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ardref and Aghadoc. Vicarial tithe composition £152 6s. 2½d. The rectorial tithes are inappropriate, and belong to Thomas Stoughton, Esq.; and, along with those of Listowel, Liselton, Gale, and Finuge, which are in the same predicament, have been compounded for £544 3s. 0½d. The Public Instruction Report represents Aghavallah as jointly with Killoon, a distinct benefice of the class of rectories and vicarages. Other authorities represent it as the head of a benefice to which belong the three parochial unions of Gale, Killahiny and Lisselton, Killaughton and Murhur, Dysart, Finuge, Listowel, and Knockanure. The Fourth Report on Ecclesiastical Revenue and Patronage—which, for obvious reasons, we prefer to follow,—represents it as one of ten vicarages which constitute the benefice of Listowel. See LISTOWEL. A curate is employed for the parish at a stipend of £64 12s. 3d.; and there is a church with 700 sittings. This place of worship is averagely attended by 50 persons, and the Roman Catholic chapel by 800. In 1834, the church parishioners amounted to 85, and the Roman Catholics to 5,992; and the schools, 6 in number, were wholly supported by fees. In 1840, the National Board salaried a school in Asdee with £8; and a boys' and a girls' school in Ballylongford, with respectively £15 and £10.

AGHENISH, a peninsula, popularly considered an island, in the river Shannon, 16 miles below Limerick. It is in the parish of Robertstown, barony of Shanid, co. Limerick. Post-town, Askeaton. Pop., in 1831, 109.

AGHER, a parish, 2 miles south-south-west of Summerhill, and in the baronies of Lower and Upper Deere, on the southern border of co. Meath, 2 miles south-south-west of Summerhill, Leinster.

It consists of two parts, mutually distant about 2 miles, separated by the intervention of Laracor parish, and called respectively Agher proper and Ginnetts. Area of the Lower Deece section, 769; of the Upper Deece section, 1,294. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 390; in 1841, 386. Houses 56. Pop. of the Lower Deece section, in 1841, 94. Houses 14. Agher and some adjoining lands are part of an elevated tract which separates the basins of the Boyne and the Liffey. Swells and hills diversify the surface, neither very lofty nor picturesque, but contributing much to both the relief of the eye and the drainage of the soil, and generally of such slow ascent as scarcely to obstruct the operations of tillage. The prevailing soil is a various yet strong and deep loam; and it forms good land in Agher, and tolerable in Ginnetts. John Pratt Winter, Esq., the proprietor of the Agher estate, made exemplary and successful exertions toward the close of last century, for improving the condition and economical husbandry of his tenants; and in a sensible and well-written letter, which has a place in the Appendix to Thomson's Statistical Survey of Meath, he states and advocates principles which well deserve the attention of benevolent Irish landlords. He says, inter alia, "It is easy for a gentleman, regardless of expense, to lodge a poor working man with whatever magnificence he may fancy; he thus possibly bestows comfort on a few persons, at a very needless cost, and gratifies his own taste; but that is all. The man who proposes only plain neatness, convenience, and economy, does more; he sets a useful example, which his neighbours may be induced to follow." The suitable dwellings of the peasantry on the estate, their decency and comfort, and the handsome neatness of the demesne and mansion of Agher-house, are what might be expected from the operation upon them of Mr. Winter's principles. The Royal canal impinges on the southern extremity of the parish.—Agher is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £80. Gross income, £131 6s.; nett, £104 5s. 1d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1804, at the cost of £530 3s. 10½d., about half of which was raised by parochial assessment, and £182 15s. was a donation from Samuel Winter, Esq. Sittings 100; average attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 400 to 500. In 1834, the Churchmen amounted to 66, and the Roman Catholics to 320; and two schools—one of which received £2 from the rector, and £8 from John Pratt Winter, Esq.—had on their books 30 boys and 13 girls.

AGHERN, or AHERN, a parish on the west side of the barony of Kinnataloon, 5½ miles east of Rathcormack, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1; area, 3,489 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,367; in 1841, 1,198. Houses 181. About 300 acres are irreclaimable mountain; about 600 acres are waste but improvable land; and all the remainder is arable ground or pasture. The river Bride traverses the parish eastward; and is spanned by a bridge of 3 arches. A castle of the Fitzgeralds, in a pleasant situation on the river, was modernized into a good mansion, and environed with orchards, gardens, and plantations.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £185 10s. 9½d. The rectorial tithes, consisting of one moiety of the entire tithes of the parish, are appropriate, and held by an ecclesiastical incumbent. This vicarage, and the rectory of Britway, constitute the benefice of Aghern. See BARRY. Length of the united parishes, 5½ miles; breadth, 3. Gross income, £425 1s. 2d.; nett, £365 7s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church, situated in Aghern, was built in 1816, at a cost of £738 9s. 2½d., of which more than a third was raised by subscription, and the remainder borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; average attendance 60. In 1834, the Churchmen of Aghern parish amounted to 82, and the Roman Catholics to 1,315; the Churchmen within the benefice to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 2,436. In the same year two day-schools, one of which was in connection with the Society for Discourteasing Vice, and the other was a hedge-school, had jointly 89 scholars; and a Sunday school under the vicar had 28.

AGHERTON, or BALLYAGHROS, a parish in the liberties of Coleraine, and in the north-east corner of co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the village of PORT-STEWART; which see. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 3,896 acres, 3 roods, 16 perches. Pop., in 1831, 2,746; in 1841, 2,318. Houses 398. Pop. of the rural districts in 1841, 1,715. Houses 208. The Atlantic ocean washes it on the north, and the river Bann traces its boundary on the west. See BANN (THE). The surface, while variegated and shooting up into hills and acclivities, is in general practicable to the plough, and tolerably productive in cereal crops. A band of sloping ground on the north is a fine trappan gravel, intermixed with good dark vegetable mould, and is noted for its fertility, and for its producing such oats and barley as have long been in request for change of seed on clay-soil farms of other districts. Stratified knolls of basalt, so indurated and generally so pure as to be very nearly columnar, range inward from the Bann, and terminate, immediately beyond the parochial boundary, in Downhill, the loftiest of the series, overlooking the river's insinuation with the sea. Agricultural improvement has of late years walked over the district, and worked valuable changes in its farming economy, and upon the aspect of its fields. Blue marl occurs in the channel of the Bann, and in the bottom of some dips or hollows. Iron-ore is not un plentiful; and, if worked, would probably be remunerating. Agriculture, fishing, and the linen manufacture, are the chief employments. The splendid mansion, or virtual palace, of Downhill, though on the other side of the Bann, flings, with its cognominal hill and glen and demesne, some influence upon the parish's localities. See DOWNHILL. Of mansions within the boundaries may be mentioned Flower-field and O'Hara-castle. On a slope, near the church, stood a castle, which was reputed to have been the abode of the chief Mac Quillan. "It has lately been pulled down," says the Rev. G. V. Sampson, "merely to build a ditch. I am ashamed to mention the name or profession of the despoiler. In the grout I found pieces of pit-coal, which confirms the belief that mining is of great antiquity." Dr. Adam Clarke, the well-known and erudite Methodist preacher and commentator, achieved in Agherton, where his father was a humble schoolmaster, many of those remarkable struggles which issued in his becoming a preacher; and he spent at Port-Stewart much of the latter part of his life.—Agherton is a rectory in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £240. This rectory, and that of ARDLINES [which see], form the benefice of Agherton, and the corps of the treasurer of the cathedral church of Connor. Gross income, £450; nett, £399 7s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates are employed at stipends of respectively £60 and £50. The parishes of the benefice are mutually 25 or 30 miles asunder. The church of Agherton was built in 1826, at the cost of £830 15s. 4½d., of which £738 9s. 2½d. was borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; average attendance from 150 to 250. A Presbyterian meeting-house and a Methodist one in Agherton are attended respectively by from 400 to 550, and by 100. In 1834, the Churchmen of Agherton amounted to 501, the Presbyterians to 1,802, other Protestant dissenters to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 135; and the Churchmen of the united parishes to 649, the Presbyterians to 2,083, other Protestant dissenters to 19, and the Roman Catholics to 1,422. In 1834, eight day-schools and four Sunday schools in Agherton had aggregately on their books, the former 349, and the latter 333 children. Two of the day-schools were for girls, and one for infants, and received respectively £15, £12, and £10, from Mrs. Crummie; and one was a school for boys, and had £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith.

AGHIART, a parish in the barony of Killian, co. Galway, Connaught. It is so intermixed and almost identified with BALLINAKILT, [which see,] that its proper boundaries and extent cannot be ascertained. Length of the two parishes, 2 miles; breadth, 1. The surface, while low, flat, and tame, is in general carpeted with good soil, and exhibits some tolerable results of georgy. Some bogs which impinge upon it, or pass within its limits, will be noticed in the article MOUNT-BELLEW: which see. The parish lies about $\frac{7}{8}$ miles north-west of Ahascragh, and 13 east by south of Tuam; and is traversed by the great western mail-road to Dublin.—Aghart is a rectory in the dio. of Tuam; and forms part of the benefice of MOTOUGH; which see. Tithe composition of it and Ballinakilty, £148 10s. 8d. In 1834, the two parishes had 4 Church, and 1,743 Roman Catholic inhabitants; and one hedge-school, with 56 scholars.

AGHNAMEADLE, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Upper Ormond, and on the northern border of co. Tipperary, Munster. It contains the small town of TOOMAVARA; which see. Length, $\frac{4}{5}$ miles; breadth, 1; area, 10,322 acres. Pop. in 1831, 3,577; in 1841, 3,893. Houses 612. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,787; in 1841, 3,008. Houses 456. The surface declines southward from the watershed between the county of Tipperary, and the point of the long southerly projection of King's co.; and is drained by some head-streams of the Suir. Communication to the outlets of the Shannon and the Liffey are enjoyed by the mail-road between Limerick and Dublin.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition and gross income, £369 4s. 7d.; nett, £318 10s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. Previous to 1833, the benefice formed part of Ballymackey union. The church was built, in 1833, by means of a grant of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 140; average attendance about 60. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by about 3,000; and jointly with that of Ballymackey, has 3 officiates. In 1834, the Churchmen amounted to 111, and the Roman Catholics to 3,653; and 6 day-schools had on their books 166 boys and 112 girls. One of the schools was aided with £12 from subscriptions; and two with £5 each from the National Board. In 1840, no National school appears in the Report.

AGHNAMEEN, a bog on the left bank of the rivers Flesk and Maine, 9 miles north of Killarney, and traversed by the new mail-road thence to Tralee, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 87,240 English acres. "This," says Mr. Nimmo, "is a very wet and level bog, which is divided from the Maine and Flesk by an alluvial bank. The surface of the bog, however, is considerably above the level of the river bank.

The greatest depth is 19 feet, and nowhere under 12; the upper edge 90 feet, and lower angle 20 feet, above the level of the sea; the bottom 6 inches clay over a sandy gravel; but limestone of excellent quality is had on all sides, and is probably the subjacent rock." Mr. Nimmo, after stating his plan for draining and improving the bog, estimates the total cost of execution at £609 0s. 7d.

AGHOLD, AGH-CAILL, or AGHOWLE, a parish on the western border of the barony of Shillelagh, and of the co. Wicklow, $\frac{4}{5}$ miles east-south-east of Tullow, Leinster. Area 8,140 acres. Pop. in 1831, 2,817; in 1841, 2,764. Houses 432. The census of 1831 likewise exhibits as belonging to the parish, a district in the barony of Rathville, co. Carlow, which then contained a pop. of 160. A considerable proportion of the surface is boggy and wildly upland. The declination is toward the west. The village of Coolkenno is the site of the parish-church. "The village of Aghold or Agh-uail," says Brewer, "presents some ruins of a monastic institution, not noticed by Mr. Archdall, together with remains of stone crosses."—Aghold is a rectory in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £464 3s. 4d. This rectory and the vicarages of MELLINACUFFE, CRYCIN, and LISCOLMAN, [see these articles,] constitute the benefice of Aghold. Length of the united parishes, 9 miles; breadth, 7. Gross income of the benefice, £686 9s. 10d.; nett, £599 17s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75 and some fees. The church was built in 1716, but at what cost is not known; and was enlarged in 1814, by means of a loan of £231 1s. 6d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; average attendance 365. Two Roman Catholic chapels within the union are attended by respectively 1,800 and 1,000. In 1834, the Churchmen of Aghold parish amounted to 770, and the Roman Catholics to 1,955; the Churchmen of Aghold union to 1,821, the Protestant dissenters to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 4,801; and the total of schools in the union is 10, with 686 scholars. The schools in Aghold parish were a boys' school, aided with £30 from the board of Erasmus Smith, and £5 from subscription; two boys and girls' schools, with each £6 from the rector, and a boys and girls' school with £6 from subscription, and £4 from the hospital for 10 foundling children.

AGHORE, or FRESHFORD, a parish in the north-east of the barony of Cranagh, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the town of Freshford; which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 2,171 acres. Pop. in 1831, 2,778; in 1841, 2,650. Houses 482. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 603; in 1841, 575. Houses 93. The surface declines eastward to the Nore; forms part of the beautiful rich vale of that river; and is at once fertile, tolerably cultivated, and of pleasing aspect. In the vicinity of Freshford stands the elegant seat of Upperwood Lodge, De Montmorency, Bart.; and, at the distance of a mile, is Kilrush, a fine seat of the St. George family. Not far from the town stands Ballycastle, an ancient oblong fortress, once the residence of the Viscounts Mountgarrett; and near Kilrush stands Ballylarkin, formerly the seat of the Shortall family, who once were of great note in the county. The original church of the parish was that of an abbey which is said, on the usual kind of authority, to have been founded by St. Lacton, who died in 622.—Aghore is a rectory in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £184 12s. 4d. This rectory and the parishes of BATHREAG, CLASHACROW, CLON-

ANTAGH, TUBRIDBRITAIN, SHEFFIN, CLONTUBRID, BALLEEN, COOLCASHIN, and KILBURIH, [see these articles,] constitute the benefice of Aghoure, and also the corps of Aghoure prebend, in the cathedral church of St. Canice, Kilkenny. Length of the united parishes, 8 miles; breadth, 4½. Gross income of the benefice, £915 7s. 2d.; nett, £755 3s. 6d. Patron of Sheffin, Clontubrid, and Coolcashin, the dean and chapter of St. Canice; and the other parishes, the diocesan. A curate is employed at a stipend of £80. The church, situated in Freshford, was built about a century ago; but at what cost is not known. Sittings 300; average attendance 110. Roman Catholic chapels at Freshford, Clontubrid, and Coolcashin, are attended by respectively 3,254, 200, and 600. In 1834, the Churchmen of Aghoure parish amounted to 129, and the Roman Catholics to 2,195; the Churchmen in the united parishes to 373, and the Roman Catholics to 6,245. In the same year, the schools within the union were 11, and had on their books 561 boys and 406 girls. Those of Aghoure were a parochial school, salaried with £10 from the rector, and £5 from a bequest of the late Colonel Brown; two National schools, salaried with £10 and £18; two pay-schools; and a Sunday school.

AGHRIS, or AGHRIS, a promontory in the parish of Templeboy, and on the north coast of the barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It is situated 11 miles west of the town of Sligo, in lat. 54° 17' N., and long. 9° 22' W. Aghris or Pulog-hurry harbour, which is sheltered from westerly and north-westerly winds by the promontory, is a good roadstead in five fathoms of water, and is much frequented by boats during the herring fishery. Its area is about half-a-mile square; and its western side runs out in a limestone cliff 40 or 50 feet high. The bight, however, has no pier or quay. Its upper part is a mere shallow strand; and its anchoring-ground is subject to such a ground-swell, during northerly winds, that no vessel can then hold on. Mr. Nimmo, who saw that a fishing-harbour for the district was an object much wanted, and considered Aghris bight as the most favourable spot for it on the coast of Tyreragh, proposed the construction of a rough breakwater at the least 200 feet in length, or, in lieu of it, should it be thought too expensive, such a pier and kant as should make a fair tide harbour, and cost £2,760. Though the breakwater could not be formed for less than about £10,000, "its benefit to this part of the country," says Mr. Nimmo, "would, in my opinion, amply justify such an expense; and if ever carried forward into deeper water, it would afford shelter at all times to vessels forced in upon this dangerous coast"—The point of Aghris promontory is a precipitous limestone cliff, perforated with two caves; and it is capped with the remains of a triple intrenchment, called Toole's castle. The limestone cliff, continuing nearly two miles, returns to the general direction of the shore of Tyreragh, and is then succeeded, for a short distance, by a shallow strand, named Traaban.

AGHRY, a lake on the boundary between the parishes of Anahill and Dromara, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. This fine piece of water seems to cover about 100 acres. It receives no stream, and must obtain its supply of water from springs. Its level, though raised by snow, is seldom affected by rain.

AGH-ŪAILLE. See AGHOLD.

AGHULTIE. See BALLYTOOLEY.

AGIVEY (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Kenauht and half barony of Coleraine, co. Londonderry.

Ulster. It rises between Boyd's mountain and the most northerly of the Carghlogher mountains, on the western lip of the basin of the Bann; and has a north-easterly course of about 10 miles to a common embouchure in the Bann with the Aghadowey river near Cross-ferry.

AGIVEY, a grange or extra-parochial district, traversed by its cognominal stream, in the south-east of the half barony of Coleraine, and 7 miles south-south-east of the town of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Area, 1,728 acres. Pop., in 1831, 938; in 1841, 950. Houses 163. The arable land, though naturally fertile, is so minutely divided among small tenants as to be ill-cultivated and limitedly productive. Coarse earthenware, bricks, and tiles are made in considerable quantity from a clay which abounds.—The district has neither church, chapel, nor school. The inhabitants attend the places of worship in Aghadowey, which is contiguous with Agivey on the north; and, in 1834, they consisted of 59 Churchmen, 498 Presbyterians, and 418 Roman Catholics.

AGLISH, a parish in the barony of East Muskerry, 9½ miles west by south of the city of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 6,771 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,782; in 1841, 2,579. Houses 410. The three townlands of Balleedag, Cronody, and Fergus, which had in 1831 a population of 525, belonged then to the barony of Barretts, but, by virtue of 6 and 7 William IV., have been transferred to East Muskerry. The surface of the parish lies on both sides of the river Lee, and forms a luxuriant and beautiful part of the stream's banks and screens. The land is, for the most part, of good quality, and in a comparatively improved condition. The estate of Aglish, on the south side of the Lee, was forfeited, in the rebellion of 1641, by Teige MacCormac MacCarty.—"The south part of this parish," says Dr. Smith, "is in the diocese of Cork, and the north in that of Cloyne." In all our authorities, however, it figures as a vicarage wholly in Cork. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £310. The rectorial tithes of three denominations or townlands are compounded for £39 2s., and appropriated to the prebend of Kilbrogan; and those of five townlands are compounded for £120, are inappropriate, and, in 1836, were claimed by Major Philip Cross. In March, 1833, the vicarage, which had previously been united to the parishes of Moviddy and Kilmolane, was made a separate benefice. Gross income, £313 10s.; nett, £264 19s. Patron, the diocesan. The parochial place of worship, in 1836, was a small house licensed by the diocesan. Average attendance, about 15. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 400 to 500; and has two officiates, who officiate also in a chapel in the benefice of Athnawen. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 31, and the Roman Catholics to 2,858; and the day-schools, 4 in number, had on their books, 129 boys and 81 girls. One school was parochial, and received £2 a-year from the vicar; one was salaried with £8 8s. from Mr. Rye; and the other two were pay-schools.

AGLISH, a parish in the barony of Magonihy, 4 miles south-south-east of Milltown, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,857 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,901; in 1841, 1,939. Houses 289. The surface declines south-westward to the Lane, a little below the river's exit from the lower lake of Killarney. The land, for the most part, consists of good arable ground and pasture, but includes some pendicles of bog. The arts of husbandry have been improved, and have found some deterioration over the soil. Excellent sandstone is quarried.

—This parish is a vicarage and a separate benefice in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. Vicarial tithe composition, £78 9s. 2½d. Gross income, £107 19s. 2½d.; nett, £94 10s. 11½d. Patron, the earl of Cork and Orrery. The rectorial tithes, consisting of the moiety of the whole tithes, and compounded for the same amount as the vicarial, are inappropriate, and belong to the earl of Cork. The church—a neat edifice, with a square tower surmounted by an octagonal turret—was built in 1823, by means of a gift of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; average attendance 20. In 1834, there were in the parish 33 Protestants and 1,902 Roman Catholics; and two schools—one of which was aided with £5 a-year from Lord Kenmare—had on their books 81 boys and 22 girls. In 1840, the National Board granted £123 2s. 4d. towards building and fitting up a school for boys and another for girls at Knockaderagh. A dispensary in the parish, with a branch at Molahiffe, was lately discontinued, owing to the refusal of a county grant.

AGLISH, a parish on the western border of the barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It contains the villages of Aglish and Villierstown. See VILLIERSTOWN. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,856 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,689; in 1841, 3,783. Houses 560. Pop. of the rural districts in 1841, 2,997. Houses 436. A small affluent of the Blackwater bisects the westward declination of the surface; and the Blackwater itself traces the western boundary. Though the land is tumulated, and to a small extent marshy or boggy, it constitutes, for the most part, excellent tillage-ground and pasture. A considerable proportion of wood shelters the fields, and embellishes the landscape. An ancient square building, called by the natives 'the Clough,' appears to have been a regular fortalice of the kind which were constructed previous to the invention of fire-arms. It consists of high walls, with a tower at each corner; round the walls are ranges of spike-holes, and along the top are the remains of battlements; and on the south is a large gateway, formerly defended by a portcullis. The towers alone appear to have been roofed. Tradition says that this place was erected by King John as a half-way stage between Cork and Waterford. The village of Aglish stands in the angle between the Blackwater and its tributary, 5½ miles east of Tallow, and about the same distance south by east of Cappoquin. Area, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 392; in 1841, 458. Houses 73.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Lismore, and forms part of the benefice of AFFANE: see that article. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £160; and the rectorial tithes, consisting of two-thirds of the whole, are compounded for £320, and belong to the Duke of Devonshire. The Roman Catholic parochial and Slieve Gran chapels are attended by respectively 700 and 275; and in common with a chapel in Whitechurch, have 4 officiates. A friary chapel has two officiates and about 12 attendants. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 107, and the Roman Catholics to 3,728; and 7 schools—two of which were aided with respectively £30 and £6, as well as a house and some land, from Mr. Stuart—had on their books 314 boys and 150 girls.

AGLISH, co. Mayo. See CASTLEBAR.

AGLISH, or AGLISH-MARTIN, a small parish on the southern border of the barony of IVERK, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Post-town, Waterford. Length, 1 mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,343 acres. Pop., in 1831, 401; in 1841, 440. Houses 50. The surface is carpeted with excellent soil, and forms part of the softly-featured left bank of the Suir. Pop. of the village of Aglish in 1831, 142. Houses 18.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £96 18s. 5½d. Gross income, £106 18s. 5½d.; nett, £98 1s. 7½d. Patron, the Crown. There is neither church, glebe-house, chapel, nor school. A salary of £5 is paid to the curate of an adjoining benefice for attending to the occasional duties of Aglish. But in 1834, all the inhabitants were Roman Catholics.

AGLISH-CLOGHANE, or EGLISH, a parish in the barony of Lower Ormond, 3½ miles north-north-east of Borris-o'-kane, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,808 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,547; in 1841, 1,938. Houses 311. The land, though partly reclaimed and improved, is, in the aggregate, a remarkably light limestone soil, churlish and infertile, and, to a considerable extent, boggy. Two poor hamlets are within the limits.—This parish is at once a vicarage, a rectory, and a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarage, with cure, forms the corps of the archdeaconry of the diocese. The rectory, without cure, and also the rectories of Lorrha and Dorrha, with cure, are held by the archdeacon in union with the vicarage. Tithe composition of the parish, £161 10s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The perpetual curacy is commensurate with the vicarage. Gross income, £88 15s. 1d.; nett, £85 13s. 11d. Patron, the archdeacon of Killaloe. The church was built in 1815 by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Other statistics are mixed up with those of LORRHA and DORRHA: see these articles.

AGLISH-CORMICK, or LISCORMICK, a parish in the baronies of Coonagh and Clanwilliam, 2½ miles west-south-west of Pallas-Green, co. Limerick, Munster. Area of the Coonagh section, 574 acres; of the Clanwilliam section, 1,141 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the Coonagh section, 288; of the Clanwilliam section, 450. Houses in the Coonagh section, 46; in the Clanwilliam section, 68. The ecclesiastical parish is returned as having had, in 1831, a population of 316; and seems to be co-extensive with only the Coonagh section. The surface has a westerly declination; and commences not far from the water-shed between the basins of the Suir and the Shannon. The land is good tillage-ground and dairy pasture; but has not experienced very advantageous cultivation.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Emly; and forms part of the benefice of BALLYMOOD: which see. Tithe composition, £138 9s. 2½d. In 1834, the inhabitants were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily-school was attended by 30 boys and 12 girls.

AGLISH-DRINAGH, or BALLINORANE, a parish in the north-west of the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, 3½ miles south-west by south of Charleville, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,310 acres. Pop., in 1831, 955; in 1841, 1,026. Houses 146. The surface is hilly, has a southern exposure, is drained by the nascent river Awbeg, and forms, for the most part, very good land, both pastoral and arable.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition and gross income, £240; nett, £224 4s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. There is neither church, glebe-house, nor resident Protestant clergyman. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 2,500; and has two officiates. In 1834, the inhabitants were all Romans Catholics; and there was no school.

AGLISH-VENAN. See BALLYMACART.

AGNEW'S-HILL, a conspicuous and commanding height near the southern extremity of the barony of Glenarm, co. Antrim, Ulster. Altitude, 1,358 feet above sea-level. The summit rises about 5 miles west by south of Larne, and 4 west by north of the nearest part of the North Channel; and it commands a magnificent panoramic view of the frith of Clyde, the Mull of Kintyre, and portions of the Argyleshire Hebrides.

AHACROSS. See AGHACROSS.

AHACK, or PORT-AHACK, a bight, close to the entrance of the Culfad river, on the north-east coast of the barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. Though a mere landing-place, where fishing-boats can be conveniently hauled up, it would be a useful little harbour if improved.

AHAMLISH, or AHAMPLISH, a parish on the coast of the barony of Carbery, 9 miles north-north-west of Sligo, co. Sligo, Connaught. It contains the villages of BALLINTEMPEL, GRANGE, and KILKEDGE: see these articles. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3; area, 16,414 acres,—of which 29 acres are occupied by the villages. Pop., in 1831, 7,483; in 1841, 8,720. Houses 1,457. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 8,214. Houses 1,369. The parish stretches along the Atlantic between the bay of Sligo and that of Donegal; and includes the islands of DERNISH and INISHMURRAY: which see. The mountain Ben-Albin extends south-westward from near the eastern boundary. The rest of the surface is, for the most part, moorish, boggy, of churlish aspect, or otherwise tame and uninviting. The well-known statesman, Lord Palmerston, proprietor of nearly the whole parish, reclaimed a large area of bog, and effected some other improvements of importance. But wood, verdure, diversity of surface, and lineaments of landscape are all wanting, to remove monotony and irksomeness of scene. The state of agriculture, as to at once its tools, its skill, and its enterprise, is low. Turf and limestone abound. The rivulet Bunduff is a good trouting stream.—This parish is a vicarage and a separate benefice in the dio. of Elphin. Vicarial tithe composition, £110 15s. 4d. Gross income, £129 4s. 6d.; nett, £92 8s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes, consisting of one moiety of the whole, and compounded for the same sum as the vicarial, are inappropriate, and belong to Viscount Palmerston. The church was built in 1813, at a cost of about £831, of which Lord Palmerston gave £92 6s. 1d., and the late Board of First Fruits lent £646 5s. 1d. Sittings 100; average attendance 25. Two Roman Catholic chapels have each one officiate, and an average attendance of 200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 73, and the Roman Catholics to 7,789; and 6 schools—additional to a school on one of the islands, which was supported by Mr. Wynn, but the statistics of which could not be ascertained—had on their books 285 boys and 175 girls. Three of the teachers had each a house and garden, and respectively £15, £21, and £25 a-year, from Lord Palmerston.

AHAPHOND, a village in the parish of Killeheny, barony of Iraghticonnor, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 281. Houses 48.

AHARA, AGHARA, or AGUHARA, a parish in the north of the barony of Abbeyshrule, 4½ miles north-east of Ballymahon, co. Longford, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,595 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,036. Houses 179. The land, though partly bog, is, on the whole, superior to that of some adjacent districts. The parish is bisected eastward by the road from Lanesborough to Mullingar; and enjoys the advantages of Royal canal communication with Dublin.—Ahara is a vicarage in the dio. of Ardagh; and forms part of the benefice of KILGLASS: which see. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are compounded for respectively £71 7s. 7d., and £37 7s. 8d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Col. Fox. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 100, and the Roman Catholics to 1,157; and 5 hedge-schools were attended by 174 scholars.

AHARNEY, AGHARNEY, or LISDOWNEY, a parish, 3 miles south of Durrrow, and partly in the barony of Clarmallagh, Queen's co., but chiefly in that of Galmoy, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. The Kilkenny section contains the village of LISDOWNEY: which see. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Queen's co. section, 1,393 acres; of the co. Kilkenny section, 5,547 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,156; in 1841, 2,586. Houses 427. Pop. of the Queen's co. section, in 1831, 354; in 1841, 518. Houses 91. Pop. of the rural districts of the Kilkenny section, in 1831, 1,640; in 1841, 1,934. Houses 313.—The parish is situated on the Nore, and traversed northward by the road from Kilkenny to Aghaboe. The land, partly arable and partly pastoral, is but of second-rate quality. Limestone abounds. Ballyconra, at the southern extremity, and on the banks of the Nore, is an ancient seat of the earls of Kilkenny, surrounded by a fine demesne.—Aharney is a rectory and a vicarage, in the dio. of Ossory. Composition for the rectorial tithes, £226 13s. 4d.; for the vicarial tithes, £113 6s. 8d. The rectory, in union with that of Attanagh, constitutes the sinecure benefice of Aharney. Gross income, £318 19s. 6d.; nett, £288 10s. 3d. Patron, the Crown. The vicarage, in union with that of Attanagh, and with the rectories of Rosconnel and Kilmennan, constitutes the benefice of ATTANAGH: see that article. There is neither glebe-house nor church. The Roman Catholic chapel at Lisdowney is attended by 460 and 800; and has two officiates, who officiate also in Clontubrit and Whitegate. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 46, and the Roman Catholics to 2,115; and a National school for boys was aided with £8, and attended by 105 scholars; a National school for girls was aided with £6, and attended by 108; and two pay-schools, and a Roman Catholic Sunday school, were attended by respectively 120 and 308.

AHASCRAUGH (THE), a rivulet of the baronies of Killian and Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. It has a south-easterly course of about 13 miles, and insinuates with the right side of the Suck, 1½ mile above Ballinasloe; and is valuable as the principal drainage of a series of improved and of improvable bogs. It rises on the lands of Ashfield, near Glantane, at the base of the high limestone ridge which separates the tributary system of the Shannon from that of Lough Corrib. Leaving ASHFIELD [which see], it takes its course through a grassy sloping bog, at the base of the lands of Kinclare. From below the bog of Garafean, where it is joined by a considerable affluent, to Clonpee bridge, it has so trifling a fall, and is so choked up with weeds and sedgy grass, as to seem quite stagnant. From the tail-race of Clonpee mill to Clonbrock bridge, a distance of 1 mile, the fall is 8 feet; and from Clonbrock bridge to the tail-race below the bridge of Ahascragh, a distance of 2½ miles, the fall is 22 feet. Two under-shot mills within the latter space want proper back-drains for the discharge of surplus water, and, in consequence, occasion much damage to the low land adjacent to the river. Between Ahascragh bridge and Annabeg mill, a distance of rather more than 2½ miles, an aggregate descent of 17½ feet, is effected by successive falls over gravel ridges, leaving the intermediate stretches quite quiescent. From Annabeg mill-race to the junction with the Suck, a distance of 2 miles, so trivial a fall exists that, in winter, the Suck rejects the river's tribute,

AHASCRAUGH, a parish in the baronies of Killian, Kilconnel, and Clonmacnoon, co. Galway, Connaught. The Kilconnel section contains the town of AHASCRAUGH: see next article. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area of the Killian section, 8,250 acres; of the Kilconnel section, 2,776; of the Clonmacnoon section, 6,316 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 5,221; in 1841, 5,380. Houses 625. Pop. of the Killian section, in 1831, 1,333; in 1841, 1,347. Houses 204. Pop. of the rural districts of the Kilconnel section, in 1831, 793; in 1841, 902. Houses 141. Pop. of the Clonmacnoon section, in 1831, 2,244; in 1841, 2,356. Houses 369. The surface is all low and level, or diversified with but gentle swells and undulations. Tracts of bog, of irrigated meadow, of good arable ground, and of luxuriant plantation, are so curiously interplacéd as to look almost like a piece of huge Mosaic work. About two-thirds of the whole are good either for cultivated pasture or for cereal crops; and most of the other third yields either the produce of the forest, or fuel for the peasants' hearth. The beautiful mansions and demesnes of Clonbrock and Castlegragh completely relieve, and go far to embellish, what might, without them, be a tame and almost irksome landscape. See CLONBROCK and CASTLEGRAGH. Marl, in very large quantity, but of inferior quality, occurs between the town of Ahascragh and Lowville. In the Kilconnel section is the village of Killeen; and in the Clonmacnoon section are the villages of Cournamuckla and Kilglass.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £323 9s. 3d. Gross income, £365 9s. 3d.; nett, £277 13s. 0½d. Patron, alternately the Crown and the diocesan. The church was built in 1814, by means of a loan of £923 1s. 6½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; average attendance 80. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 700, and has two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 182, and the Roman Catholics to 5,472; and eight day-schools had on their books 378 boys and 160 girls. One of the schools, attended by 135 boys and 50 girls, was aided with £40 and perquisites to the teachers, and with a gratuitous supply of books, stationery, and, in many instances, clothes to the scholars, from Lord Clonbrock. The Commissioners of Public Instruction break their usual silence, and say, respecting this school, "Altogether the establishment reflects great credit upon its patron." Another of the schools had £7 a-year from the London Hibernian Society, and £33 12s. 6d. through the hands of the rector; another had £15 a-year and a garden, and 1s. per quarter for each approved pupil, from Sir Ross Mabon; and the others were all pay-schools.

AHASCRAUGH, a post and market town in the above parish, stands on the left bank of the Ahascragh river, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Tuam and Westport, 6½ miles north-north-west of Ballinasloe, 20½ east-south-east of Tuam, and 7½ west by north of Dublin. Area, 37 acres. Pop., in 1831, 851; in 1841, 775. Houses 111. Excepting Ballinasloe and Westport, few towns or villages west of the Shannon can compete, or even tolerably compare, with Ahascragh, in cleanliness, order, and comparative neatness. A prolonged but slow swell in the ground commences at the river, bears the town on its skirts, and ascends with the rich dotings and tracery of the parish-church, the parsonage-house, one of the endowed school-houses, quick-set enclosures and luxuriant fields, to the warmly tinted demesne of Castlegragh. No air of pretension is worn by the little town; and no venerable ruin or chef-d'œuvre in architecture imparts to it éclat; yet its tone of comfort renders the sight of it quite a relief to the eye which has wandered over the numerous squalid villages of Connaught. A lending-fund, instituted and managed by the benevolent rector, is, according to a report of it published some time ago, "established on such good principles, that, though it circulates £3,000 annually among the lower classes, and has been the means of giving competence and comfort to hundreds, yet it is not decreasing its capital, and there are very few instances indeed where the people who take advantage of the loan do not strictly discharge their engagements." In 1842, the Loan Fund had a capital of £634, circulated £2,961 in 810 loans, and expended for charitable purposes £20. An ancient abbey, which stood at Ath-ascrath, is alleged, though the statement may be doubted, to have been founded by St. Cuan, who died in 788. This St. Cuan is of course the patron saint of the place; and he figures in some current popular legends and thaumaturgic tales which we do not choose to repeat. A holy well at the town long participated largely, and still participates to a degree, in St. Cuan's celebrity. The public conveyances of Ahascragh are all in transit,—the mail coach between Dublin and Westport, a car between Ballinasloe and Tuam, and a coach between the latter towns to connect Tuam with the terminus of the Grand canal. As a post-town, Ahascragh has sub-offices at Ardrahan and Burrin. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday, on the Wednesday in Trinity-week, on Aug. 25, and on Nov. 24.

AHERLOW (THE), a highly scenic stream, partly in the barony of Cosha, co. Limerick, but chiefly in that of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. It rises among the western heights of the Galtee mountains, and pursues a course of about 6 miles northward, and 12 miles eastward to the Suir, at a point 2 miles above Cahir. The part of its basin or vale, which contains the finest scenery, and is called, par excellence, the glen of Aherlow, is about 6 miles in length and 1½ in mean breadth. The Galtees, which form its southern screen, soar aloft to an altitude of 2,400 feet; and the Tipperary hills, along the north, though various in height, and inferior in boldness, are sufficiently lofty and intricate to give force and character to the landscape. The verdant and softly towering outlines of the Galtees, the prolonged sheets of forest on the Tipperary hills, and the breadth and luxuriance of the intervening plain, impart to the river's landscape a noble richness which quite competes with such wild sublimity as occurs in more alpine districts, and may bear comparison with some of the most boasted opulence in the great natural picture gallery of Wicklow. At the upper end of the glen are the mansions of Riversdale and Stagdale; near the middle is New Forest; and at the lower end is AHERLOW-CASTLE. See GALTÉE MOUNTAINS.

AHERN. See ACHERN.

AHINAGH, or ACHINAGH, a parish in the barony of East Muskerry, 2½ miles south-south-east of Macroom, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4; area, 9,420 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,442; in 1841, 2,689. Houses 429. The surface is part of the vale and screens of the river Lee. About 800 acres are waste and mountainous, but for the most part reclaimable, and the rest of the area is good land. Several large plantations, demesnes of mansions, and shrubberies of villas, ring warmth and covering over the scenery of the Lee. On a steep rock, in the middle of the river, stands the castle of CARRIGADROUID: see that article. A bridge at this place, which communicates with the neat small village of Killinardish, formed a noted pass in the wars of 1641, and, as well as the castle, was often taken and retaken by the contending forces. A deep, gloomy, mural-faced glen, called Glin-Caum, or 'the crooked Glen,' conducts the highway hence toward Macroom. On each side is almost a sheer precipice of craggy rock, bosked, in a few places, with oak, ash, and birch, and offering some contributions to the herbarium of the botanist. South of this glen stands the high tower of Mashanaglass, 'the strong fortress,' built by the MacSwineys. "King James I., on the 13th of April, 1612," says Dr. Smith, "directed a letter to Sir Arthur Chichester, Lord-deputy of Ireland, in behalf of Owen MacSwiney, alias Owen Hogg, of Mashanaglass, to accept the surrender of his lands, and to grant a patent to restore them to him. This Owen was particularly recommended to that prince by the Lord Danvers, President of Munster, and Sir Richard Morison, Vice-president, for having performed many faithful services in that king's reign and in Queen Elizabeth's, Owen MacSwiney, son to the above Owen, was attained, anno 1642, for being concerned in the Irish rebellion, and forfeited his estate."—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £738 3s. 11d. Gross income, £776 8s. 11d.; nett, £630 7s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1791, by means of a grant of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 130; average attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 450, and has two officiates, who officiate also at a chapel in the parish of Macroom. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 119, and the Roman Catholics to 2,362; and an infant-school, aided with £16 from subscription, and a week-day school, and a Sunday school, both superintended by the Protestant clergyman, and the former aided with £23 from subscription, had aggregately on their books 28 boys and 46 girls.

AHOGHILL, a parish, 3 miles west by south of Ballymena, and lying in the baronies of Lower Antrim, Kilconway, Upper Toome, and Lower Toome, co. Antrim, Ulster. The Lower Toome section contains the villages of AHOGHILL, CULLYBACKEY, GALGORM, GRACEHILL, and CARNEARNY, and part of the town of PORTGLENONE: see these articles. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Area of the Lower Antrim section, 315 acres; of the Kilconway section, 2,802 acres; of the Lower Toome section, 29,870 acres; of the Upper Toome section, 2,432 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 16,442; in 1841, 23,622. Houses 4,035. Pop. of the Lower Antrim section, in 1841, 303. Houses 53.* Pop. of the Kilconway section, in 1831, 3,057; in 1841, 1,536. Houses 268. Pop. of the Upper Toome section, in 1831, 1,349; in 1841, 1,500. Houses 265. Pop. of the rural districts of the Lower Toome section, in 1831, 10,768; in 1841, 18,302. Houses 3,104. The census of 1831 makes Portglenone a separate parish, with a town pop. of 773, and a rural pop. of 6,087; and it includes among the villages the hamlet of Carnearny with a pop. of 60, which the census of 1841 makes rural. Hence, the apparent discrepancies in the above statistics. Yet the ecclesiastical divisions and statistics also make Portglenone a separate parish: see PORTGLENONE. The river Emain, effluxing from Loch Beg, and moving toward the north, traces the western boundary, and separates the district from co. Londonderry; and the Maine river, proceeding southward on its way to Lough Neagh, and drinking up little affluents in its progress, drains the interior and the east: see BANN and

* This section is not assigned to the parish in the census of 1831.

MAINE. Much of the Maine's valley possesses many amenities and beauties. The general parochial surface is broken, tumulated, and hilly,—a little sea of green and moorish heights, with pendicles of bog, and interspersions of meadow and arable land. Agriculture was long a laggard in the district; and even yet has not acquired courage to traverse extensive tracts of boggy and waste land which would, without much reluctance, yield themselves to its dominion. "When the first [Moravian] colonists were settled in this part of the country," says an interesting account of Gracehill, inserted in Mason's Statistical Work on Ireland, "they found the land in a rude and uncultivated state; and the natives were so ignorant of husbandry, that they could scarcely afford to pay four shillings rent per Irish acre; nor had they any idea of housing their potatoes, and securing them from the winter's frosts, till they learned it from these colonists." The manufacture of linen has long been extensively and successfully prosecuted; and the bleaching of it is practised in several establishments on the Maine. Galgorm-castle, a seat of the Earl of Mountcashel, situated a mile east of the village of Ahoghill, is a quadrangular embattled edifice. Five or six other mansions of note or elegance, a sprinkling of neat villas, and a considerable proportion of wood, combine with the greatly diversified face of the country to present pleasing natural pictures to the eye.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £1,015 7s. 8d. Gross income, £1,219 7s. 8d.; nett, £908 2s. 7d. Patron, the Crown. In 1835, a supernumerary curate had a salary of £69 4s. 7½d.; and an acting curate had the same amount of salary, and the use of the glebe-house and its appurtenances. The church is so old that no record exists of the date or cost of its erection. Sittings 500; average attendance, from 80 to 100. Six Presbyterian meeting-houses are attended by respectively 60, 500, from 250 to 400, from 100 to 250, from 360 to 430, and from 275 to 350. The Moravian chapel is attended by 250, and has two ministers. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 400; and shares with Portglenone chapel the care of one officiate. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 656 members of the Established church, 12,027 Presbyterians, 1,052 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,932 Roman Catholics; the day-schools amounted to 24, and had on their books 610 boys and 389 girls; and the Sunday schools amounted to 16, and were attended by a maximum of 1,513 children. Four of the day-schools belonged to the London Hibernian Society; two received £8 each from the National Board; two, £5 each from Mr. McNeill; two, £5 each from respectively the Earl Mountcashel, and Mr. Adair; one, £6 from three ladies; one, £2 from the rector; and all the rest were pay-schools. In 1840, 12 schools were in connexion with the National Board, and received aid varying between £3 5s. and £19 15s.; and these were situated at Ahoghill, Killygarren, Watercloney, Laymore, Gortgole, Tullygawley, Glenhue, Cullybackey, Moyasset, West Gervagh, East Gervagh, and Upper Larg.

AHOGHILL, a village in the above parish, is situated on the left bank of a small tributary of the Maine, and on the road from Belfast to Ballymena, 3 miles west by south of Ballymena, and 10 miles north-north-west of Antrim. Area, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 421; in 1841, 477. Houses 88. It is a neat well-built segregation of houses; excels most Irish villages in cleanliness and an aspect of comfort; and is enlivened by the vicinity of several handsome villas. Fairs are held on June 4th; Aug. 26th, and Dec. 5th; and monthly markets are held for the sale of linen. The village is the seat of a presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in Ireland; and the site of no fewer than three of its meeting-houses. The presbytery comprehends 13 congregations. Previous to the formation of the General Assembly, the village was the seat also of a presbytery of the Secession synod. In 1839-40, a Medical Dispensary, in Aboghill, under the Ballymena Poor-law union, received £75 11s., expended £70 2s. 3d., and administered to 600 patients. This dispensary, and another at Toome, are the only medical charities within the union.

AILE. See AYLE.

AILEACH, or GRIANAN OF AILEACH, a very ancient and interesting fortalice, the quondam palace of the early Irish kings of the north, co. Donegal, Ulster. It crowns a hill upwards of 800 feet above sea-level, near the head of Lough Swilly; and commands a clear and extensive view of the exquisite landscape of the lake. An antique paved road leads up to Aileach, 'the Stoue Fortress'; and three concentric earthen ramparts surround it, and are pierced, opposite the road, by a hollow passage. The areas within the ramparts are respectively 5½ acres, 4 acres, and 1 acre. Aileach itself encloses a circular area of 77½ feet in diameter; and consists of an enormous stone wall, of from 11½ to 15 feet in thickness, and at present 6 feet in height. A terrace is carried round the interior, and descended by flights of steps. Two corridors, each 2 feet wide and 5 feet high, commence at the door-way, but do not communicate with it, and, perforating the wall round one half of the circumference, open into the interior. A small oblong building, apparently more modern than the fortress, stands in the centre. The whole masonry is rude,—uncoursed, unchiselled, uncemented. Aileach was built by Eochy Ollahir, one of the earliest Irish kings whose names and storied reigns bear any marks of authenticity; and, in 1101, it was captured, reduced, and dilapidated, by Murtagh O'Brien, king of Munster, in revenge of the destruction three years before of Kineora in Clare, by Donnel MacLoughlin, king of Ulster. Such historical facts as we have stated respecting the fortress, and a crowd of minute ones respecting its origin, builders, and architecture, are vouched by an Irish poem, recently brought to light, appearing to have been written before the year 1100, and believed to be authentic.

AIRD'S SNOT. See GIANT'S CAUSEWAY.

ALAND'S BAY, a small bay between Brownston Head and Swiney Head, on the coast of the barony of Gualtiere, co. Waterford, Munster.

ALISH. See RATHRYNAN.

ALLANSTOWN, a conspicuous hill on the left of the great road from Dublin to Enniskillen, 4 miles north-west of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. It is partially wooded, and forms a remarkable feature in the landscape for many miles round. The demesne of Allanstown includes the hill, and stretches along its northern base.

ALLEN and MILLTOWN, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kildare. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions. See also ALLEN (ISLAND OF).

ALLEN (BOG OF), a vast but undefined extent of bog in Leinster, chiefly in co. Kildare and in King's and Queen's co. The name designates, not one continuous morass, but nearly all the series of bogs in Leinster north of the Slieve-Bloom mountains, south of the parallel of Mullingar, and east of the Shannon. The bogs are generally distinct, sometimes far apart, and usually separated by belts, or even high ridges of dry country; and they incline toward different rivers, as their natural direction for drainage. At once the largest, the least interrupted, and the most characteristically featured portion of the series, expands principally in the north-west of Kildare, and westward thence into King's co.; and this is often designated, par excellence, the Bog of Allen. The Kildare portion of this bog has been estimated at 36,430 English acres, with an average elevation above low water of 270 feet; the western portion, sometimes called the Barrow bog, is about 41,073 acres in extent, with an average height above low water of 266 feet. The peat of four of the bogs reported on by Mr. Griffith, varies in depth from 12 feet to 42, and averages 25; on the surface, it exhibits a great variety of the moss plants; to the depth of about 10 feet, it is a mass of moss fibres, in different stages of decomposition; through a further depth of averagely 10 feet, it consists of a light blackish brown turf, with the mossy fibres still visible, but not perfect; at a further depth, the turf becomes blacker and more compact; and near the bottom, it forms a dense black substance which, when dried, bears a close resemblance to bituminous coal; and is susceptible of a considerable polish. The bog rests generally on a stratum of yellow or blue clay, from 1 to 6 feet thick; everywhere beneath the clay, to a depth unknown, lies a mixed mass of clay and limestone gravel. The scenery of the Bog of Allen is monotonous and dismal to a degree quite oppressive; and, in consequence of its being traversed by the Grand canal—that great path of passenger-transit for all classes, from the landed proprietor to the penniless peasant—it is an object better known and more talked of than its repulsive character would seem to promise. "For many miles," says Brewer, "which to the traveller appear 'lengthening as he goes,' few objects shoot above the gloomy plain, and awaken the fatigued attention. In the distance, it is true, the mountains of Wicklow, mingling with the skies of the horizon, suggest hints of the earthly elysium enjoyed by more fortunate tourists in that quarter; but the exercise of fancy excited by this distant prospect, merely increases distaste, by provoking in the mind a strong degree of contrast." Over many a mile, too, not even a distant height or an adjacent human dwelling, or one fruit of cultivation, occurs to relieve the oppressive tedium; and a traveller, who possesses a taste for the beauties of landscape, is, for the moment, glad of such a poor object as an occasional heathy hillock, or the more welcome occurrence of a gravelly ridge to hile from his view the boggy chaos. Much of the better portions of bog near the canal has been cut into turf for the supply of the Dublin market. The miserable habitations of the turf-cutters have long been the subject of remark, and are described by Dr. Walsh, the historian of Dublin, in terms which have drawn the attention and excited the wonder of individuals personally unacquainted with Ireland. "The first care of a turf-cutter," says he, "is to seek a dry bank above the influence of floods; and here he excavates his future habitation to such a depth that little more is visible than the roof. This is sometimes covered with scanty thatch, but oftener with turf pared from the bog, which, as the herbage is upwards, so perfectly assimilates with the surrounding scenery, that the eye would pass over it unnoticed, were it not undecieved by a number of children sallying from a hole on one side, accompanied frequently by the cat, the pig, and the goat, the joint inmates of the bowel; and sometimes a cloud of smoke which, finding no other vent, issues through the roof, which, from its slight texture, is everywhere pervious to it, betrays the habitation." Yet such hideous abodes, such graves of living men, are very far from being peculiar to the Bog of Allen; and may, in numerous parts of Ireland, but especially west of the Shannon, be seen, both singly and in little clusters, entombed in even mere pendicles of bog. Often have we seen them, and often looked till emotion became too painful to be continued; and we have beheld them—as who has not who knows Ireland?—in circumstances where the moss-water trickling down the sides of the hut-excavation was a substitute for the feature of warmth and smoke in Dr. Walsh's picture, and where stern want, or the misery of a famishing human creature nestling among a little straw, was a substitute for the feature of 'the pig and the goat.'

ALLEN (ISLAND OF), a cultivated tract near the southern extremity of the Bog of Allen, 4 miles east-south-east of Rathangan, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3. It has its name of island solely from the circumstance of being wholly surrounded by bog. The surface, on all sides, but especially on the north-west, rises very rapidly from the bog; and consists, for the most part, of a series of abrupt and broken hillocks. On the south-west rises, among other inequalities, the hill of Allen, a steep conical elevation of about 300 feet in altitude. This hill, 'Dun Almhain,' is as stoutly contended for as one of Ossian's localities, as probably any place in Scotland; and is supposed to present the scene of action between Fingal and Cathmor. Macpherson, however, and not Ossian, is regarded as the author; and he is alleged to have taken as the ground-work of his epic, an Irish poem, called Cath Almhain, written by Torne Egis, about the year 1310. The cave of Bran, the tomb of Oscar, Bran's fountain, and other local objects of the poem, are likewise fondly identified with places in the monarch bog of Ireland. The northern edge of the island consists of a stratified and unusually silicified limestone, which is quarried principally as a building-stone; over the next two miles, it consists of limestone gravel, the stones of which are usually veined with Lydian stone; at the base of the hill of Allen, it consists of a species of conglomerate, interstratified with micaceous clay; and the hill of Allen itself consists of amorphous fine-grained greenstone. The Grand canal traverses the north-eastern margin of the island; the Milltown canal traverses the western margin; the village of Robertstown stands on the former; and the small village, called Leap of Allen, stands near the latter, and at the north base of Allen Hill. See KILMAOGUE and ROBERTSTOWN. Three miles west of Robertstown are Ballyteague-castle, and a limestone quarry. The noble family of Allen, originally English, afterwards Dutch, and since the time of Elizabeth, Irish, takes the title of Viscount from the island of Allen.

ALLEN (LOUGH), a large lacustrine expansion in Connaught, variously regarded as the source of the Shannon, and as the first of the chain of lakes into which that river expands. Excepting a portion of the south-west margin, which washes the eastern limit of the co. of Roscommon, the whole lake is within the co. of Leitrim. It extends north and south, and measures between its extreme points, 6½ by 2½ miles. The Slieveerrin and Dowball mountains, which screen it on the east, have a height of from 1,400 to 2,000 feet above sea-level; the Brablieve, Slieve-Corkagh, and Munterkenry mountains, which screen it on the east, and which send off a continuous range of heights to Sligo bay, attain an altitude of about 1,400 feet; and both screens are steep, yet not precipitous, and fall off in skirting slopes to the lake. Though four islets, and various little rocky promontories break the uniformity of the water's surface and outline, only one of these objects, O'Reilly's island, near the foot of the lake, has any bulk or character to challenge notice. The varied shores, the imposing heights, and occasionally the tempestuated waters, unite to form a landscape, which, while decidedly picturesque, is greatly inferior to multitudinous scenes in the mountain districts of Ireland. Though some well-grown groves of fir appear on the little demesne of Mount Allen, near the foot of the lake, and some young but small plantations are rising around several other houses upon the shores, wood is, for such a situation, deplorably scanty, and might, with almost as good an effect upon economy as upon the embellishing of the scenery, be drawn in vast broad sheets far up the mountains. Even tillage upon the slopes has effected few results, and is as unskilful as inert. Though limited cultivation, and scattered cottages, and small farm-houses may be distinguished at intervals all round the lake; and though the little town of Drumshambo at the foot of the hills, near the efflux of the Shannon, shows its cluster of houses and its new church; yet bogs, heaths, rocks, broken escarpments and naked declivities, so greatly predominate, as, in spite of the lake's own amenities, to produce an impression rather of churlish power than of grand beauty. The Lough, though within 6 or 7 miles of the sources of the Shannon's head-streams, and sending off that monarch-river of Ireland in a long progress, through most of Connaught and of Munster to the ocean, lies only 100 feet above sea-level; and it is distinguished quite as much by the tumbling and headlong impetuosity of the streams which fall into it, as by the sleeping quietude of that which it discharges. Tempestuous winds often debauch from the gorges or rush down from the mountains, and toss the lake into a vexed and broken sea of foam and billow. The lake, as to its depth of water, is not only navigable, but has the fame among the vulgar of being in some places unfathomable. Its shores, however, present few tolerable landing-places; and, with the exception of a small dock and quay formed on the west side by the Irish Mining Company for the shipping of coal, they have not been improved by art. From the want of mooring-grounds and places of shelter, combined with the suddenness and frequency of squalls, the lake cannot be navigated without danger, and is far less useful than it will probably soon become when suitable harbours shall be formed. At the head of a narrow bay where the Shannon departs, a canal goes off to form a navigable communication with the river farther down; and here exist a small trading establishment and some conveniences for mooring boats. Close to this place, limestone rock comes down to nearly the water's edge, and has been profitably worked in some large quarries and kilns. The lake possesses the peculiar importance of lying in the midst of the small coal district of Connaught; the Arigna and the Drumshambo divisions of the district being on opposite sides. Improvements in and near the lake recommended by the Commissioners for Improving the Shannon Navigation, will be noticed in other articles. See ARIGNA, DRUMSHAMBO, and SHANNON.

ALLIHIES, a copper mine, and a village, in the parish of Kilnamanagh, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. Post-town, Castletown-Berehaven. Their situation is on Ballydonagan-bay, not far from the point of the long peninsula which screens the west side of Bantry-bay; and their features, as seen from the north-east, blend with the surrounding boldly-contoured country, the neighbouring sea, and the perspective of the Ballinskelligs bay and shores and islands to produce a landscape of great strength and brilliance. The mine is worked by steam and water, and employs from 1,200 to 1,500 men. Its annual produce is from 6,000 to 7,000 tons, and sells for £9 per ton. The ore is conveyed to Swansea for sale; and supplies of timber and other bulky requisites are obtained by sea. An interesting account of the mine occurs on pp. 74—79, Vol. I. of Lady Chatterton's 'Rambles.' The village is only one of a series which are dependent on the mines. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 196. Houses 38. See KILNAMANAGH.

ALL-O. See ALLUA.

ALL-SAINTS, an islet in Lough-Ree, barony of Rathcline, co. Longford, Leinster. Area, about 291 acres. A rich monastery on the islet is alleged to have been founded by St. Kieran in the year 544; and is believed to have been refounded by the family of Dillon of Drumrany. Its property was granted, at the suppression, to Sir Patrick Barnwell. The islet is inhabited and cultivated.

ALL-SAINTS, a parish in the barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies 6 miles west of Londonderry; and contains the village of NEWTOWN-CONYNGHAM; which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, upwards of 4; area, 9,674 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,172; in 1841, 4,280. Houses 711. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,094. Houses 682. The western frontier is part of the shore of Lough Swilly. The land of the parish is, in general, very good; the soil is productive, and experiences some improvement in cultivation; and such bogs as exist are beneficial for fuel.—This parish is ecclesiastically viewed as part of the parish of Taughboyne; yet forms a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Raphoe. Gross income, £105 11s. 4d; nett, £89 5s. Patron, the incumbent of Taughboyne. The church was built previous to 1734; but at what cost is not known. Sittings 250; average attendance 90. Two meeting-houses of the General Assembly, the one formerly Secessional, and the other of the Synod of Ulster, are attended by respectively 400 and 180. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,040; and is officiated in on every alternate Sunday by one of two clergymen, who officiate also in the chapels of Taughboyne and Raymoghly. In 1834, 762 of the inhabitants were members of the Established church, 1,784 were Presbyterians, and 1,596 were Roman Catholics. In the same year, 5 day-schools—one of which was aided with £20 annually from subscription, and another with £2 from subscription and £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's benefaction—had on their books 116 boys and 63 girls; and a Sunday school had 24 boys and 16 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a school at Newtown-Conyngnam.

ALLUA, or ALLO (THE), a small but romantic river, partly in the barony of Upper Connello, co. Limerick, but chiefly in that of Duhallow, co. Cork, Munster. It rises among the Mullaghareirk mountains, and pursues a south-easterly course of 7 miles, and a southerly course of 9 miles, to the Blackwater, about a mile above Clonmeen. The river, if measured in its sinuosities, has a much longer run than we have stated; it is abruptly and almost constantly, though never sweepingly, sinuous; it is impetuous and fitful, and descends for the most part a mountain-path; and it washes the town of Kanturk, and receives there its principal affluent, the Dallua. Spenser sings this river, but in a style which, however suitable to a poet, would ill befit a topographer; for he makes it tumble from mountains which are some miles distant from any part of it,—the mountains of Slievegher. Another poet more correctly sings:

"And Allo, by fam'd Spenser styled the strong,
Impetuous from her mountain rolls along;
Kanturk's proud ruins soften in her course,
And joins her sister but with half her force."

ALLUA, or LUA, a lake formed by the expansion of the river Lee, and terminating a mile west of Inchegeelagh, co. Cork, Munster. It is about 3 miles in length, but, in many places, is inconsiderable in breadth. The new road to Bantry winds beautifully along the shore; and the Berehaven line of railway, as projected by the Commissioners, will pass along the northern margin. The scenery of the lake is mountainous and naturally imposing; but has been grievously impaired, and stripped almost to savageness, by the destruction of woods which sheeted its shores and islets.

ALLUYN, a lake in the barony of Ballintobber, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It is situated half-a-mile north of Fallinlogh; measures $\frac{1}{2}$ mile in length, and half-a-mile in breadth; extends northward and southward; and discharges its superfluous water eastward, by way of Castleren, to the river Suck.

ALLYKOYS. See ALLIHIES.

ALMORITIA, BALLYMORAN, or MORANSTOWN, a parish on the western border of the barony of Rathconrath, $\frac{2}{3}$ miles north-north-east of Ballymore, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 3; area, 2,205 acres. Pop., in 1831, 675; in 1841, 700. Houses 122. The surface declines to the west; and is drained by an affluent of the Inny. The land is various in quality; and averages rather less than 30s. per acre in annual value. The road from Mullingar to Athlone passes through the interior.—Almoritia is a rectory in the dio. of Meath; and, jointly with the rectory of PIERCETOWN, [which see.] constitutes the benefice of Almoritia. Length, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles; breadth, 3. Tithe composition of Almoritia parish, £70. Gross income of the benefice, £231; nett, £194 6s. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1815, by means of a loan of £533 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 60; average attendance, between 30 and 40. The Roman Catholic chapel is at Ballinacurra in Piercetown. In 1834, the Protestants of Almoritia parish amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 678; the Protestants of the union to 64, and the Roman Catholics to 1,731. A hedge-school, the only place of education in Almoritia, was, in 1834, attended by no more than about 12 children.

ALNAPEST, a short range of mountain, in the south-west corner of the barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It forms part of the south screen of the river Finn, and of one of its affluents, and is situated 15 miles west by south of Lifford.

ALTAHONEY, a mountain near the central water-shed of the co. Londonderry, Ulster. It seems half calcareous; is very full of white calcareous spar, which the natives have mistaken for silver ore; and yields, in some places, an excellent material for tombstones, window-stools, and other works of coarse marble. Out of some flags of this fine limestone, the Rev. G. V. Sampson, the author of the Agricultural Survey of the county, took large cubes of martial pyrites.

ALTYMASS. See ATTYMASS.

AMATRAS, a Roman Catholic parish, in the dio. of Clogher. Post-town, Rockcorry. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

AMBROSETOWN, a parish nearly in the centre of the barony of Bargy, 6 miles south by west of Taghmon, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains the village of TULLYCANNA; which see. Length, $\frac{2}{3}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,197 acres. Pop., in 1831, 880; in 1841, 600. Houses 131. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 567. Houses 103. The townlands of Rochestown and Ballineal are included in the ecclesiastical parish; so that the pop. of that parish, in 1831, was 1,045. The surface declines to the south; and is drained by a rivulet which empties itself into Ballyteigue bay, distant 2 miles. All the land is good; and some of it is considered to be of the first quality in the county.—Ambrosstown is a rectory in the dio. of Ferns; and forms part of the benefice of DUNCORMUCK; which see. Tithe composition, £138 9s. 3d. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 738; the Protestants of the extra-parochial townlands to 7, and the Roman Catholics to 151. Two schools—one of which was aided with the use of two acres of land—were attended, in 1834, by 61 boys and 39 girls.

ANACLOAN, or ANNAGHCLONE, a parish in the northern half of the barony of Upper Iveagh, 4 miles south-east by south of Banbridge, co. Down, Ulster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 6,544 acres, 1 rood, 34 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,426; in 1841, 3,423. Houses 654. The surface declines north-westward; and is drained by the Bann. The land, though of second-rate quality, is in excellent cultivation.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Drogheda. Tithe composition, £188 3s. 8d. Gross income, £352 6s. 2d.; nett, £310 15s. Patron, the diocesan. A curate is employed at a salary of £69 4s. 7d. The date and cost of the church's erection are unknown. Sittings 200; average attendance, from 30 to 50. Two meeting-houses of the General Assembly, the one formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and the other of the Secession Synod, are each attended by about 200; and the Roman Catholic chapel, by about 500. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 194 Churchmen, 1,506 Presbyterians, and 1,696 Roman Catholics; and 7 day-schools had on their books 269 boys and 159 girls. Two of the schools belonged respectively to the National Board and the Hibernian Society, and two were respectively parochial and classical.

ANADORN, or BLACKSTAFF (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Kinelarty, co. Down, Ulster. It runs a south-south-westerly course of about 5 miles, to the inner bay of Dundrum; and, immediately above its embouchure, is spanned by a bridge.

ANADORN, an ancient but decayed village, in the parish of Loughanishland, barony of Kinelarty, co. Down, Ulster. Pop., in 1831, 93; in 1841, not specially returned. It stands on the stream just noticed, to which it gives name; and is about 4 miles west of Downpatrick. An eminence in its vicinity, called Castle Hill, was the site of the principal seat of the ancient sept of Mac Artanes. This sept held sway over the western part of the barony of Kinelarty, the whole of the barony of Dufferin, and the southern part of the barony of Castleragh. "They were," say the Editors of 'the Ancient and the Present State of the County of Down,' published in 1744,—"They were neighbours to the Maginnes, and sprung from the same head, viz., from Conall the son of Coalbhaig, who is said to have been the hundred-and-thirty-second King of Ireland, about the year of Christ 337." A very pretty mcestry, and right stoutly vouched! Assigning 30 years to each stalwart Milesian, as the average period of a reign, the first of the Irish Kings whose long descent of blood circled in the veins of the Mac Artanes must have been contemporary with Adam!! Near the castle is or was a cairn, enclosing a chamber of 60 feet in diameter, whence were taken earthen urns, containing ashes of human bones.

ANAFANE, a glen in the barony of Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It extends in the vicinity of Glendalough; and is the locality of important lead mines. A new road, joining the Great Dublin and Wexford line by Tullow, traverses the glen.

ANAHILT, or ANNAHILT, a parish, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Hillsborough, and partly in the barony of Kinelarty, but chiefly in that of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area of the Kinelarty section, 708 acres; of the Iveagh section, 6,009 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,755; in 1841, 3,551. Houses 650. Pop. of the Kinelarty section, in 1831, 383; in 1841, 432. Houses 79. Pop. of the Iveagh section, in 1831, 3,372; in 1841, 3,119. Houses 571. The surface consists, for the most part, of hillocks varying from 20 to 60 acres each in area, and of intervening flats small in extent when arable, and somewhat less contracted when boggy. The hills, as seen from one point of view, sweep round in the form of an amphitheatre; they are steepest on the north side, and, along with the general surface, are drained northward; and they present, in the undulating lines of their summit, a pleasing perspective behind a soft landscape. Of the whole parochial area, 465 acres consist of bogs and lakes, 175 of irreclaimable rocks, and the remainder of as good arable land, on an average, as any in the county. The chief lakes are AGHY and ERNE: which see. Slates, excellent in colour, size, and durability, have long been quarried in the townland of Cluntogh. Greywacke and schistose rocks prevail; and are traversed by numerous dykes of basalt, of the same appearance and composition as the great basaltic field of Antrim. The cemetery around the church is of great antiquity and curious interest. A fort which surrounds it is the innermost of four enclosures, which include at least nine acres, and slope to the east in a regular glacis. It had formerly a morass on three sides; and must, previous to the invention of cannon, have been a place of great strength. To this post Sir Phelim O'Neil retreated, in 1641, when repulsed at Lisburn by Sir John Rawdon. Within the fort have been found several querns, a handsome grenade, and a six-pound cannon-ball. Numerous tiny forts on the hills, bays, for the most part, only one trench and ditch; and are of the kind so common on the east coast of Ireland. The parish is traversed by the roads from Downpatrick to Drogheda, Hillsborough, and Lisburn, and by that from Lisburn to Rathfriland.—Anahilt is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Drogheda. Tithe composition, £367 5s. 4d. Gross income, £501 5s. 4d.; nett, £412 17s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate is employed at a stipend of £70. The church was built in 1741; and received, in 1768, the addition of a tower, at the expense of the first marquis of Downshire. Sittings 150; average attendance 230. A Presbyterian meeting-house at Lough Aghry, is attended by 1,500. A second Presbyterian meeting-house, called that of Anahilt, actually stands within Hillsborough. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 821 Churchmen, 2,812 Presbyterians, 4 other Protestant dissenters, and 199 Roman Catholics. The Rev. John Dubordieu, the author of the Agricultural Surveys of Down and of Antrim, was rector of Anahilt when he published these works; and, in an account of his parish which appears in Mason's Parochial Survey, he says: "It is but a very few years since the parish of Anahilt was claimed by any Roman Catholic clergyman, as there was only one family of that denomination in it." Five schools—each of two of which was aided with £20 a-year from a legacy—were aggregately attended, in 1834, by 273 boys and 166 girls.

ANAKISSY, a Roman Catholic parish, in the dio. of Cloyne and Ross. Post-town, Mallow. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

ANAMULT. See ANNAMULT.

ANAVERNA, the beautifully situated residence of the late Baron McClelland, 4 miles north of Dundalk, and on the northern border of the county of Louth, Leinster.

ANBALLY, a village in the parish of Kilmoylan, barony of Clare, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the Clare river about 12 miles north-north-east of the town of Galway. In its vicinity are the ruin of an ancient castle, and a remarkable specimen of the curious periodical lakes of the country called turloughs. This lake is formed by an expansion of the river, and bears the emphatic name of Turloughmore. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 224; in 1841, 229. Houses 34.

ANDERROW, a brief chain of small and scenically uninteresting lakes, in Cunnemara, co. Galway, Connaught. They lie 7 or 8 miles west of Oughterard, and are passed by a tourist on his way to Clifden.

ANDREW. (ST.) See DUBLIN.

ANDREWS. (ST.) See INCH.

ANDREWS (ST.), an union or united parish, in the barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It consists of the parishes of BALLYHALBERT, BALLYWALTER, and INNISHARGY [see these articles]; and lies between Strangford Lough and the sea, comprehending the most easterly land in Ireland. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 12,907 acres, and 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 7,618; in 1841, 7,590. Houses 1,428. The parishes were perpetually united by act of parliament in the second year of Queen Anne. The abbey of St. Andrew de Stokes, whence the union has its name, was founded by the celebrated John de Courcy, first Lord Kinsale, for Benedictine monks; and made a cell to the abbey of Lonley, in Normandy. Its popular name was the Black Abbey. At the general suppression, it was seized by the O'Neils; and, after their rebellion, it was successively vested in the crown, granted to Lord Claneboys, transmitted by assignment to Viscount Ardes, and, finally, annexed to the see of Armagh.—This union is a triad of vicarages in the dio. of Down. Vicarial title composition, £392 6s. 8d. Gross income, £469 16s. 8d.; nett, £404 6s. 11l. Patron, the archbishop of Armagh. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £784 13s. 5d.; and they are appropriated to the see of Armagh, and held under lease from the archbishop by Francis Savage, Esq., of Glasstry. A curate is employed at a stipend of £75. The church is situated in Innishargy parish, in the centre of the union; was built in 1704; and has since been repeatedly repaired and improved at the expense of the parishioners. Sittings 200; average attendance 80. Three meeting-houses of the General Assembly are attended by respectively 380, 300, and from 80 to 100; an Independent meeting-house by 350; and a Presbyterian Remonstrant meeting-house by 100. In 1834, the inhabitants were 384 Churchmen, 4,600 Presbyterians, 1,493 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,307 Roman Catholics; and 10 day-schools and 2 infant-schools had on their books 311 boys and 229 girls. Three of the day-schools were each aided with £8, and one with £6, from the National Board; one, with £7 from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £5 from Lord Dufferin; and each of the two infant schools, with £10 from Miss Keown.

ANEY, ANY, or KNOCKANEY, a parish in the south of the barony of Small County, 2½ miles south-west by south of Hospital, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 9,248 acres. The surface lies near the Galtees or southern exterior of the basin of the Shannon; and is drained northward by some nascent tributaries of that monarch river. The land is in general good; and the height, called the hill of Knockaney, is as remarkable for its fertility, as for being a conspicuous object in the general landscape. Lough Gur, a fine sheet of water, amid pleasant scenery, and possessing some stirring recollections, partly belongs to the parish. See GUR (LOUGH). The village of Knockaney occupies a pleasant site on the banks of the Commogue. Area, 25 acres. Pop., in 1841, 407. Houses 69. The antiquities are ruins of two of the Earl of Desmond's strong castles, and of an Augustinian abbey for Eremites, founded in the reign of Henry II. This monastic building—called strictly, Monaster-na-Aney, but generally Monaster-na-Maig—possesses much of the kind of celebrity which belonged to establishments of its class; and is one of the most remarkable in Munster as to both its history and its architecture.—Aney is a vicarage in the dio. of Emyl. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £286 13s. 4d., and the rectorial for £573 6s. 8d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to J. D. Freeman, Esq., of Castlecor, co. Cork. Aney vicarage, and the vicarages of HOSPITAL, BALLINAMONA, DOONEMORE, KILFRUSH, BALLINLOUGH, and BALLINARD, [see these articles,] constitute the benefice of Aney. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 8. Gross income, £650 7s. 0½d.; nett, £590 1s. 10½d. Patron, Lord Kenmare. The church is situated in Aney; and is so old that the date and cost of its erection are unknown. Sittings 100; average attendance 39. Two Roman Catholic chapels in Aney have each two officiates, and respectively an attendance of 500 and 2,000. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Hospital, Ballinard, and Doonemore. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 45, and the Roman Catholics to 4,687; the Protestants of the union to 70, and the Roman Catholics to 14,007. In the same year, 3 day-schools in the parish—one of which was aided with £12 a-year from the Count de Salis, and another with £5 from the parish and £10 from the National Board—had on their books 237 boys and 138 girls; and jointly with other five schools in the union, had 375 boys and 215 girls. In 1840, the National Board salaried one school in Aney with £12, and granted £101 toward the building and fitting up of a boys' school and a girls' school.

ANHID, or ATHNETT, a small parish in the barony of Coshma, 1½ mile south of Croom, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 981 acres. Pop., in 1831, 475; in 1841, 493. Houses 76. The parish is situated on the Maig; and its land is fertile, and forms part of a rich, though altogether soft, expanse of scenery.—Anhid is a prebend in the cathedral church of St. Mary's, Limerick; and has, from time immemorial, been attached in commendam to the bishopric. Gross income, £35; nett, £33 5s. Patron, the Crown. The parish is without cure of souls, and has neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the inhabitants were all Roman Catholics; and a hedge-school was attended by 18 boys and 11 girls.

ANKETELL'S GROVE, an embellished and extensively wooded demesne, traversed by the Mountain river, 4 miles north of Monaghan, and 1 south of Emyvale, co. Monaghan, Ulster. Its proprietor is W. Anketell, Esq.

ANNA. See ANNAGH.

ANNABUOY, or AVONBUOY (THE), a river of the baronies of Kinnalea and Kericcushy, co. Cork, Munster. Its head-streams rise partly on the western boundary of Kinnalea, and partly beyond that boundary; and the river runs 15 miles eastward to the head of the Crosshaven estuary of Cork harbour, at a point about 10 miles south-east of Cork city. In consequence of its washing the village or city-abortions of CARRIGALINE, [see that article,] it is sometimes called the Carrigaline river. Its name of Avonbuoy, or corruptedly and popularly Annabuoy, means 'the yellow river'; and alludes to a peculiar tinge in its waters during a freshet. Its basin extends parallel with that of the Lee; and, in common with it, descends directly eastward toward Cork harbour. Though of considerable breadth where affected with the tide, the river is, in two or three places, easily fordable at low water, and admits of navigation only by small boats. Yet its little estuary or creek affords good anchorage for even large vessels. Five ships of war under the command of Sir Francis Drake, being closely pursued by the Spanish fleet, ran a short way up the creek to a place now called Drake's Pool, but then named Tubberavoid, 'the well of safe anchorage'; and there they lay landlocked and completely concealed, while their pursuers sailed up Cork harbour, made a vain search, and gave up the chase.

ANNACARTHY, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cashel and Emly. Post-town, Tipperary. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

ANNACLOY (THE), or BALLINAHINCH, a river of the baronies of Lower Iveagh, Kinelearty, Dufferin and Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It rises from four different and lacustrine sources, at the mean distance of 3 or 4 miles south-east of Hillsborough; carries off the superfluous waters of Lough Achris, Lough Erne, and some other small lakes, and pursues a serpentine course of 18 or 20 miles south-eastward by Ballinahinch, Kilmore, and other places, to Lough Strangford, at a point $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Killyleagh. An expansion of it, before it becomes lost in the Lough, is called the Quoile river, measures $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in extreme length, and about 1 in mean breadth, and is so intricately studded with islands as to be a sheer labyrinth of land and water. Annacloy, whence the river has its name, overlooks its right bank, 5 miles west-south-west of Killyleagh.

ANNACOTTY, a village in the territory which formerly constituted the rural part of the co. of the city of Limerick, Munster. It stands 3 miles east by north of the city, on the mail-road to Dublin, and on the left bank of the Mulchair, a mile above that river's confluence with the Shannon. Pop. not specially returned.

ANNACURRA AND KILLAVY, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Ferns. Post-town, Tinnehely. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

ANNADUFF, or ANNAGHDUFF, a parish lying in almost equal but contiguous parts, within the baronies of Leitrim and Mohill, co. Leitrim, Connaught. The Leitrim section contains the village of DRUMSNA; and the Mohill section contains that of DRUMOD; see these articles. Length of the parish, 7 miles; breadth, 2; area, 10,970 acres,—of which 1,152 acres are under water. Area of the Leitrim section, 5,329 acres,—of which 425 acres are under water. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 5,871; in 1841, 6,162. Houses 1,039. Pop. of the rural districts of the Leitrim section, in 1831, 2,520; in 1841, 2,512. Houses 418. Pop. of the rural districts of the Mohill section, in 1831, 2,762; in 1841, 2,949. Houses 501. The Shannon and one of its lacustrine expansions stretch south-south-eastward along the western boundary; and a small tributary of the monarch river runs southward along the east. Excepting about 250 acres of bog, the land is all arable, and of tolerably fair quality. The aspect of the country, though not more undulated, tumulated, or otherwise diversified, than the pleasingly contoured yet dull and inexpressive districts around, is richer in cultivation, warmer with wood, and gayer with general embellishment; and it borrows much wealth in the gentler properties of landscape, from the intricate tracery of bay and creek and peninsula along the margin of the expanded Shannon. The ancient church was that of an abbey, alleged, with the usual recklessness of evidence or carelessness in phraseology, to have been founded in 766. The present church occupies a beautiful site near the Shannon, 5 miles south-east of Carrick-on-Shannon.—Annaduff is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Ardagh. Tithe composition, £262 10s. Gross income, £635 1s. 6d.; nett, £569 0s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £150. The parish-church was built in 1820, by means of a loan of £1,476 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; average attendance 180. A chapel-of-ease in Drumsna, 5 miles from the parish-church, was built at the private expense of Francis Nisbett, Esq. of Derrycarr, and is served alternately by the rector and the curate. Average attendance 80. A Roman Catholic chapel, and a school-house used as one, have two officiates; and are attended by respectively 1,100 and 600 persons. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 583, and the Roman Catholics to 5,536; and 9 day-schools and 2 Sunday schools were attended respectively by 389 boys and 175 girls, and by 53 boys and 36 girls. One of the day-schools was aided with £8 from the London Hibernian Society; one with £8 from the Ardagh Society, and £2 from the rector; one with £10 from the Ardagh Society, and £10 in money or substance from other quarters; one was a classical school; and the others were hedge-schools. In 1840, the National Board salaried a school in Lisduff with £15, and two schools in Drumsna with respectively £15 and £7 6s. 8d. In 1842, the Annaduff Loan Fund had a capital of £836, and circulated £2,712 in 1,009 loans; and from the date of its formation till the close of 1842, it circulated £22,873 in 7,335 loans, cleared a nett profit of £129, and expended for charitable purposes £73.

ANNAGARRY HILL, an inconspicuous yet conspicuous height, near the head of the Gweedore estuary, in the district of the Rosses, co. Donegal, Ulster. It has an altitude of only 338 feet above sea-level, and derives all its importance from being the loftiest ground amid an intricate and vast expanse of lake and bog, of sea and land,—a maze of islands, watery belts, and sheets of moss, silent, sterile, and oppressively monotonous.

ANNAGASSON, a village in the parish of Drumcar and barony of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. It occupies a pleasant site on the beach of Dundalk bay, at the embouchure of the confluent rivulets Dee and Glyde, 8 miles south of Dundalk. Between it and Dundalk is a charming drive around the curvature of the bay. The rivulets which fall into the sea at the village, are more remarkable for the injurious effects of their stagnant waters than for the beauty of their scenery; yet they contribute to utility by forming, at their embouchure, a navigable creek or natural little harbour. The harbour contains a pier and quay, which were erected, and are maintained at the sole expense of R. Thompson, Esq., the proprietor of the circumjacent estate; it has about 9 feet water in high tides; but, at low water, it looks out upon an expanse of dry sand 2 miles broad.

The pier, though in good repair, requires to be lengthened. Fishing craft are allowed to lie at it free of toll; and sailing vessels pay a toll of 5s. to the proprietor. In the vicinity are Annagasson-house and corn-mills. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1831, 235; in 1841, 193. Houses 37.

ANNAGELIFFE, a parish in the barony of Upper Loughree, 1 mile north-east of Cavan, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length, 34 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 8,260 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,341; in 1841, 3,808. Houses 641. The surface is softly featured, and declines to the north. The land is so very various that no statement can be made of its general or aggregate character.—Annageliffe is a vicarage in the dio. of Kilmore; and, jointly with that of Urney, constitutes the benefice of Urney and Annageliffe. See URNEY. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £103 13s. 5d. The rectorial tithes are partly appropriate and partly impropriate: the former are compounded for £52 1s. 4d., and belong to the dean of Kilmore; and the latter for £62 2s. 2½d., and belong to Messrs. Walsh and Everard. The Roman Catholic chapel, situated at Stragolla, is averagely attended by 620; and, in common with two chapels in Urney, has three officiates. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 493 Churchmen, 4 Presbyterians, and 4,075 Roman Catholics; and a school of the Society for Discountenancing Vice, at Drumkeen, a London Ladies' Hibernian Society's school at Drumkeen, a National school at Corlurgan, and 4 pay-schools, had aggregated on their books 284 boys and 141 girls.

ANNAGH, an island in the parish of Kilcommon, and barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. Its extreme length is upwards of 2½ miles, and its mean breadth is about 1 mile. It lies in Achill Sound; extends north and south, and, at its nearest points, is 3½ miles east of Achill, 1½ north of Corran Achill, less than half-a-mile east of the mainland of Erris, and about half-a-mile south-east of Innisbegil. The narrow between it and the mainland has the name of Annagh Sound. The island partakes of the same wild, pastoral character which pervades Achill and the greater part of Erris.

ANNAGH, a small island in Lough Conn, barony of Trawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is situated in the upper part of the lake, about 4½ miles south-west by west of Ballina, and 9½ south-south-west of Killalla, and contributes some features to a decidedly picturesque landscape. See CONN (LOUGH).

ANNAGH, a small peninsula, popularly but quite erroneously called an island, in the district of the Mullet, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It projects from the west coast of the Mullet, at a point 5½ miles south-south-west of Erris Head, and forms the south screen of the landlocked natural harbour of PORTAFRANKA: which see. It has an area of about 300 acres, and is connected with the mainland by a very narrow isthmus of sand. Mr. Nimmo recommended the construction, in the bight of Annagh, of a small pier which should cost £1,000; and pronounced the place the only suitable position for one on all the west coast of the Mullet. "A fishing-village here," he suggests also, "would be within a couple of miles of the rising towns of Binghamstown and Belmullet, and of course most conveniently situated for communication with the interior."

ANNAGH, an extensive bog, partly in the half barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway, but chiefly in the barony of Castlereagh, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It extends 4½ miles south-south-eastward from a point 2½ miles west of Castlereagh to a point half-a-mile north-east of Ballymoe; and comprehends an area of 4,404 English acres. This statement, however, as well as our further notice of the morass, refers to an expanse which bears the conjoint name of the Annagh and Willsbrook bogs. The boundary on the north is the road from Clough to Castlereagh; on the east and south, the river Suck; and on the west, the Ballybhaigue river. The average depth of the bogs is 20 feet. "Their surface," says Mr. Griffith, "is in all parts very considerably elevated above the immediate discharge for the water; consequently no difficulty can arise in draining them;" and he estimates the cost of reclaiming them at £5,510.

ANNAGH, a small lake on the boundary between the barony of Tinnehinch, Queen's co., and the baronies of Geashil and Ballybay, King's co., Leinster. Area, 207 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches. It is situated about 6 miles south of Tullamore, and 7 north-west of Mountmellick. It receives the drainage of about 4,000 acres of bog; and sends off its superfluous waters by the Clodagh, a stream which makes some picturesque falls within the demesne of the Earl of Charleville, and after a north-easterly run of 15 miles falls into the Brusna, 2 miles below Ballycumber. The lake is, for the most part, only from 5 to 8 feet deep; and it has in general a boggy bottom, interspersed with innumerable roots of trees.

ANNAGH a village in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on one of the head-streams of the river Awbeg, on the road between Liscarroll and Charleville, 2 miles north-east of Liscarroll, and 5 south-west of Charleville. Most of its site and the whole of a large tract of country immediately circumjacent, were anciently a wet and dismal bog, and were, at great expense, drained, reclaimed, and charmingly transmutated into corn-fields and forest. A fortalice stood on the village's site; and, from its position in the centre of the morass, was deemed impregnable. In the wars of 1641, it was garrisoned during four years, at the expense of Sir Philip Perceval, Bart.; but, in 1645, Lord Castleconnell, who then commanded the Irish army, 5,000 strong, captured it by treachery, and put the whole of its garrison to the sword. His motive for so sanguinary a deed is said to have been revenge for Sir Philip Perceval's having refused him his daughter in marriage previous to the commencement of the war. About the middle of last century, the Earl of Egmont, to whom the property belonged, destroyed the castle, built the village, and introduced to the quondam scene of carnage the peaceful and profitable arts of the linen manufacture. Pop., not specially returned.

ANNAGH, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Costello, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains part of the town of BALLYHAUNIS: which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 3; area, 20,315 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,348; in 1841, 7,904. Houses 1,454. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 7,635. Houses 1,409. The surface extends to the southern limit of the river system of the Moy; and is drained northward by nascent feeders of that system's chief river and its lakes. Bog constitutes by far the larger part of the surface, yet the general quality of the arable land is good. The interior is traversed eastward by the road from Castlebar to Tulsick and Strokestown. An abbey in the parish, still occupied by some friars, though existing as but a fragmentary ruin, will be noticed in the article on Ballyhaunis. The chief seats are Holywell and Logboy.—Annagh is a rectory in the dio. of Tuam; and forms part of the benefice of KILTULLAGH: which see. Tithe composition, £194 19s. 11d. Public worship is conducted every Sabbath evening at the curate's private residence in Ballyhaunis. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Tulrahan and Ballyhaunis have an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,200, and from 1,600 to 1,700; and, in common with two private houses in the parish, at which considerable congregations attend, they have four officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 64, and the Roman Catholics to 7,310; and eight pay-schools, at Tulrahan, Drimbawn, Ballyhaunis, Coolnafarna, Adarig, and Ballybane, were aggregated attended by 393 boys and 234 girls. In 1840, the National Board granted £22 13s. 4d. toward the building of a school-house at Polacapiel or Logboy.

ANNAGH, a well-wooded demesne, in the barony of Tyaquin, about 8 miles south-east of Tuam, co. Galway, Connought. The proprietor, Bodkin, Esq., has drawn some notice as a representative of the county in parliament.

ANNAGH, a bog on the southern border of the barony of Trughenackmy, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south by west of Castle-Island, co. Kerry, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,069 acres. It lies chiefly in a hollow on the north side of the Flesk, where that stream enters the general valley of the Maine; and, excepting a part which ascends the skirts of Drumheltane-hill, and possesses considerable firmness, it is a spongy, saturated swamp. Though but one-third of a mile from the Flesk, it does not visibly communicate with that river; but seems to send off all its drainage by three sluggish brooks, which, uniting beyond Annaghmore, run $\frac{1}{2}$ mile northward to the Maine. The average depth of the bog is 15 feet; its elevation above sea-level at high water is from 130 to 220 feet; and the cost of reclaiming it, as estimated by Mr. Nimmo, would be £2,187 12s. 5d.

ANNAGH, ANNA, ST. ANNA, or BLENNERVILLE, a parish, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Tralee, and partly in the barony of Corkaguiney, but chiefly in that of Trughenackmy, co. Kerry, Munster. The Trughenackmy section contains the village of BLENNERVILLE: which see. The Corkaguiney section is not noticed in the census of 1831. Length and breadth of the parish, exclusive of boggy and mountain tracts, 5 miles by 2; entire area, 13,735 acres; area of the Corkaguiney section, 4,082 acres. Pop. of the parish, in 1841, 3,659. Houses 540. Pop. of the rural districts of the Trughenackmy section in 1831, 1,980; in 1841, 2,820. Houses 448. The parish extends along the southern shore of the bay of Tralee; and is traversed west-south-westward, and near the shore, by the post-road from Tralee to Dingle. About three-fifths of the whole area are boggy, mountainous, and waste land.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ardfeir and Aghadoc; and forms part of the benefice of BALINABLAGHISH: which see. Tithe composition, £332 6s. 1d. The church was built in 1818, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 180. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700, and is served by two officiates, who serve also the chapels of Tralee and Ratass. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 256, and the Roman Catholics to 3,184; and three free-schools had on their books 170 boys and 110 girls. One of the schools was supported from Erasmus Smith's fund; two were supported by the Roman Catholic clergyman; and another free-school, temporarily suspended, was under the superintendence of the resident Protestant clergyman. In 1840, the National Board salaried a boys' school and a girls' school at Blennerville, with respectively £13 10s. and £8.

ANNAGH, a parish partly in the barony of Lower Loughree, and partly in that of Tullaghgarvey, co. Cavan, Ulster. The Tullaghgarvey section contains the village of REDHILL, and the Loughree section contains part of the town of BELTUBET: see these articles. Area, 19,145 acres,—of which 837 acres are under water. Area of the Loughree section, 6,805 acres; of the Tullaghgarvey section, 12,340 acres. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 12,269; in 1841, 13,071. Houses 2,283. Pop. of the rural districts of the Loughree section, in 1831, 3,748; in 1841, 3,980. Houses 720. Pop. of the Tullaghgarvey section, in 1831, 7,074; in 1841, 7,471. Houses 1,304. The land is, to a great extent, rocky; and elsewhere it so sweepingly varies from very good to very poor that no general statement of its quality can be made. The surface is drained northward by the Erne, and its affluent the Woodford; and, over a considerable aggregate area, is a patchwork of loughlet, turlough, marsh, and bog, occasioned by the overflowing and stagnancy of the Erne. As the river, immediately after passing the parochial and co. boundary, expands into Lough Erne, and at the same time has occasionally itself a navigable depth of water, it presents a barge communication to the town of Belturbet, and an important facility for exchanging agricultural produce for timber and coals. The chief seats are Annagh-house, near the small lake of Annagh, and a mile from Butler's bridge; Ashgrove, on the Erne, close to Baker's bridge; Sugarloaf; Erne-hill; and Castle-Saunderson. This parish is altogether a civil district; yet very nearly coincides with the two ecclesiastical parishes of Belturbet and Killoughter, or Annagh-West and Annagh-East, which had, in 1831, a pop. of 12,535, and were reputed, previous to the Ordnance Survey, to have jointly an area of 24,062 acres, 1 rood, $1\frac{1}{2}$ perches. See next articles.

ANNAGH-EAST, or KILLOUGHTER, comprehends 47 townlands, situated, as the name implies, in the eastern part of Annagh. Length, $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $3\frac{1}{2}$; area, 9,103 acres, 1 rood, 34½ perches. Pop., in 1831, 6,430.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £15; glebe, £20. Gross income, £65; nett, £62 8s. 9d. Patron, the incumbent of Annagh-West. The church was built in 1814, at a cost of £1,107 13s. 10½d., partly gifted and partly lent by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; average attendance 70. A Primitive Wesleyan Methodist meeting-house is averagely attended by 34, and a Roman Catholic chapel by 1,225; and the latter has, for itself, one officiate. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 691, and the Roman Catholics to 5,672; and 11 day-schools had on their books 295 boys and 183 girls. One of the schools was aided with £8 a-year from the Society for Discourteaning Vice; and the others were hedge-schools at Shaunawood, Neddyach, Mulkenavra, Redhills, Corkessin, Drummerack, Drumbrahan, Treehoo, Kilduff, and Ardumma. In 1840, the National Board salaried a boys' school and a girls' school at Shanna with each £8; and granted £74 3s. 4d. toward the erection of a school at Keelagh, and the same sum toward the erection of one at Killealeck.

ANNAGH-WEST, or BELTUBET, is, as its name implies, the western section of the civil parish of Annagh. Length, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $5\frac{1}{2}$; area, 14,838 acres, 3 roods, 7 perches. Pop., in 1831, 6,105.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £369 4s. 7½d.; glebe, £581 18s. 4½d. Gross income, £931 3s.; nett, £863 8s. 10d. Patron, Lord Farnham. The incumbent holds also the benefice of Urney in this dio., and the sinecure precentorships of Elphin cathedral, and St. Patrick's, Dublin. Two curates are employed at stipends of respectively £90, with the use of the glebe-house, and £75. The church is a very old building; and was improved and enlarged in 1813 and 1828, by means of loans of £923 1s. 6d., and £800 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings about 700; average attendance 500. A meeting-house of the Wesleyan Methodists, and one of the Primitive Wesleyan Methodists, are attended, the former by 30 and the latter by 150. A Roman Catholic chapel at Drusmaloe is attended by 1,320; and has an officiate for itself. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,240 Churchmen, 18 Presbyterians, and 4,011 Roman Catholics; and 11 day-schools had on their books 374 boys and 255 girls. The school at Drumloor had £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice; that at Drumlaney had £8 from the National Board; that at Parsey was in connection with the Kildare Street Society; a girls' school had grants from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society; and a boys' and girls' school had £20 from Erasmus Smith's fund, £10 of gratuity, and a house and piece of ground. In 1840, the National Board gave £15 toward the fitting up of a school at Strahagland, and salaried it with £11 5s.

ANNAGHCLOWE. See ANACLOAN.

ANNAGHDOWN, a parish on the western border of the barony of Clare, 7½ miles north of Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 23,730 acres,—of which 4,253 acres are under water, chiefly in Lough Corrib. Pop., in 1831, 6,093; in 1841, 7,108. Houses 1,180. The surface extends along the east side of the lower part of Lough Corrib; and is drained into the lake by inconsiderable streams. Though promising, as part of the far-flaunting and beautiful lough's shores, to possess much fine scenery, it is totally destitute of character, and tires the mind by alternations of tameness and of flat and broken sterility. Even the soil in the aggregate is of indifferent quality, and fails to interest the prosaic agriculturist. In prelate and monastic associations, however, the parish, for a rural and secluded one, is singularly prominent. Annaghdawn was the seat of an early Irish bishopric, and flung the shadow of its mitre upon Galway, the capital of Connaught. The merging of its diocese, in 1324, into that of Tuam, occasioned Galway to be governed, during 60 years, by vicars of the united sees, and then prompted that singular anomaly in ecclesiastical government by which the town has ever since been distinguished. See GALWAY. The monastic institutions of Annaghdawn were an abbey, or more probably a Culdee establishment, said to have been founded prior to the seventh century, and presided over by St. Meldan; a nunnery, alleged to have been founded by St. Brendan, and to have, in 1238, acquired the ornament of a steeple; the parent or dominant Franciscan friary of Connaught and Ulster; an abbey for white canons of the Premonstratensian order; and the college of St. Brendan, for the support of four priests. The parish is traversed north-north-eastward by the road from Galway to Ballinrobe; and has several villages or hamlets, of which Shankhill and Aughelogan are the chief. Annaghdawn is a vicarage in the dio. of Tuam. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £415 7s. 8d., and the rectorial for £138 9s. 3d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Major Kirwan of Castle-Hacket. This vicarage and the vicarages of LACKAGH and KILLASCOBE [see these articles], constitute the benefice sometimes designated Annaghdawn, and sometimes Killascope. Annaghdawn and Lackagh are contiguous. Length of these two, 5½ miles; breadth, 4½. Killascope is distant about 8 miles; the intermediate space being occupied by Moylough and Abbeynockmoy. Gross income of the benefice, £734 15s. 0d.; nett, £696

19s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The church, situated in Annaghdawn, was built about the year 1708, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 0d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; average attendance, from 12 to 20. The Annaghdawn Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 600 to 700; the Woodpark school-house, used as a Roman Catholic chapel, is attended by 125; and they have jointly two officiates. There are chapels also in Lackagh and Killascope. In 1834, the Protestants of Annaghdawn parish amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 6,504; the Protestants of the united parishes to 43, and the Roman Catholics to 11,458; the day-schools of Annaghdawn parish to 8, with, in the case of 6 of them, 229 boys and 104 girls; and the day-schools of the union to 16, with 374 boys and 185 girls. The two schools in Annaghdawn chapel and at Woodpark, were each aided with the interest of £100 Irish, bequeathed by the Rev. Redmond Harilagan, Roman Catholic clergyman of the parish. A Sunday school was kept in the church. In 1840-41, a dispensary in Annaghdawn, included within the Galway Poor-law union, received £175 16s., expended £180 11s. 6d., and made 5,725 dispensations of medicine. Its district is so large or so undefined as to extend no small distance beyond Headford; and the residence of the medical attendant is, most inconveniently, at one of the extremities.

ANNAGHDUFF. See ANNADUFF.

ANNAGHMORE, a highly improved estate, the property of C. King O'Hara, Esq., in the north of co. Sligo, Connaught. The mansion and demesne are situated 2 miles west of the village of Colooney. But the improvements extend to Coolany, 5 miles distant from Colooney; they bound the great plain which skirts the southern shore of Sligo bay; and they expand, for several miles, athwart the base and the acclivities of the sandstone hills which stretch westward in the direction of Ballina.

ANNAGHMORE, a demesne on the borders of King's and Queen's counties, Leinster. A morass on the estate is one of a cluster of 4 bogs, ¼ of a mile north of Lough Annagh; see ANNAGH. The other three are Killurin, Gurtreen, and Gleebe bogs. The whole have an area of 1,138 acres, 2 roods, 38 perches. Of this area, 664 acres and 21 perches are a deep morassy moss, and shaking quagmire, from 30 to 37 feet in depth, full of springs, situated between the hill of Killurin and the high land of Annaghmore. The clusters form part of a division of bogs on the borders of King's and Queen's counties, comprehending 4,655 acres, whose reclamation, as estimated by Mr. Longfield, would cost £6,514 17s. 10d.

ANNAGH-UAN, a small island in the barony of Moycullen, co. Galway, Connaught. It lies on the east side of the head of Kilkerrin bay, between Littermore island and the mainland, about 21 miles west of Galway. Its circumference is about 3 miles.

ANNAHILT. See ANAHILT.

ANNALEE (THE), a river of the counties of Monaghan and Cavan, Ulster. It rises from two sources, respectively about 1½ mile north and north-west of Carrickmacross, not far from the southern extremity of co. Monaghan; and performs a run of about 28 miles, chiefly in a westerly direction, to the Erne, 2½ miles below Butler's bridge. It is popularly said to originate on the borders of Monaghan and Cavan, 11 miles below its real sources; but, though not originating there, it forms in that quarter lacustrine expansions, and receives accessions from the superfluous waters of picturesque loughlets, which pleasingly invite attention. Loughs Tucker and Bawn, and several pretty sheets of water connected with the latter, in the beautifully situated demesne of Lough Bawn, are particularly agreeable. Near the centre of Tullaghgarvey barony, the river receives the tribute of the COOTEHILL: which see.

ANNALONG—anciently ISLE-ALONG—a mountain-torrent, a creek, and a small village and fishing-harbour, 5 miles north-east by north of Kilkeel, barony of Mourne, co. Down, Ulster. The creek is the only place, along a considerable extent of bold Highland coast, where fishing vessels can find shelter. "As we pass to the southward through this barony of Mourne," says Mr. Nimmo, "the mountains recede a little, and the country improves in cultivation; but no kind of sea-port or creek occurs worthy of notice, excepting Annalong. This little village is situated at the mouth of a considerable mountain-stream, which, passing swiftly through a gully in the slate rock, serves to keep off the swell which otherwise would seem ready to bury the small craft that find shelter within. The inhabitants have cut out a little dock in the rock on the south side, which, when I saw it, was choke-full of little smacks and wherries. Of these there are, belonging to the place, 3 decked and 5 half-decked, containing 166 tons; also 12 row-boats. The entrance, though narrow, is straight and deep; so that by means of leading marks and lights, the boats can run in pretty safely. The inhabitants of this place have stated, in their memorial to the Board, the practicability of making an extensive harbour of safety here; but this is quite out of the question. I think, however, it would be highly advisable to extend this little harbour by excavating a large space in the skerry rocks outside. Estimated expense, £1,428." A pier was erected by the proprietor of the soil, and has at its head from 12 to 15 feet water at the top of spring tides; but, having no other source of support than an annual toll of £1 1s. on each of the few vessels which it shelters, it is in bad repair. Though the village appears to be a prosperous fishing-station, upwards of 250 of its inhabitants are said to have been unemployed in 1835. Pop. not specially returned.

ANNALORE, a small village in the barony of Darry, co. Monaghan, Ulster. It is situated on the Ulster canal, between Clones and Smithborough. A loan fund here, under the inspection of W. Forster, Esq., had, in 1842, a capital of £3,966; and, during that year, it circulated £16,080 in 2,718 loans, cleared a nett profit of £182 19s. 10d., and expended for charitable purposes £148 19s. 10d.

ANNAMOE, a secluded little village in the parish of Derrylossey, barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on a rivulet of its own name, and on the road from Dublin to Glendalough, 3½ miles north-east of Glendalough, and 2½ south-south-west of Roundwood. The romantic Lough Dan lies less than 2 miles to the north. See DAN (LOUGH). East of the village, on high grounds, and embosomed in wood, stands Castle Kevin, the residence of Dr. Frizelle; to the west, in the glen close to the road, is Dromeen-house; and on an elevated site, about a mile toward Lough Dan, is the cottage orneé of Lake-View. The country hence to Glendalough exhibits small tracts of reclaimed ground, intermixed patches of brushwood, and extensive coppices sheeting the banks of the river, and climbing the lower acclivities of the hills. The Annamoe rivulet carries off the superfluous waters of Lough Dan; but has a run of only 5 miles or less before falling tributary to the Ovoca. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 67.

ANNAMULT, ANAMULT, or AGHAMULT, a quondam civil parish, and still an ecclesiastical one at the southern extremity of the barony of Shillelogher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1. Pop., in 1831, 458. The parish extends along the right bank of the Nore, about 4 miles above Thomastown. It contains the seat of Annamult-house, and borrows some beauty from the impingement on its southern border of the Earl of Carrick's beautiful demesne of Mount Juliet. The land is all arable, and, for the most part, of superior quality.—Annamult is a rectory, in the dio. of Ossory, and forms part of the benefice of Kells: which see. It does not lie contiguous to any of the six parishes with which it is ecclesiastically united; but is separated from the nearest of them, Kells and Stumercarty, by the intervention of Ennisnag. The parish is tithe-free. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 435. There is neither church, chapel, nor school.

ANNASCALLE, a small village in the parish of Ballinacourty, barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands in the midst of a bleak moorland region, on the post-road from Tralee to Dingle, not far from the south-west corner of Tralee bay, 9 miles west by south of Tralee. It is the site of the parish-church and Roman Catholic chapel. A new line of road from Castleman to Dingle, joins the old road near Annascalle; and will both form in itself a pleasant route, and serve to connect Dingle with Killarney. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 92; in 1841, not specially returned.

ANNATRIM, a small village in the parish of Offerlane, barony of Upper Ossory, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands on the Nore, about 8 miles north-west of Abbeylisk. It was the site of an ancient abbey. Pop. not specially returned.

ANNE (ST.), SHANDON. See CORK.

ANNEGROVE, a seat about a mile west of Carigtohill, barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. It surmounts a rising ground near the head of Cork harbour; and commands an extensive and fascinating view of that marine inlet, with its intricate shores of island, bay, and promontory. The mansion was the residence of Lord Buttevant, first Earl of Barrymore.

ANNER. See AVONTAR.

ANNESBOROUGH, a name of the co. Down parish of DRUMARAGH [which see]; and the name also of a seat a little below Lurgan, toward Lough Neagh.

ANNESTOWN, a village and small sea-port in the parish of Dunhill, barony of Middlethrid, co. Waterford, Munster. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 232; in 1841, 149. Houses 25. It stands near the ruins of Castle Don-Ile, on the lip of an extensive and pleasant plain, a little upwards of 3 miles west-south-west of Tramore. The harbour is in a small rocky bay adjacent to the village. Mr. McDonnell, in his Report on the Fishery Harbours, recommended the grant of £150 to execute a plan for improving the harbour, on condition of Mr. Cole, the occupant, completing the work; and his recommendation was agreed to. Annewstown lead mine, situated between the village and Tramore, was opened by the Mining Company of Ireland since the end of 1836, and employs 16 men. Waterford, 8 miles distant, is the place for shipping the ore and receiving supplies.

ANTRIM,

A maritime county in the extreme north-east of Ulster. It is bounded on the north by the Atlantic; on the east by the North Channel; on the southeast and south by Down; and, on the west by Tyrone and Londonderry. Its boundary over all the south-east and south, excepting 5 miles adjacent to Lough Neagh, is formed by Belfast Lough and the river Lagan; and, over all the west, excepting 7 miles adjacent to the ocean, is formed by Loughs Neagh and Beg, and the river Bann. The county is thus nearly insulated between a sweep of the sea, and an alternate chain and line of fresh water. It lies between $54^{\circ} 26'$, and $55^{\circ} 12' 10''$ north latitude, and between $5^{\circ} 40'$, and $6^{\circ} 37'$ longitude west of Greenwich. Its greatest length, from Bengore-head on the north, to Spener's-bridge on the south, is 41½ miles; its greatest breadth, from the Goblins on the east to Island Reagh Troone on the west, is about 24 miles; and its area, exclusive of the county of the town of Carrickfergus, is 745,177 acres.

Surface.—The area of the county is physically distributed into 53,288 acres of water, 1,908 acres of towns, 10,338 acres of plantations, 176,335 acres of waste mountain and bog, and 503,288 acres of arable land. But as most of the water is included in Lough Neagh, which appears to the eye to be rather a flanking sea than an interior or even intruding lake; and as the extent of bog is not aggregately great, and lies dispersed now on the mountain and now in the plain; the whole land surface may be regarded as approximately one-third upland, and two-thirds dale and valley and undulating expanse.

The upland division forms, in a general view, a wild and waste declining platform,—whose seaward face is shorn into bold escarpments, and shelving or mural or colonnaded precipices,—whose summits and interior contour are tamely outlined and slenderly diversified,—and whose westward declivity is a slowly descending slope toward the basin of Lough Neagh. So near, in general, does the summit-line run to the coast, that the interior streams of the county, which fall directly into the sea, or belong not to the systems of the Bann and the Lagan, have, with the exception of the Bush river, a medium length of probably less than three miles. Along the summit-line, and atwart nearly all the seaward declivity, the mountains are quite a picture-gallery of landscape; they combine, in the rarest proportions, power, grandeur, romance, and beauty; and, in various points, or even along considerable stretches, as at the Giant's Causeway, at Fair Head, and at Glenarm, they so thrill the fancy and, delightfully overawe the mind, as to be altogether worthy of the stirring and far-spread fame which they have acquired among tourists 'in search of the picturesque and the sublime.' But the details of this magnificent coast, this superbly-adorned and opulently varied sea-screen, will come so minutely before us piece by piece, in the progress of our work, that, to prevent repetition, we must at present forbear all attempt at description. The mountains—or rather hills, for they are moderate in altitude—commence 5 miles south-west by south of Belfast, and about the same distance north-north-east of the most southerly point in the county; and they extend in an almost unbroken but curving and sinuous chain of groups and congeries, quite round the coast to the boundary with Londonderry. The principal summits are Slamish, about the middle, and Knocklead, in the north; both of which have an altitude of less than 1,600 feet above sea-level. The ravines and gleens which fling the roaring bill-torrents down to the sea, form singular foils to the immense masses of basalt and limestone which, now amorphous, and now either of most fantastic or of almost architectural forms, project from the groups as headlands and promontories. Among the heights which run sheer out to the sea, and stoop precipitously down to the wave, Fair Head has an elevation of 636 feet, Garronpoint 704, Ballygally Head 797, Carrowmurry 819, and Lurgethon 1,154.

A belt of very fertile, well-cultivated, and tastefully embellished land, from Belfast round to the vicinity of Glenarm, is, with trivial exceptions, the only low ground which lies between the uplands and the beach. The valley of the Six-mile-Water, the most southerly of the noticeable westward openings among the hills, is a fine expanse of beauty and cultivation, somewhat soft and uniform in its features, but gay and charming in the artificial ornaments of its dress. The valleys of the Glenwherry and the Broad rivers, farther north, though of less extent and attraction, expand beyond the limits of glens, and possess the amenities of verdure, cereal crop, and wood. The valley of the Ravel, yet farther north, is closely screened on one side with hills, and heaves up from its centre an isolated basaltic eminence. The valley of the Maine, to which Ravel, Broad, and Glenwherry, are lateral, and which descends due southward from the northern heights to the north shore of Lough Neagh, thus extending parallel to the valley of the Bann, but in an opposite direction, is rather a tumulated and undulating expanse than a plain, offering many fruitful and well-cultivated views to the eye, but repeatedly sending down steep banks quite close to the stream. The valley of the Bush, which first deflects among the northern heights, and then goes off toward the Giant's Causeway,—and the valley of the Bann, which, besides being the channel for the main drainage of the county, belongs in more than a moiety of its extent to Londonderry,—must, like the noble features of the coast, be wholly reserved for future description. The country between the efflux of the Bann from Lough Beg, and the influx of the Maine to Lough Neagh, is partly an irksome series of waste yet reclaimable bog, and partly a sea of billocks and rising grounds replete with tiny specimens of close landscape, showing every embellishment to advantage, and occasionally looking out on the monarch lake of the British isles. The country, from the east side of the embouchure of the Maine, all along the east side of Lough Neagh to the southern boundary with Down, is the most extensive level tract in the county; and for contour, soil, cultivation, wood, hedge-rows, orchards, and houses, strongly reminds one of the characteristic scenery of three-fourths of England. The valley of the Lagan, shared by Antrim with Down, and flanked at a fine distance by the hills of both, is undulating in surface, rich in soil, profuse in artificial ornament, brilliant in the perspective of water and mountain, and whether viewed in its aggregate landscape, or in the multitudinous detail of its scenic groups, will compare with any one of an hundred more boasted valleys in whatever pleases the taste and delights the fauety. When, to the character of hill-screens, soil, cultivation, and contour, "are added," says the Rev. Mr. Dubourdien, in his Survey of the County of Antrim, "when to these are added the number of excellent habitations the valley of the Lagan contains, with the plantations, fences, and gardens attached to them, and the bleach-greens lying close to the river, it may with truth be said that few tracts in any country, of the same extent, exceed it in the beauty of its scenery, or in the value of its produce."

Waters.—The principal rivers, incidentally named in connection with the valleys—the Six-mile-Water, the Glenwherry, the Braid, the Ravel, the Bush, the Bann, and the Lagan—as well as the Carey, the Glenshesh, and some others of the minor streams, will be separately noticed in their alphabetical place. Loughs Neagh and Beg, the two principal lakes, and also the minor lakes of Portmore and Guile, will likewise be separately noticed. The only other lakes of any moment are Lynch in Lower Dunluc, Mill in Upper Dunluc, and Mourne, 3 miles north of Carrickfergus. A remarkably light chalybeate spring, strongly impregnated with iron, and also an aluminose vitriolic spring, occur near Ballycastle. A strong chalybeate, whose waters can be carried without injury to distant places, wells up on Knocklade: see that article. Aperient nitrous waters spring from beds of marly clay at Kilroot, and near Carrickfergus. Pure but not strong salt springs occur at Ballyhill near Carrickfergus, and in Island-Magee near Redhall.

Minerals.—The primary rock district of the county is confined to a small mountain-group in the extreme north-east, around Knocklade. Though consisting chiefly of mica schist, it presents various features of high interest, both in itself and on account of its skirting the small coalfield of Fair Head. The old red sandstone and the rocks which accompany it are still more limited, and, excepting in a few unimportant patches, are found only in a band between the primary district and Red bay.—The coal district is situated on the north coast, both east and west of Fair Head. Only one workable bed appears to exist west of the headland; it is $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet thick, and looks out from the face of the magnificent and far-stretching cliff; it has been wrought by means of adits or galleries driven inwards at the level of high water mark; and it dips southward at such an angle that the adits were, in some instances, carried upwards of 900 feet before meeting the declining stratum. The beds east or rather south-east of Fair Head, occur around Murlough bay, and appear to be quite distinct from those on the west; they are six in number, and vary from 12 to 30 inches in thickness; four of them are bituminous, and two carbonaceous; and the latter lie, the one immediately above, and the other below, an apparently intruded mass of columnar trap, 70 feet thick. A section of the cliff on the north side of Murlough bay exhibits, in descending series, about 100 feet of columnar greenstone, 20 of brownish red sandstone, 1 of bituminous coal, 80 of red sandstone, 6 of black shale, $2\frac{1}{2}$ of highly bituminous coal, 40 of brownish red sandstone, one-half of highly bituminous coal, 20 of red sandstone, 10 of black shale, $2\frac{1}{2}$ of bituminous coal, 60 of black shale, $2\frac{1}{2}$ of unflammable carbonaceous coal, 2 of black shale passing into flinty slate, 70 of columnar trap, 2 of black shale, $8\frac{1}{2}$ of unflammable carbonaceous coal, alternating with thin beds of black shale, and 10 to the base of the cliff but really an unascertained thickness of black shale. The height of the cliff is 437 feet. The collieries on both sides of Fair Head, though now neglected, partly owing to the difficulty of working to the depth of old excavations, and partly from the want of a safe harbour for shipping the coal, were wrought at a very remote period, and possibly may be among the most ancient in the British empire. While miners, about the year 1770, were working an unexplored part of the cliff near Ballycastle, an old excavation was unexpectedly discovered, and was found to be very extensive, and to have been wrought upon a regular system by evidently expert miners, but with implements different from those now in use. No tradition now remains of the period or persons of the ancient miners.

Very nearly the whole of the remaining part of the county is occupied by upper members of the secondary series, capped by a thick mass of tabular trap. The external edge of this great mineral field—which expands also into considerable portions of the contiguous counties of Londonderry, Tyrone, and Down —presents, as seen from a distance, the striking feature of a high table-land rising precipitously either from the margin of the sea, or from a comparatively low and flat country. At once the largest, finest, and most characteristic horizontal section, is the remarkable series of lofty precipices and mural cliffs which extends from behind Belfast quite round to the old red sandstone district of Red bay. A mass of black trap, frequently from 200 to 300 feet thick, usually amorphous, but sometimes rudely columnar, constitutes the upper region of the whole section, and uniformly presents declivities or mural escarpments. The chalk, which lies immediately beneath, and varies from 60 to 100 feet in thickness, also presents mural precipices; and the dazzling whiteness of these contrasts so strongly with the black mass of superincumbent trap, as to give singular force and character to the landscape. The strata beneath the chalk, consisting of green sand, the lias formation, and the red and variegated marls of the new red sandstone subseries, are usually concealed by a thick covering of clay and debris, which has partly fallen from the trap and chalk, and is partly a disintegration of the strata themselves; and they present, on their edge, a steep inclined plain, sweeping out from the overhanging cliffs, and, in many places, so successfully cultivated as to wear as luxuriant a vegetable dress as the most productive pendicle of soil in Ulster. Though the strata, from the chalk downward, have, in a great degree, been altered or modified, partly by the pressure of the superincumbent trap, partly by the intersection of trap dikes, and partly by the protrusion of large hill masses of trap, they sufficiently retain their lithological character to be identified by geognosy, and contain, in their upper members, such organic remains as clearly prove their correspondence with similar successions of rocks in England and other countries. The chalk differs in no respect from that of England, except in much greater hardness. This quality precludes its being used for many of the economical purposes to which the softer chalk of England is applied, and has occasioned it to be locally, though most erroneously, designated white limestone. It is very regularly stratified, but of unequal thickness; averaging probably 60 feet, and at the White Well quarry, 3 miles north of Belfast, showing 14 regular beds in a thickness of 70 feet. Masses of imbedded flint are usually of a globular form, but frequently present the most fantastic shapes; and, in colour, they vary from black, through various shades of grey, to white. The principal fossils in the chalk are terebratulæ, pecten, cirri, ammonites, echinites, belemnites, baculites, and spongiae. The green sand or mulatto stone averages 20 feet in thickness; it sometimes, in its upper beds, graduates into chalk, and then is represented by a yellowish compact rock of chalk sprinkled with green sand; and when considerably thick, it is usually fine in the grain, and opulent in fossils. The lias limestone is 50 feet thick at Larne, and about 30 in Colin glen, 3 miles south-west of Belfast; it varies in solidity as in thickness, and it contains a profusion of ammonites, pecten, mya, dentalia, plagiostoma, and other orders of organic remains. The black shale is 20 feet thick in Colin glen, and averages 40 at Larne, Red bay, and Ballintoy; and it abounds chiefly in gryphæ, and is probably identical with the clunch clay of England. Marl, averaging, perhaps, 400 feet in thickness, is now bright red, now yellowish white, and now greenish blue; is arranged in beds which are often striped or mottled, and is in some places traversed, in all directions, by irregular veins, from half-an-inch to 8 inches thick, of fibrous gypsum. Strata of brownish-red sandstone, probably about 300 feet thick, consist, for the most part, of quartzose grains cemented by an argilliferous paste; yet they contain clay-galls, are sometimes striped with various colours, and are, to a great extent, separated from one another by inter-laminations of mica. Magnesian limestone, averaging, perhaps, 60 feet in thickness, varies in colour from yellow to dull grey, and is interstratified with red and yellow sandstone. Traces of the oolitic formation have been observed nowhere except on the coast near Larne.

The trap of Antrim has attracted so much attention, and been so frequently described, that it requires from us but slender notice. The upper surface of the chalk which it covers, presents a rough serrated outline, such as belongs to a rock long exposed to erosion; and its hollows are filled sometimes by the trap itself, and sometimes by a disintegration of it, in the form of a brown ochreous substance, mixed with such blood-red flints as appear to the eye to be solid, but fall into fragments at a stroke of the hammer. While the chalk in contact with the superincumbent trap has not been altered in character, that which is in contact with trap-dikes or the larger trap protrusions has been changed into granular marble. The trap rocks, though not displaying the same approach to parallelism in the upper and lower surface of each stratum as the sedimentary rocks, are much more regularly arranged in beds than has generally been supposed; and, throughout the northern part of the county, they present, in a proximate sense, the phenomena of quite regular stratification. Yet the beds of red ochre, which form so remarkable a feature in the cliffs westward of Bengore Head, and figure so distinctly in contrast to the black colour of the trap both above and beneath them, and which, in some places, become porphyritic, and pass insensibly into clay porphyry, are the only or at least the chief indications by which the character of the different beds of trap can be traced; for any one trappean stratum so frequently changes from coarse and crystalline to fine-grained and earthy, that in one part it might be called greenstone, in another basalt, and in a third amygdaloidal wacke. But with the assistance of the ochreous strata, as well as partially with that of a bed of wood coal, the succession of the trap strata, particularly between Glenarn and the Giant's Causeway, has been somewhat accurately ascertained. We have, in an ascending series, first, amygdaloidal trap, from 20 to 50 feet thick, but sometimes passing into greenstone, and affecting a columnar structure; next, greenstone, from 30 to 80 feet thick, sometimes amorphous, and sometimes rudely columnar; next, the same rock, from 60 to 100 feet thick, passing sometimes into basalt, and sometimes into amygdaloidal wacke; next, six alternations of black-grained trap with thin irregular beds of red ochre, 70 feet thick; next, red ochreous clay, now 20 and now 200 feet thick, graduating into lilac-coloured lithomarge, speckled with white; next, reddish-black ferruginous clay, 1 foot thick; next, the great range of columnar basalt, 45 feet thick, which appears 100 feet above high water at Bengore Head, dips toward the west, and forms the basaltic pavement of the Giant's Causeway by its intersection with the plane of the sea; next, irregularly columnar basalt, about 50 feet thick, containing a stratum of wacke and another of wood-coal, and consisting of small columns which are variously horizontal, oblique, and vertical, and are frequently bent in fantastic forms; next, columnar basalt, about 50 feet thick, not quite so regular in its columns as the great or Causeway range; and, finally, six strata of rudely columnar and amorphous trap, 164 feet thick, including two beds of red ochre.

The most important deposit of the tertiary formation, not only in Ulster but in Ireland, is situated along the south margin of Lough Neagh, from Sandy bay in Antrim to Washing bay, near Mountjoy-castle, in Tyrone. It belongs much more to the latter county and to Armagh than to Antrim; and occupies, within their limits, a space of 10 miles in length and 5 in breadth. Yet a trial by boring, made many years ago at Sandy bay, in Antrim, affords the principal data by which its composition is known. That boring elicited 10 feet of blue clay, 25 of black lignite mixed with clay, 24 of clay, 20 of black lignite, 4 of clay, and 15 of black lignite. The lignite, while so abundant around the bay, is at the same time so combustible, that, during seasons when fuel is scarce, the inhabitants occasionally sink pits, and use it for domestic purposes. The clay is similar to that of the potters' clay district of Bovey in Devonshire, and has in several parts been raised from pits for the manufacture of pipes and pottery; but hitherto it has rarely been obtained of such quality as to possess a pure white colour after being exposed to the heat of the baking furnace.

Soils.—A strong loam, interspersed in many places, with the debris and small boulders of trap, and generally superincumbent on clay, is the prevailing soil in the plains and valleys. The trap boulders, though cleared away on improved ground, still lie on ill-cultivated land, athwart or near the surface, and sometimes are so compacted in remote assimilation to a pavement as, while they remain, to render the operations of husbandry impracticable. The clay subsoil is highly retentive; and, where draining has not been practised, seriously retards, in both droughts and rains, the labours of the farmer.—As the ground rises, the vegetable mould becomes shallower in depth, looser in texture, and lighter in colour, and the subsoil loses much of its tenacity, and degenerates into brown or yellow till. Peat or turf, too, soon succeeds to all vestige of the loam; stretches away, over the summits or platforms of the mountains, in extensive tracts of moss; and forms bogs, of various extent and density, which, while they offer a coarse summer herbage to sheep or cattle, seem to bid defiance to the inroads of the georgical improver. A tract of sandy loam commences west of the Lagan, a short distance from Belfast, and, with some interruptions, continues to the Maze-course. Other but smaller tracts of the same soil occur along Lough Neagh; and small stripes of sand are found on different parts of the sea-shore. In Malone, the sandy loam is interspersed with clayey knolls, and lies on a subsoil of very stiff clay; but, in other localities, the soil is generous, highly fertile, and easily coaxed into the production of rich and heavy cereal crops.—Gently swelling hills which undulate various districts of the county, and those ridges, called Drum lins, which run with small intervals to a considerable length, such as that from Dunnmurry by Lambeg to Magheragall church, consist of water-worn stones of various sizes, and are all carpeted with gravel.—Wherever the chalk of the county has been stripped of its covering of trap, has advanced into the plains, and has acquired a coat of clay or of mould, it has formed a soil of peculiar excellence, and well adapted to every purpose of cultivation. Round most of the margin of the great trap field, detached tracts of this chalky—or, according to the local nomenclature, this limestone—soil are to be found; and in Magheragall, in Aghalee, on the coast near Redhall, at the point of Island-Magee, near Glenarn, and at Ballintoy, they are particularly conspicuous. Georgical improvement has borrowed a lesson from the natural formation of this soil, and, by mixing the debris and fragments of the chalky precipices with churlish moorland, has worked it into excellent arable ground. The chalky soil possesses, among other recommendations, the property of being peculiarly favourable to fruit-trees; occasioning a freedom in their growth, a cleanness in their bark, and a richness of flavour in their fruit, which are rarely surpassed.—A soil which covers much of the mountain area of Antrim, and is common to it with the trappean region of Londonderry, may be noticed in the words of the Rev. G. V. Sampson's Survey of the latter county: "Above the lime [chalk] is the region of basalt; and the soil thenceforth is without clay. It is only a rust, or oxide, of the softer parts of the ironstone. It is loose, hovers with moisture, and has neither cohesion nor strength; witness the wretched crops of every thing but potatoes and straw. The country people call it deaf land." Yet it produces an agreeable herbage, and is very far from being valueless for sheep-walk or grazing-ground.

Woods.—The great natural woods of Portmore, and those of the great and little parks of Glenarm, have long ceased to be the boast of their districts. Excepting on the grounds of Shane's Castle, and on the escarpments of hills, and along the banks of the more picturesque streams, natural wood has almost everywhere fallen beneath the axe of the Vandal improver, or the short-sighted economist of the passing hour's gains. Yet the vacuum in sylvan adornment has been far more than filled by a liberal and well-directed spirit of planting. Most of the numerous resident landowners, and even some of the farmers, walked upwards of thirty or even forty years ago, athwart extensive naked tracts, and clothed them in young forest. A great part of Massarene, and of the southern sections of Antrim and Toome, has a finely wooded aspect. The valleys of the Six-mile-Water and the Broad, present much sylvan embellishment. The whole extent of alternately undulating and level plain from Lisburn to Carrickfergus, is rich in sheets and clumps and rows of plantation. Around Castle-Dobbs and Ballyhill are noble masses of trees; at Redhall and Kilwalter are expanses of newer wood, superintended by numerous veterans of the forest; at Leslie-hill, are very extensive plantations; and around the castle of Glenarm are crowds of trees, both rare and noble. On the whole, the county of Antrim has made as rapid advances in plantation-improvement as probably any other county in Ireland. In 1841, the county contained, in planted trees, 63 acres of oak, 211 of ash, 130 of elm, 26 of beech, 462 of fir, 8,063 of mixed plantations, and 1,403 of orchards,—in all, 10,358 acres; and the proportions of these woods which were planted previous to 1791, are 35 acres of oak, 4 of ash, 99 of elm, 11 of beech, 17 of fir, 1,256 of mixed plantations, and 202 of orchards. But, in 1841, there existed, in addition to the planted woods, 602,826 detached trees, equivalent in extent to 3,768 acres, and making the grand total of plantations 14,126 acres.

Estates and Farms.—Excepting the properties under the see of Connor, estates are held either immediately or virtually by grant from the crown, and are in consequence freehold. The estates of the three principal titled proprietors are very extensive. The Antrim estate, which includes the northern baronies, is, for the most part, let in perpetuity, and occupied by respectable country gentlemen. Numerous other properties, as well those of untitled gentlemen as those of the nobility, are of considerable extent.—Though the houses of proprietors are, in few instances, splendid, they are, in general, characterized by convenience and elegance. Even the houses of leaseholders on the larger estates, are aggregately so neat and pleasing, as to impart no small charm to the general aspect of the country.

Farming-leases have, for two generations or so past, been shorter than at a former period. The lands being improved and the buildings good, less reason is supposed to exist than before for securing to a tenant a lengthened possession.—Leases of a prolonged kind are given for lives and years; some for lives alone; bishops' leases, for 21 years, often with clause of renewal; and all sorts are, in general, freehold. Building-leases in towns are usually given long, with a view of enhancing the value of the circumjacent lands.

Farms differ, in tenure, from the con-acre or patch for a single crop, to the lease in perpetuity or actual estate; and they differ, in extent, from the merest pendicle to the most noble expanse. Where the land is uniform, and free from moor or moss or mountain, the surface is sectioned, divided, and subdivided, by a pressure of circumstances which defies all reference to system, and lies as yet beyond all prospect of amenability to control. In many instances, large tracts of verdant upland are held by distant occupiers, and confined to the supervision of resident herdsmen; and along the mutual border of mountain and valley, a considerable quantity of high land is usually let along with a belt or section of plain; but, athwart by far the greater portion of the arable area, farms are aggregately so small that they would not probably average twenty acres, or—if a few of the larger were deducted—would not probably average eleven or twelve. A person with English or Scottish ideas, but without discretion to guide them, scouts the littleness of an Irish farm, and wonders that so fine a county as Antrim should not have quite renounced the paltriness and peddling of minute subdivision, and imitated the grandeur of British allotments to the farmer; but when he sports his exclamations of taste, and flaunts his wise lessons of economy, and limns his gay and invidious pictures of the superiority of his country, he only proclaims his profound ignorance of Ireland, and proves himself a snatterer and a pedant. "The large and the small farms," pithily says Mr. Dubourdieu, "are so interwoven, and the tenures are so various, and misery would ensue to so many persons by a radical change, that though" the question of the most profitable division of land "may be a matter of speculation in this country, it can scarcely ever be looked to as a matter of practice." In 1841, the total number of farms, exclusive of those in the county of the town of Carrickfergus, was 23,526; and of these 6,855 measured from 1 acre to 5 acres each,—10,563, from 5 to 15 acres each,—4,220, from 15 to 30 acres each,—and 1,888, upwards of 30 acres.

Agriculture.—Wheat is very generally cultivated in the south parts of the baronies of Toome and Antrim, the west and south parts of Massarene, and those parts of Belfast which lie south and west of the mountains. It is raised also in many other districts; but either on a limited scale, or only as an occasional crop. Preparation for it by clover has been found unsuitable; by plain fallow, still partially prevails; and by potatoe fallow, is most common, or even general.—Barley, though far from being a favourite crop, is cultivated on dry and gravelly swells, as well as occasionally in other situations; and, for the most part, either succeeds wheat in two ploughings, or is introduced by a potatoe fallow.—Oats are far the predominant cereal produce; their grain, jointly with potatoes, form the chief food of the people, and their straw the chief support of the cattle; and, though a secondary object in the wheat and barley districts, they almost engross attention in all other parts of the county. They are sometimes sown on grass grounds which have been limed or otherwise manured; but are too generally scoured year after year out of the ground of potatoe fallow, or that of plain fallow, or even from a pared and burned surface, until the disheartened and utterly exhausted soil has power to return little more than the bulk of the seed. Yet, in the wheat districts, on the larger arable farms, and increasingly throughout the county, they are treated on comparatively enlightened and skilful principles; and, the ground being preserved both clean and in good heart, they are at once luxuriant in growth, large in bulk, and excellent in quality.—Beans, so far back as 30 years ago, had long been cultivated in the parish of Carncastle, yielding upwards of 70 bushels per Irish acre; but pease, as a field-crop, were then unknown.—Flax is a prominent crop, in very fluctuating demand; so that the quantity of seed annually imported for it into Belfast was at one time 35,000 bushels, at another comparatively triding, in 1835 upwards of 108,000 bushels, and in 1843 about 84,000.—Potatoes are a large object of attention; and are raised in all sorts of ways, from the lazy-bed method of the scarcely reclaimed bog or moor, to the most approved culture on the wheat-bearing loam.—Though clover has been extensively introduced, the other artificial grasses, and also turnips and vetches, are either unknown or very inadequately appreciated.—As to methods of cultivation, rotations of crops, implements of husbandry, and details of rural economy, we are deterred both by the rapidity of progress with which improvements are going on, and by the disgusting misrepresentations which we observe to be current in topographical writing, from stating any particulars. Some alleged pictures of Antrim agriculture which lie before us would be accurate enough representations of the state of things in the least improved parts of Ireland, but are hideous caricatures, not only of what Antrim is now, but even of what it has been during nearly two generations. So large have been the achievements of agricultural reform during even the last ten years, that cereal produce has increased more than 50 per cent., while the increase in butter, cattle, pigs, and poultry, though not equally large, has been considerable.

Live Stock.—In 1841, the total of live stock on farms not exceeding 1 acre, was 908 horses and mules, 3,886 cattle, 809 sheep, 5,382 pigs, 30,209 poultry, and 85 asses; on farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres, 1,920 horses and mules, 6,825 cattle, 1,614 sheep, 3,720 pigs, 18,064 poultry, and 24 asses; on farms of from 5 to 15 acres, 8,447 horses and mules, 23,007 cattle, 5,778 sheep, 11,061 pigs, 47,787 poultry, and 20 asses; on farms of from 15 to 30 acres, 5,938 horses and mules, 18,230 cattle, 4,647 sheep, 7,351 pigs, 32,134 poultry, and 8 asses; and on farms above 30 acres, 5,458 horses and mules, 17,090 cattle, 5,302 sheep, 5,368 pigs, 25,478 poultry, and 8 asses. The total number, and the estimated value of each of these classes of stock, was 22,651 horses and mules, £181,208; 69,638 cattle, £452,647; 18,150 sheep, £19,965; 32,882 pigs, £41,102; 153,072 poultry, £3,842; and 145 asses, £145. Total value of the whole live stock, £69,8909.

Manufactures.—The linen manufacture, long so prominent in Antrim, belongs in a loose sense to about one-half of Ireland, and emphatically to the province of Ulster. For an outline, therefore, of its history and condition, see article ULSTER. The ordinary linens of Antrim rarely or never exceed 32 inches when bleached, and are generally or almost characteristically 27. Fine yard-wide cambrics, lawns, and diapers, are made in the district along Belfast Lough and the Lagan. Weavers very generally purchase their own yarn, weave it in their own houses, and sell their webs to the bleachers.

Some employ journeymen, and others let a loom or two to poorer fellow-weavers. But nearly all earn smaller profits than the cultivator of the soil; and not a few are forced by necessity, or induced by economy, to combine, on an exceedingly humble scale, the occupations of the manufacturer and the farmer. But, for a view of the bulky parts of the linen manufacture, as well as of kindred productive pursuits, see the articles on the larger towns, particularly the article on BELFAST. The cotton manufacture was projected at Belfast, in 1777, by Messrs. Joy & McCabe; it has been doubled in extent since 1800; it now employs from 25,000 to 27,000 persons in the district along Belfast Lough and the Lagan; and it has been regarded as a chief means of the assimilation of that district in competency and comfort to the manufacturing sections of England and Scotland. The manufacture of canvas was introduced to Belfast in 1784; rope-making, about 32 years earlier; paper-making, at Dunmurry, by a person of the name of McManus, and, in a short time, at different places in 10 mills; blanket-making, at Lambeg, by the Wolfenden family, who settled in Ireland about 250 years ago; and the manufacture of sulphuric acid, near Lisburn, by Mr. Gregg of Belfast. Stockings and coarse woollen cloth are very generally woven throughout the county; silk-weaving employs about 20 persons; soap and candles have been bulky produced for exportation; leather was, at one time, manufactured in almost every town; the casting of iron makes some figure in Belfast: a manufactory for turning and fluting iron was established about 40 years ago near Lisburn; potteries, for coarser wares, at Lambeg, at Ballycastle, and near the Maze; ship-building has been considerably carried on at Belfast; and saddlery, scythe-stones, and various articles for home use, compose a large and diffusive miscellaneous manufacture.

Commerce.—The interior traffic of the county, while large, animated, and very various, does not easily admit of being estimated. The overland traffic with other counties is chiefly concentrated in an exterior direction at Dublin, Armagh, and Coleraine, and, in an interior direction, at Belfast; and falls to be included in a vidimus of the trade at the ports and by the railway. The exports and the imports, though the line of coast is so extensive, are almost or altogether confined to BELFAST, CARRICKFERGUS, LARNE, BALLYCASTLE, and PORTRUSH, [see these articles.] and could not be summarily exhibited here without wasteful anticipation.

Fairs.—The principal fairs held within the county are,—Antrim, Jan. May 12, Aug. 3, and Nov. 12; Ballintoy, June 3, Sept. 4, and Oct. 14; Ballycarry, June 21, Aug. 21, and Oct. 31; Ballycastle, Jan. 1, March 3, April 21, May 29, July 26, Aug. 28, Oct. 30, and Nov. 3, and 27; Ballyclare, Jan. 28, May 19, July 21, Aug. 25, Oct. 20, and Nov. 24; Ballymena, July 26, and Oct. 21; Ballymoney, May 6, July 10, and Oct. 7; Ballinure, May 15, Sept. 4, and Oct. 20; Belfast, Aug. 12, and Nov. 8; Berrine, Jan. 16, and Feb. 20; Broughshane, June 17 and Sept. 1; Bushmills, March 30, June 29, Aug. 24, Oct. 21, and Dec. 14; Carrickfergus, May 12, and Nov. 1; Carnmoney, May 12, and Nov. 17; Clough, Feb. 10, April 20, May 27, Aug. 5, Nov. 9, and Dec. 10; Connor, Feb. 1, May 1, Aug. 2, and Oct. 28; Craigelly, June 26, and Aug. 21; Crumlin, 1st Monday of every month; Cushendall, Feb. 14, March 17, May 14, June 29, Aug. 14, Sept. 29, Nov. 14, and Dec. 22; Dervock, Jan. 13, Feb. 24, May 18, June 22, Aug. 12, and Oct. 27; Drimbar, May 21; Dunloy, Feb. 15, May 15, Aug. 15, and Nov. 15; Dunluce, Nov. 12;

Kells, Jan. 8, March 1, June 10, and Sept. 12; Larne, July 31, and Dec. 1; Lisburn, July 21, and Oct. 5; Loughgill, Feb. 19, Aug. 19, and Nov. 19; Mosside, May 21, July 21, and Nov. 23; Mounthill, July 1, and Oct. 1; Newtowncrommellin, 2d Tuesday of every month; Oldstone, June 13, and Oct. 22; Parkgate, Feb. 7, May 7, Aug. 7, and Nov. 4; Randalstown, July 16, and Nov. 1; Roughfort, May 26, and Nov. 24; Shane's Castle, July 3, and Oct. 8; and Templepatrick, May 3, July 10, and Oct. 27.

Fisheries.]—A fishing-ground near Carrickfergus, from Silver stream eastward to Kilroot, is remarkable for cod, codling, and flat fish. A fish bank measuring 4 by 2 furlongs, and lying off Blackhead, is remarkable for cod, ling, and herrings. A fishing-ground, a mile in length, and running due south from the south end of Muck Island, is the resort of turbot in summer, and of cod and ling in winter. A fishing-ground about $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north-east of Larne harbour, abounds in cod and in a species of black pollock called blockens. See LARNE. At four places called Trystes, on a reef from $\frac{1}{4}$ to 5 miles from Ballygelly Head, are cod, pollock, and whiting. On a bank, about $\frac{1}{4}$ mile from the coast at Glenarm, are cod and ling. Fishing-grounds between Carnlough and Port Scalbeg, are frequented by cod, ling, and conger. Boxer's bank, within two miles of the shore at Cushendall, are frequented by cod, ling, pollock, and flat fish. A bank about 4 miles in length, 2 miles off Torr Head, is remarkable for cod and ling. Ballintoy or Dunsaverick bank, a mile broad, upwards of 3 miles long, and extending from Sheep Island to Bengore Head, produces cod, ling, and some turbot. The Skerries Head, 2 miles broad, 16 miles long, and distant about 7 miles from Portrush, yields cod, ling, turbot, haddock, conger, and other fish. No persons between the Giant's Causeway and Carrickfergus are employed more in fishing than in other occupations; but the majority of the inhabitants on the coast resort to it as an occasional summer occupation. In 1830, according to the Commissioners of Irish Fisheries, the county had engaged in its fisheries 15 decked and 27 half-decked vessels, 337 open sail boats, 116 row-boats, and 2,126 fishermen; and, in 1836, according to the officers of the coast-guard, it and the coast of Londonderry eastward from Lough Foyle, had 5 decked and 3 half-decked vessels, 18 open sail boats, 242 row-boats, and 816 fishermen. A view of the salmon fisheries belongs to our notices of the rivers and of Lough Neagh.

Communications.]—The Ulster railway, open from Belfast to Lurgan, at the close of 1841, will afford communication from the commercial metropolis of Antrim to Armagh; and a line laid down by the Commissioners will continue the communication southward to a junction at Navan with the line from Enniskillen to Dublin. The roads of the county are in general excellent; but, at the same time, are so abundant and so intricately ramified that they can be intelligibly exhibited only on a map. The most notable of them, a new road along the coast, was quite recently completed by the Commissioners of Public Works: it was formed with prodigious labour, and at very great expense; it is conducted, in one place, under a considerable extent of rock which rose sheer up some hundreds of feet from the sea, and, in others, along portions of very steep hills of moving clay bank; and in its aggregate character, it affords both a striking contrast to the mountain-climbing roads of a former period, and a fine specimen of engineering skill and execution. For a brief notice of a section of this work, see article GLENARM. In 1842, the county surveyor had under his charge 1,900 miles of road; and from the date of his appointment in 1836, till the close of 1841, he had superintended the formation of 135 miles of new road. The only interior navigation—though even it is strictly interior over only a brief detour, and runs, in general, along the boundary with Down—is the navigation of the LAGAN: which see. The Newry canal, though nowhere impinging on the county, affords communication to the district lying on Lough Neagh. A canal was at one time projected from that great lake to Dublin, but is not likely to be ever formed. The public conveyances within the county in 1838, with the exception of the very numerous corps which diverged from BELFAST, [see that article,] were cars or caravans from Ballycastle, Ballymena, Bushmills, Dervock, and Portrush to Coleraine, from Ballycastle and Larne to Cushendall, and from Ballymoney and Portlengone to Ballymena.

Divisions.]—By far the greater part of Antrim, from the north coast southward, formed for a series of centuries the ancient kingdom of Dalriada; while the southern border of the county was probably in alternate possession of the Dalriadans and their neighbours of Down. At a subsequent period, the territory from Belfast Lough and the Lagan, westward to Lough Neagh, was called North Claneboy in contradistinction to South Claneboy in Down; a part of this territory, won by the Scots of the clan Macdonnell, was called Bryan Currough's country; the territory from Oldfleet or Larne, northward to near Ballycastle, and westward to the mountains, was called the Glymes, from the ravine or narrow valley character of the ground; Island Magee was subordinate to Claneboy, and dependent on the castle of Carrickfergus; and all the rest of the country, the reduced and successional territory of Dalriada, was called the Route, and occasionally, in Elizabeth's reign, MacSorley Boy's country. An arrangement into baronies was made by Sir John Perrot in 1384, but was not, for a considerable time, completely acknowledged or rendered practical; and it has since been so modified that even a comparatively modern list of baronies does not quite correspond with the present distribution. The division according to which all taxes upon the county are now apportioned, consists of the county of the town of Carrickfergus, and the 14 baronies of Lower Antrim, Upper Antrim, Lower Belfast, Upper Belfast, Carey, Lower Dunluce, Upper Dunluce, Lower Glenarm, Upper Glenarm, Kilconway, Lower Massarene, Upper Massarene, Lower Toome, and Upper Toome. Tonaghs were a division sometime in use; they have been supposed to correspond to baronies, but were in reality much smaller; and though they partly survive in name, and may be vaguely traced within ill-defined localities, they have long ceased to be recognised by either law or topography. Cinnamon, another antiquated denomination, seems to have corresponded with the Scotch sense of the word barony, designating the estate or territorial possession of a family. Ploughlands, a third obsolete division, were instituted in the reign of Mary, and consisted each of 100 acres. The subdivisions still recognised are half-baronies, constablenicks, and townlands. As the names of the townlands are nearly all Erse, and describe some quality, feature, or physical relation of the lands, their institution may be regarded as somewhat ancient.

In ecclesiastical position and arrangement, the county so nearly coincides with the diocese of Connor, that all the statistics and most of the other details must be stated in our account of the diocese. See CONNOR. Of 76 parishes into which the county is divided, only that of Aghalee is not in Connor; and of all the parishes within the diocese, only those of the Liberties of Coleraine are not in Antrim. In addition to the parishes are the seven granges or extra-parochial little districts of Muckamore, Nalteen, Ballyscullion, Deagh, Shilvoden, Killagan, and Drumtullogh; and all these, excepting Ballyscullion, are also in Connor. But in the population books of 1831, we find only the first three recognised as granges, Killagan entered as a parish, and the other three apparently confounded with the parishes to which they are contiguous or attached; and in the population books of 1841, we find one of the seven entered as a parish, and all the other six as granges, and find also the additional granges of Ballyrobert, Ballywalter, Molusk, Umgall, Innispollan, Layd, Killyglen, Dundermot, and Carmavy. The granges appear to have been appendages of monastic establishments; and, excepting in one or two instances, they are tithe-free.

Towns and Villages.—Named in the order of the baronial divisions, the towns, villages, and principal hamlets are Carrickfergus, the capital of its separate jurisdiction, and the assize-town of the whole county; Broughshane, Kells, Connor, and Henryville, in Lower Antrim; Antrim, Ballyclare, Ballyeaston, Doagh, Fourmileburn, and Parkgate, in Upper Antrim; Ballyclare, Ballinure, Ballycarry, Carnmoney, Whiteabbey, Whitehouse, Glynn, Inverberg, Invermore, and Roughfort, in Lower Belfast; Belfast, Milntown, Dunmurry, Lambeg, Springfield, and Templepatrick, in Upper Belfast; Ballycastle, Bushmills, Ardmoyle, Ballintoy, and Moss-side, in Carey; Portrush and Derryock, in Lower Dunluce; Ballymoney and Stranocum, in Upper Dunluce; Glenarm, Cushendall, Camlough, and Straight-Kelly, in Lower Glenarm; Larne and Oldmillis, in Upper Glenarm; Newtowneromelin, Clough, and Cloughmills, in Kilconway; Massarene, in Lower Massarene; Lisburn, Crumlin, Aghalee, and Glenavy, in Upper Massarene; Ballymena, Portlone, Aghoghilly, Gracehill, Carneaney, Culley-backey, and Galgorm, in Lower Toome; and Randalstown and Toome, in Upper Toome. Carrickfergus, Belfast, Antrim, and Lisburn are corporate towns; and the majority of both the towns and villages are the scenes of markets and fairs.

Statistics.—The prisons of the county are the county gaol at Carrickfergus, the house-of-correction at Belfast, and bridewells at Antrim, Ballymoney, and Ballymena. In 1841, the number of commitments for offences against the person was 80; for violent offences against property, 33; for un-violent offences against property, 529; for malicious offences against property, 1; for offences against the currency, 7; and for offences not included in the above classes, 58;—the number of convictions was 532; of capital punishments, 2; of transportations for 14 years, 10; and of transportations for 7 years, 56;—the number of summary convictions was 104; and of commitments for drunkenness 1,370. The expense of the constabulary force, for 1841, was £11,163. —The county lunatic asylum, situated at Belfast, and the county infirmary at Lisburn, will be noticed in connection with these towns. Workhouses have been provided, or are in the course of being erected, for the several Poor-law unions of Antrim, Ballycastle, Ballymena, Ballymoney, Belfast, Larne, and Lisburn. —The annual amount of the valuation of the county, under 6 and 7 Will. IV., but exclusive of the county of the town of Carrickfergus, is £474,524 17s. 2d. The amount of county cess levied for local purposes, in 1824, was £32,094; in 1834, £45,612; in 1838, £53,256. The county itself sends two members to parliament; and, including Belfast, Lisburn, and Carrickfergus, six members, for a total pop. of 300,875. Constituency, in 1835, 3,933; of whom 622 were £50 freeholders, 437 were £20 freeholders, 2,403 were

£10 freeholders, 73 were £20 leaseholders, 368 were £10 leaseholders, 2 were £50 rent-chargers, and 8 were £20 rent-chargers. Constituency in 1841, 2,157; of whom 288 were £50 freeholders, 213 were £20 freeholders, 1,469 were £10 freeholders, 33 were £20 leaseholders, 165 were £10 leaseholders, and 9 were £20 rent-chargers.—Educational as well as ecclesiastical statistics, as elicited both by the Commission on Public Instruction, and by that on Ecclesiastical Revenues and Patronage, follow the diocesan arrangement, and will be noticed in the article on CONNOR. In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools was 516, of scholars 20,050, of male scholars 11,613, of female scholars 8,118, of scholars whose sex was not specified 319, of scholars connected with the Established church 3,865, of scholars connected with the Presbyterian denominations 11,640, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant Dissenters 430, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 3,785, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 330; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 515, of scholars 20,253, of male scholars 11,718, of female scholars 8,004, of scholars whose sex was not specified 333, of scholars connected with the Established church 3,845, of scholars connected with the Presbyterian denominations 11,644, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant Dissenters 400, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 3,947, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 410.—The statistics which follow, excepting only the statements of population for periods preceding 1841, are all exclusive of BELFAST and CARRICKFERGUS. In 1841, there were 3 inspectors of schools, 310 male school-teachers, 91 female school-teachers, 123 male ushers and tutors, 46 female ushers and tutors, 42 governesses, 3 male teachers of music, 6 female teachers of music; 37 clergymen of the Established church, 13 Methodist ministers, 85 Presbyterian ministers, 2 Moravian ministers, 22 Roman Catholic clergymen, 53 ministers or clergymen whose denominational connection was not specified, 3 missionaries, 4 parish-clerks, and 11 scripture-readers; the total number of males above 5 years of age who could read and write was 57,599, who could read but not write 33,618, who could neither read nor write 24,645; the total number of females above 5 years of age who could read and write 32,707, who could read but not write 60,212, who could neither read nor write 32,943,—and thus the proportions of the three classes of males to one another was nearly as 50, 29, and 21, and of females as 26, 48, and 26; the total number of males attending primary schools was 9,737, and attending superior schools 10,531,—of females attending primary schools was 7,743, and attending superior schools 18,722; the per centage of the male population of 17 years of age and upwards unmarried was 42, married 53, and widowed 5, and of the female population of 17 years of age and upwards, unmarried 41, married 47, and widowed 12.—The population of the county, in 1821, was 262,860; in 1831, 372,938; in 1841, 360,875. Males, in 1821, 125,053; in 1831, 152,178; in 1841, 133,213;—females, in 1821, 137,807; in 1831, 164,731; in 1841, 142,975. Families, in 1831, 59,959; in 1841, 50,910. In 1841, the total of inhabited houses was 47,880, of uninhabited houses 2,674, and of houses in the course of erection 41; the total of families residing in first-class houses was 1,108, in second-class houses 3,519, in third-class houses 21,918, and in fourth-class houses 14,365; the total of families chiefly employed in agriculture was 27,174, in manufactures and trades 20,239. In other pursuits 3,497; the total of families chiefly dependent on property and professions was 1,089, on the directing of labour 20,233, on their own manual labour 28,910, and on means not specified 678; the total of males at 15 years of age and upwards who ministered to food was 45,858, to clothing 18,814, to lodging, &c., 5,070, to health 123, to charity 3, to justice 413, to education 439, to religion 242, and to objects not included in these categories 3,361; the total of females at 15 years of age and upwards who ministered to food was 1,970, to clothing 33,721, to lodging, &c., 78, to health 35, to charity 3, to justice 1, to education 184, to religion 3, and to ends not included in these categories 8,216; and the total of males and females at 15 years of age and upwards who had no specified occupations, was respectively 5,140 and 45,850.

History and Antiquities.—The ancient or uncorrupted name of Antrim is Andruim or Endruim, 'the habitation upon the waters;' a name which probably refers to one locality, where a designation was diffused over the whole county, yet which has been thought expressive of the county's nearly insulated position. The early history of the district is strictly that of the kingdom of DALRIADA [which see]; and the later history is so unconnected, or so generally identified with the towns and strengths, that it must be narrated piecemeal in our notice of celebrated localities. Cairns, cromlechs, pillar-stones, raths, and earthen mounds, all strictly similar to those which prevail from Belfast Lough to Meath, abound along the whole coast, and occur somewhat numerously even in the interior. The most remarkable of the cairns—all of which are rude, and indicate the work of quite a barbarous people—are one on Colin mountain, 3 miles north of Lisburn, one on Slieve True, west of Carrickfergus, and two on Colinward. The chief cromlechs are one near Cairngrayney, one near Ballintoy, and one at the north end of Island Magee. Raths and mounds are so plentiful that no fewer than 237 have been enumerated in the two parishes of Killead and Muckamore; and they are so featureless that only 7, situated at respectively Dunethery, Dundermot, Dunmactal, Dunmaul, Cushendall, Camlent, and Ballykennedy, may be named as in any respect interesting specimens. Archdall enumerates 48 monastic establishments in Antrim, but says that 20 of them had ceased to be known. The only ones which now figure in either ruin or history will be noticed in the articles on Carrickfergus, Woodburn, Glenarm, Kells, Massarene, Muckamore, Whitenabbey, Killead, Rathlin, Ballycastle, and Glynn. The round towers of the county, 4 in number, are situated at Antrim, at Trummery, at Armooy, and in Ram's Island. The chief deserted or ruinous military castles are those of Carrickfergus, Oldfleet or Larne, Dunluce, Dunseveric, Red bay, and Cushendall; and the only modernized and inhabited ones are Shane's castle and Castle-Upton. All these antiquities, as well as any others which deserve notice, will figure in the articles on their respective localities.

ANTRIM, a parish, partly in the south-east corner of the barony of Upper Toome, but chiefly on the southern border of the barony of Upper Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. The barony of Antrim section contains the town of Antrim: see next article. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 8,361 acres, 37 perches, exclusive of 523 acres, 27 perches in Lough Neagh. Pop., in 1831, 5,415; in 1841, 5,182. Houses 953. Area of the Upper Toome section, 3,515 acres. Pop. of that section, in 1831, 1,153; in 1841, 1,350. Houses 265. Area of the rural districts of the Upper Antrim section, 5,253 acres. Pop. of these districts, in 1831, 1,607; in 1841, 1,667. Houses 308. Antrim bay, which forms the north-east horn of Lough Neagh, makes an inward curvature along all the south-west boundary; and Six-mile Water, which separates Upper Antrim from Lower Massarene, traces all the southern boundary. But while most of the parochial surface declines to the inland sea and the Six-mile-Water, part is drained to them by independent brooks, and part impinges westward on the basin of the Maine. The land is, for the most part, excellent, and, though destitute of the natural elements of landscape, is warmed into pleasantness and even luxuriousness of aspect, chiefly by the embellishments of extensive pleasure-grounds, and in a small degree by the operations of husbandry. Antrim-castle, close to the town, and on the margin of Six-mile-Water, is an ancient mansion of the Viscounts Massarene, long much neglected, but improved about 30 years ago, and now the property of the Earl of Ferrard. The demesne, extending between it and Lough Neagh, is rich in old and noble trees, and, in particular, contains gigantic specimens of silver fir. On the west side of the parish stands SHANE'S CASTLE [which see]. East of this, and a little north-north-west of the town, is the demesne of Steeple, remarkable for its round tower, the least dilapidated of the four round towers in the county. This tower is 93 feet in height; and, at a yard from the base, is 53 feet in circumference. Loopholes for the admission of air and light, and orifices in the wall for joists, divide it into three stories. A little above the highest loopholes, which face the cardinal points, the tower tapers in the form of a sugar-loaf. A conical covering of granite, shaped like a cap or bonnet, formerly surmounted the whole; but being shattered, probably by lightning, in 1822, it was taken down, and substituted by a covering of sandstone. At the base of the tower, two rows of stones project about 8 inches; and above these is the door, 4½ feet by 2, surmounted by a stone sculptured in basso-relievo with a cross. In the vicinity of Steeple, are the seats of Spring Farm, Birch-hill, and Holywell. Other objects of interest belong to our notice of the town, and to the article on Lough Neagh.—This parish is a vicarage and a separate benefice in the dio. of Connor. Vicarial tithe composition and gross income, £279 4s. 2d.; nett, £234 13s. 11½d. Patron, the Marquis of Donegal. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £318 18s. 8d., and belong to the patron, but are leased to Lord Ferrard. The parish church, an edifice with small Gothic windows, was built in 1596 at an unknown cost, and enlarged in 1816 by means of a donation of £401 from Lord Ferrard, and a loan of £1,384 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 350; attendance 300. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses are attended by respectively 800 and 225; a Wesleyan and Primitive Wesleyan, each by 75; a Quakers', by 18; and a Roman Catholic, by 700; and the last has two officiates who officiate also in Drumal and Connor churches. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 750 Churchmen, 3,421 Presbyterians, 120 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,252 Roman Catholics. In the same year, 11 daily schools had on their books 351 boys and 187 girls; and 2 Sunday schools had 320 children. One of the daily schools, free and for females, was aided with £27 10s. a-year from the Board of Erasmus Smith; another, free and for boys, was aided with £30 from the same source, and £2 from the vicar; and another, for infants, was aided with £15 from subscriptions. In 1840, the National Board gave small salaries to 3 schools at Antrim, Creavery, and Rathmore; and granted respectively £74 3s. 4d., and

ANTRIM, a post and market town, the capital of two baronies, the nominal but unreal capital of its county, and formerly a parliamentary borough, stands on the right bank of the Six-mile-Water, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile above the river's influx to Lough Neagh, 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ north-west of Belfast, and 103 north of Dublin. It consists principally of a continuous Main-street, extending half-a-mile east and west; a street straggling upwards of one-fourth of a mile southward, but up the margin of the river, from near the middle of Main-street; an alley, called Paddy's Lane, leading a furlong northward on the way to Kells; and a street called Bow Lane, deflecting northward from the entrance to Antrim-castle demesne, and running $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile along the road to Ballymena. Though well situated for commanding the trade on Lough Neagh, and serving as a depot and central market to an extensive agricultural district, it enjoys little consideration, and has lost nearly all of the ancient consequence which rendered it a successful competitor with Carrickfergus for the metropolitan honours of the county. Yet it is rather a languishing than a decayed town; and might still, with a little enterprise, retrieve much of its quondam importance. The market-house in the centre of the main street is, at least in its uses, a sort of medley of public buildings. The old Gothic parochial church, renovated and surmounted by a steeple, draws attention. A work-house for the Poor-law union, of which the town is the head, was contracted for on November 9th, 1840,—to occupy an area of 6 acres, 13 perches,—to contain accommodation for 700 persons, and to cost £5,580 in building and completion, and £1,473 15s. 7d. in fittings and contingencies. In 1839-40, a dispensary in the town received £72, expended £83 2s. 6d., administered to 1,700 patients, and had a district containing a population of 7,213. The bridewell of the town, though serving for a considerable circumjacent country, is a wretched little cluster of filthy barbarous cells, under the Market-house, and fronting the market-place. An iron railing encloses it from the thoroughfare; a narrow space between this and the cell-doors is an apology for an airing-yard, and serves for both males and females; the cell for male prisoners is both day-room and night-room, and has two deal bedsteads, the one over the other; a small cell for drunkards adjoins, and holds fast for 48 hours each convicted drunkard who cannot pay the adjudged fine; and the cell for females, situated at the other end, corresponds in every respect with the general character of the establishment. We could copy from the Report before us some other dismal features of the place, but are driven to forbearance by sheer disgust. The town has two paper-mills, an extensive brewery, a considerable share in the linen manufacture, and some interest in bleaching and hose-making. Its public conveyances, in 1838, were 2 caravans, and 3 cars to Belfast, and coaches, cars, and a caravan in transit from Belfast to Ahoghill, Ballymena, Coleraine, Cookstown, Kileas, Randalstown, Portlengonea, Magherafelt, and Londonderry. A branch of the Ulster bank was established here in 1836. A grain market is held on every Tuesday, a general market on every Thursday, and fairs on January 1st, May 12th, and November 12th; but both markets and fairs are of small value.

The Antrim Poor-law union ranks as the 107th, and was declared on May 13th, 1840. It lies all in co. Antrim, and comprehends an area of 106,343 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 47,058. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are,

Antrim, 6,060; Seacash, 1,849; Ballinadrenthagh, 1,514; Ballyrobin, 1,800; Dundesert, 1,924; Crumlin, 2,360; Templepatrick, 2,068; Craigargan, 2,311; Ballylinny, 1,880; Ballyclare, 3,763; Rashes, 1,567; Kilbride, 1,710; Donegore, 3,370; Connor, 2,211; Shilwodan, 1,948; Sharvogue, 2,127; Randalstown, 3,311; Cranfield, 2,630; and Cargin, 2,335. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 8 and 24; and of the latter, 3 are returned by Antrim divisions, 2 by each of the divisions of Ballyclare, Donegore, and Randalstown, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of property rated is £100,857 15s.; the total number of persons rated is 9,301; and the total of such persons whose valuation does not exceed £1, is 2,505,—does not exceed £2, is 1,470,—does not exceed £3, is 557,—does not exceed £4, is 452,—and does not exceed £5, is 372. The workhouse, as contracted for, was to be completed in October 1841, but was not opened for the admission of paupers on even February 6th, 1843; and the total expenses of the union up to the latter date, amounted to £300 7s. 10d. The only medical charities are 4 dispensaries at Antrim, Crumlin, Doagh, and Randalstown; serving for an area of 138,552 acres, with a pop. of 43,741; and exhibiting, in 1839-40, an income and expenditure of respectively £346 10s. 6d., and £356 18s. 3d.

Antrim, like almost every other old town in Ireland, affects to begin its history with a monastery, or church, founded either by St. Patrick, or by one of his disciples. The date claimed in its case is 495, or some such high antiquity; and the founder is now St. Patrick, now St. Aodh, and now St. Durtact. If any early religious establishment existed—and very probably there did—it is not traceable in record later than the year 766. A periodical writer, who follows Camden as his authority, views St. Durtact as the founder, and seems disposed to connect the ecclesiastical edifice with the round tower described in our notice of the parish, says, "A few years ago, in removing some old houses in the vicinity of the tower, extensive foundations and many human bones were discovered, which would lead us to conclude this to have been the site of the abbey mentioned by Camden. This is the more likely, as our towers always stand near some ancient place of worship." From 1663 till the Union, the town sent two members to parliament; but it was simply a pocket-borough of the Skeffington or Massarene family; and the Union compensation of £15,000 for the loss of its franchise, was, without the annexation of any condition, divided in equal shares among four of the Skeffingtons.—Sir Robert Savage, at the head of a small party of English, is said to have slain in one day near Antrim 3,000 of the Irish; and, according to Clarkson, he prepared for the engagement by priming each of his soldiers with wine and ale, and spreading out a profuse banquet of mutton, beef, and venison for the refection of the party who should conquer,—a rather notable instance, if true, of Englishmen fighting best with Dutch courage, and amid the steam of savoury viands! In 1640, the town was burnt by General Monroe; and, in fact, from 1600 till near the close of last rebellion, it was the scene of a doleful series of burnings, murders, and battles. As the last action of its sanguinary celebrity is usually called "a dreadful engagement," and "one of the severe contests which occurred during the unhappy civil disturbances of 1798," we choose to narrate it in the words of Gordon:—"The disaffected," says he, "remained quiet in the north till news arrived of a seditious commotion in the county of Wexford, with three victories in succession over the royal army. Expecting that their example would be followed throughout the province, a considerable number assembled in the vicinity of Antrim, on the 7th of June, with design to seize the magistrates, who had appointed on that day a meeting there; and, making their attack at two o'clock in the afternoon, rendered themselves very nearly masters of the town. But they were dislodged by a body of troops, with artillery, under General Nugent, and pursued with the slaughter of perhaps nearly two hundred; not without the loss of about 30 royalists, among whom was Lord O'Neill, a descendant of the ancient dynasts of Ulster, so formidable to the English government till the end of Elizabeth's reign. The routed insurgents, in common with two or three other small beaten parties, afterwards assembled on Donnegar-hill; and, learning that the movements in Wexford were actually a war against Protestantism, they threw down their arms in despair or disgust, and dispersed to their several homes."

The Commissioners on Municipal Corporations report that the limits of the borough could not be well ascertained, but were confined to the townland of Antrim, which extends not more than an English mile along the old road to Ballymena; that a seneschal, appointed by the Marquis of Donegal, to one of whose ancestors the manor was granted, held a local court in the borough; that the administration of the seneschal was the subject of much complaint, and deserved minute inquiry and detailed observation; that county quarter-sessions were held thrice a-year, and petty-sessions once a-fortnight; that there was no local police, and no legal provision acted on for lighting or watching the town; and that the alleged privileges of a weighmaster, appointed but not sworn by Lord Ferrard, appeared to have interfered with a project of a committee of the inhabitants for the establishment and regulation of an extensive grain-market. The town's portion of church-rate for the year ending at Easter, 1836, was £17 10s. 5½d.; and its proportion of county cess for the year ending at the Lent assizes, in 1836, was £108 5s. 5d. Area of the town, 116 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,655; in 1841, 2,393. Houses 442. A suburb called Massarene stands in Muckamore Grange, barony of Lower Massarene. Pop., in 1841, including that suburb, 2,645. Houses 501.

ANTRIM (LOWER), a barony in co. Antrim, Ulster. It is bounded on the west by Upper and Lower Toome, and on the north by Kilconway; and is drained westward by the Broad and Glenwherry rivers, and over some distance along the western boundary by the Maine. Its area is 80,827 acres. It contains all the territory of Glenwherry, all the parishes of Ballyclug, Connor, Rathcavin, and Skerry, and part of the parish of Abohigill. Its annual valuation, under the Poor-law Act, is £27,602 15s. 7d., and the sums levied from it under the grand warrants of spring and summer, 1840, were respectively £2,311 7s. 8d., and £2,181 3s. 11d. Pop., in 1831, 21,549; in 1841, 25,135. Houses 4,362. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,439; in manufactures and trades, 1,888; in other pursuits, 177. Males at and above five years of age, who could read and write, 5,329; who could read but not write, 3,626; who could neither read nor write, 1,601. Females at and above five years of age, who could read and write, 2,585; who could read but not write, 6,540; who could neither read nor write, 2,114.

ANTRIM (UPPER), a barony in co. Antrim, Ulster. It is bounded on the south by Lough Neagh and Lower Massarene; and on the south-east, and partly on the east, by the two baronies of Belfast. Its chief drain is the Six-mile Water, along its southeastern and southern boundary. Its area is 36,493 acres. It contains part of the parish of Antrim, the whole of the parishes of Ballyeaston, Donegore, Kilbride, and Raashee, and the whole of the granges of Doagh and Nalteen. Its annual valuation, under the Poor-law Act, is £24,473 10s. 4d.; and the sums levied under the spring and summer grand warrants of 1840, were £1,608 18s., and £1,624 10s. 2d. Pop., in 1831, 15,644; in 1841, 15,629. Houses 2,803. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,417; in manufactures and trades, 1,287; in other pursuits, 244. Males at and above five years of age, who could read and write, 3,914; who could read but not write, 1,867; who could neither read nor write, 763. Females at and above five years of age who could read and write, 2,528; who could read but not write, 3,549; who could neither read nor write, 904.

ANY. See ANKY.

ARAGLIN, or ARRIGLAN, a romantic dell on the verge of the parish of Macollop, barony of Coshmore, co. Waterford, Munster. Near it are the ruins of an ancient castle. The glen, now remarkable only for its scenery, was formerly noted for its iron-works. Forges were erected about 70 years ago for the making of bar iron; and furnaces were, for some time previous, in operation for cast-iron.

ARAGLIN (THE), or ARRIGLAN, a rivulet which traverses the glen just noticed, bisects part of the co. Cork, barony of Condons and Clangibbon, and falls into the Blackwater, 3 miles below Fermoy. Its direction is westerly, and its length of course between 8 and 10 miles.

ARAN. See ARRAN.

ARBELA, a small village in the parish of Ballymacelligott, barony of Trughenackny, co. Kerry, Munster. It is 3 miles from Tralee, and 6 from Castle-Island. Near it are the mansions of Arbela, Ratanny, Chute Hall, and Ballyseedy, and the ruins of Ballycarthy and Kilfin castles.

ARBOE, a parish, 5 miles north-east of Stewartstown, and partly in the barony of Loughlinsholin, co. Londonderry, but chiefly in that of Dunganon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 12,504 acres. But the Ordnance Survey assigns to it 21,000 acres in Lough Neagh, so as to make the nominal area amount to 33,504 acres. Area of the Londonderry section, 1,358 acres; of the Tyrone section, 32,146 acres. Pop., in 1831, 8,148; in 1841, 8,005. Houses 1,467. Pop. of the Londonderry section, in 1831, 765; in 1841, 775. Houses 129. Pop. of the Tyrone section, in 1831, 7,383; in 1841, 7,230. Houses 1,338. The surface is low ground along the west shore of Lough Neagh, and slowly declines to the lake. The general quality of the land is good. A monastery in the parish is said to have been founded by St. Colman, to have afterwards contained his mortal remains, and to have been destroyed by fire in 1166. The walls of the church, and a cross bearing several inscriptions, are still standing; and the former are sufficiently picturesque to apologize for the traditional assertion that the monastery was great and opulent.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £507 12s. 1d.; glebe, £276. Gross income, £773 12s. 1d.; nett, £675 12s. 7d. Patron, Trinity college, Dublin. A curate is employed at a salary of £75. The church was built about the year 1710. Sittings 250; attendance 175. A meeting-house, formerly Secessional, but now belonging to the General Assembly, is attended by from 150 to 300. A Roman Catholic chapel, and two alternately used altars in the open air, have two officiates, and are attended, the former by from 1,000 to 1,200, and the latter by from 300 to 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 950 Churchmen, 1,625 Presbyterians, 14 other Protestant dissenters, and 5,727 Roman Catholics; 10 daily schools had on their books 464 boys and 285 girls; and 4 Sunday schools had an attendance of from 385 to 455. Four of the daily schools were in connection with the London Hibernian Society; and one acting on the rules of the Kildare Place Society, was aided with £6 19s. 2d.

AIRCANY (THE), or ERKENNY, an affluent eastward of the river Nore, district of Upper Ossory, Queen's co., Leinster. It abounds in pike, trout, and cray fish. Its name is said by Dr. Ledwich to be derived from Arcan, 'a pig,' and to allude to the peculiar sound of the stream's motion.

ARCH, a magnificent cavern or natural tunnel near the coast-guard station of Port Furling, and about 8 miles from that of Balderic, on the coast of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It is about 30 feet in height, a cable's length from end to end, and so narrow that a boat can pass along only with reefed oars, and it perforates a trap rock which rises almost vertically to the altitude of probably 600 feet. The tunnel can be safely passed through at half-tide and in moderate weather.

ARDAGH, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Imokilly, 4½ miles north-north-west of Youghal, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, nearly 3½; area, 7,800 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,658; in 1841, 2,552. Houses 398. The river Toorig runs southward and eastward through the centre, on its way to the Blackwater. Whitebog, the only moss, is an excellent turbary. Nearly one-half of the land can be tilled or disposed in meadow, and the remainder is upland, heathy, and pastoral. Limestone and sea-manure are so near, cheap, and abundant, as greatly to facilitate improvement. The road from Youghal to Fermoy crosses a southern wing of the interior.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £600. Gross income, £607; nett, £534 18s. 9d. Patron, the Crown. The church is so old that neither date nor cost is known. Sittings 80; attendance 6. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 1,400 to 1,800; and has two officiates, who officiate also at Killeagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 2,747; and 3 daily schools,—one of which was aided with £2 18s. from Lord Ponsonby, and another with £5 from that nobleman, and £8 from the National Board—had on their books 137 boys and 73 girls. In 1840, the National Board salaried a school at Inch with £8, and one at Park with £6; and granted £87 13s. 4d. toward the building and fitting up of a boys' school and a girls' school at Inch.

ARDAGH, a parish, 5 miles west of Rathkeale, and partly in the barony of Glenquin, but chiefly in that of Shanid, co. Limerick, Munster. The Shanid section contains the village of Ardagh. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 9,030 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,197; in 1841, 2,223. Houses 342. Area of the Glenquin section, 626 acres. Pop., in 1841, 300. Houses 47. The western district of the parish, comprising a considerable part of the whole area, is a belt of the broad congeries of rugged mountain, which stretches away hence into Kerry, and bears, in this portion of it, the name of the Hill of Ardagh. The rest of the surface consists chiefly of good arable land. The village of Ardagh is situated at the foot of Ardagh-hill, about 4 miles north of Newcastle, and 6½ south-south-west of Askeaton. Area 37 acres. Pop., in 1831, 415; in 1841, 386. Houses 64. Fairs are held on May 11, Aug. 14, and Nov. 21. The village has a branch of the Abbeyfale dispensary.—Ardagh parish is a rectory in the dio. of Limerick, and forms part of the benefice of St. Michael's, and corps of the archdeaconry of Limerick. See MICHAEL'S (ST.) Tithe composition, £184 12s. 3½d. The curate of Rathronan performs, within the parish, occasional duties. The Roman Catholic chapel has two officiates, and an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 13, and the Roman Catholics to 2,275; and two National schools, salaried at £18 and £12, had on their books 95 boys and 83 girls. In 1840, there was a third National school.

ARDAGH, a parish in the barony of Tyrawley, 2½ miles west-south-west of Ballina, co. Mayo, Connaught. It lies round the head of Lough Conn, and is drained into that lake by the river Deel. Many vantage-grounds within its limits command magnificent views of the expansive isleted sheet of water, and its noble further-screen of the Nephin mountains. DEEL-CASTLE [which see] is in the parish. A portion of the land is waste. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 5,494 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,813; in 1841, 2,621. Houses 450.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Killlalla, and forms part of the benefice of Ardagh or Kilmoremorey. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £55 7s. 8d.; and the latter are appropriated to the prebendary of Ardagh and vicars choral of Christ's church and St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. The parishes which, jointly with Ardagh, constitute the benefice, are BALLINAHAGLISH, KILBELFAD, KILMOREMOY, ATTVMASS, and KILGARVEY: see these articles. Length of the union, 9 miles; breadth, 8. Gross income, £1,015 9s.; nett, £919 10s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church, situated in Ardagh, was built in 1763, at an unknown cost, and enlarged, in 1815, by means of a loan of £1,292 6s. 1½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 800; average attendance 350. The Roman Catholic and dissenting chapels are in Kilmoremorey, Ballinahaglish, Kilbelfad, Attvmass, and Kilgarvey parishes. In 1834, there were in the parish of Ardagh 99 Churchmen, 4 Protestant dissenters, and 1,844 Roman Catholics; and in the united parishes 1,260 Churchmen, 5 Presbyterians, 46 other Protestant dissenters, and 33,811 Roman Catholics. In the same year a daily school in Ardagh, salaried with £12 from the Baptist Society, had on its books 60 boys and 30 girls; and 32 daily schools in the union had 628 boys and 492 girls. The town of BALLINA [which see] contributes largely to the union statistics.

ARDAGH, a parish partly in the barony of Morgallion, but chiefly in that of Lower Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. It lies 4½ miles north-east of Nobber, along the northern border of Meath, and declines northward to the Lagan, an affluent of the Glyde. The land is in general good. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Morgallion section, 1,311 acres; of the Slane section, 2,358 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,408; in 1841, 2,518. Houses 469. Pop. of the Morgallion section, in 1831, 854; in 1841, 872. Houses 165. Pop. of the Slane section, in 1831, 1,574; in 1841, 1,646. Houses 504.—This parish is a rectory and a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Meath. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £205 6s. 5½d., and appropriated to the see of Meath. Gross income of the curacy, £105 17s. 8d.; nett, £101 17s. 8d. The church was built in 1804 by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 20 to 40. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by about 800, and shares with Drumcraugh chapel the services of one officiate. In 1831, the Protestants amounted to 136, and the Roman Catholics to 2,351; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 65 boys and 15 girls.

ARDAGH, a small district comprehending within its limits a considerable bog, in the half-barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway, Connaught. Ardagh-house, and the high grounds of Ardagh, are situated 2½ miles south-south-west of Ballymoe. The bog is associated in Mr. Griffith's report with that of Springfield. The two have jointly an area of 3,795 English acres. They are bounded on the north by the northern branch of the Ballyhague river; on the east by the high ridge of Ardagh; and on the west by the high grounds of Templetocher and Strangefort. They have an average depth of 16 feet, and are very much elevated above the level of the southern branch of the Ballyhague river. Estimated cost of reclamation, £4,313 6s. 5d.

ARDAGH, a barony in co. Longford, Leinster. Named from north-west round by east and south, the baronies which surround it are Longford, Granard, Moygoish, Abbeysruel, and Moydow,—the third in Westmeath, and the rest in Longford. It contains the whole of the parishes of Edgeworthstown and Rathrea, and part of the parishes of Ardagh, Ballycormick, Clonbroney, Granard, Kilglass, Street, and Templemichael. Area, 40,223 acres. Pop., in 1831, 19,899; in 1841, 19,917. Houses 3,180. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,366; in manufactures and trade, 887; in other pursuits, 382. Males of five years and upwards who could read and write, 3,696; who could read but not write, 1,672; who could neither read nor write, 3,408. Females at and above five years of age who could read and write, 1,759; who could read but not write, 2,592; who could neither read nor write, 4,516.

ARDAGH, a parish, containing a village of the same name, and lying partly in the barony of Moydow, but chiefly in that of Ardagh, co. Longford, Leinster. The land is in general good. Ardagh-hill links with the most westerly of the Slieve Gauldry chain of heights; and Ardagh village and mansion, situated at its base—the latter the seat of Sir G. R. Fetherston, Bart.—are conspicuous objects on the edge of the large adjacent plain. Length of the parish, 6 miles; breadth, 3; area, 11,417 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,586; in 1841, 4,524. Houses 707. Pop. of the Moydow section, in 1831, 755; in 1841, 817. Houses 135. Pop. of the rural districts of the Ardagh section, in 1831, 3,631; in 1841, 3,542. Houses 543.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Ardagh, and constitutes the corps of Ardagh deanery. Tithe composition, £482 5s. 6d. Gross income, £499 3s. 7d., besides £159 13s. 2½d. of fines and rents as dean; nett, £399 6s., besides £151 13s. 7d. as dean. Patron, the Crown. A curate has a stipend of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built in 1809, by means of a loan of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 190. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 1,056, and has three officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 256, and the Roman Catholics to 4,383; a Sunday school had 89 scholars; and nine daily schools—one of which was aided with £40, and some perquisites from the dean of Ardagh, and another with £15 from the dean, and £5 from the Ardagh Society—had on their books 333 boys and 199 girls. In 1840, the National Board aided a school at Longhill with a salary of £12, and made a grant of £82 toward the building and fitting up of a school at Ravouldron.

THE VILLAGE OF ARDAGH stands in the Ardagh section of the above parish, nearly in the centre of the county, 2½ miles south-south-west of Edgeworthstown, and 5½ south-east by east of Longford. Though a very ancient place, and the seat of a diocese, it is now a mere hamlet. No traces of architectural splendour remain. All that existed of the cathedral, even when Harris wrote his continuation of Ware, was a part of a wall so built as to indicate that the undilapidated edifice had been very small. The poet Goldsmith, when a young man, once loitered on his way between Ballymahon and Edgeworthstown, strayed from the direct road, and found himself benighted on the street of Ardagh. Wishing to find an inn, but inquiring "for the best house in the place," he was wilfully misunderstood by a wag, and directed to the large old-fashioned residence of Sir Ralph Fetherston. The baronet, whom the poet found seated by a good fire in the parlour, immediately perceived the young man's mistake; and being a humourist and well-acquainted with Goldsmith's family, he for some time encouraged the deception. The incidents of the occasion form the ground-work of the poet's well-known comedy—'Mistakes of a Night.' Fairs are held at Ardagh on April 5 and Aug. 24. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 142; in 1841, 165. Houses 29.

THE BISHOPRIC OF ARDAGH is generally supposed to have been founded by St. Patrick, the indefatigable evangelist, whose labours won over the great bulk of the nation to the Catholic faith. St. Patrick, says the current story, founded both the see and an abbey about the year 454; and first St. Moel, and afterwards his brother St. Melchus, disciples and nephews of St. Patrick, held the joint office of bishop and abbot. The bishopric now very opportunely drops out of view of the historiographers, and does not re-appear till the commencement of the 13th century. From 1217 till 1603, a list of truly Milesian names—among which appear O'Tormag, O'Heothy, and Magsambradhan—is preserved in testimony of a regular succession of bishops. From 1603 till 1742, though twice in the interval made separate, and held, per se, during the life of one bishop, the see was united to that of Kilmore. From 1742 till 1833, though all lying within the province of Armagh, it was held in commendam by the archbishops of Tuam; and by the act of 1833, it was consolidated with Elphin and Kilmore. The gross amount of episcopal revenue is £3,186 2s. 6½d.; the nett amount is £2,977 11s. 3d. The diocese has a dean, an archdeacon, and 4 rural deans, but no chapter. The dean's revenues are identical with those of the benefice of Ardagh; and the honours of the archdeacon are, in all respects, merely nominal. The diocese is 61 statute miles long, and from 5 to 18 broad; and comprehends an area of 371,930 acres. Reckoning its parishes as 27 in number, though ecclesiastically they are 28, twenty-two of them are in Longford, seven in Leitrim, three in Westmeath, three in Cavan, one in Roscommon, and one in Sligo. The 38 parishes are disposed in 26 benefices of one parish each, and 6 of united parishes. Gross income of the benefices, £14,028 0s. 1½d.; nett, £12,213 0s. 4½d. Twenty-six curates are employed, one each in 11 benefices, and two or more in 5 benefices; and they have aggregately an income of £1,981 16s. 1½d. Thirty-five churches and chapels-of-ease exist in 25 of the benefices, and have aggregately 9,151 sittings. The other places of worship, are 60 Roman Catholic, 2 Presbyterian, and 9 Wesleyan Methodist. In 1834, the population consisted of 17,702 members of the Established church, 466 Presbyterians, 12 other Protestant dissenters, and 195,056 Roman Catholics,—in all, 213,236. In the same year, 15 schools of the London Hibernian Society, 3 of the Board of Erasmus Smith, 6 of the Society for Discountenancing Vice, 21 of the National Board, 65 aided or supported by endowment or subscription, and 190 supported wholly by fees,—in all, 300 daily schools, had on their books 12,539 boys and 7,921 girls.

The Roman Catholic diocese of Ardagh is distributed into 43 parishes: three of these, Ballymahon, Moate, and Caulry, are bishops' parishes, and are served by the diocesan and 3 curates; and the others are served by 40 officiates, and 46 coadjutor officiates. A splendid Roman Catholic cathedral, of pure Grecian architecture, is nearly or just completed for the diocese at Longford. The diocese is divided into four districts, in each of which there are four theological conferences, conducted in general by the bishop, but occasionally by his authorized substitutes. An official Roman Catholic report says that "religious libraries and Christian doctrine confraternities are in almost every parish;" that, "with two exceptions, every parish in the diocese has one or more newly-built and well-slatted chapels;" that "nightwakes no longer exhibit the disgusting scenes which heretofore disgraced the country parts of Ireland;" and that "party quarrels have entirely ceased, and secret societies are happily banished from the different parishes of this widely extended diocese." The only convent seems to be a Franciscan one in Athlone.

ARDAMINE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Ballaghkeen, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains the village of RIVER-CHAPEL: which see. Length, 3 miles, breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,215 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,535; in 1841, 1,705. Houses 286. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 1,457. Houses 234. The land is of inferior quality. On the road from Gorey to River-Chapel, is one of the most perfect raths or moates in Ireland. It consists of a cupola or half-sphere of clay, surmounting the platform, about half an English acre in area of an artificial mound. On the north side of the platform is a rude erect stone-cross; and adjoining the moat is the ancient cemetery of Ardamine. The mound, it is thought, has never been opened; but is traditionally reported in the neighbourhood to contain a stone-chamber.—This parish is an inappropriate rectory in the dio. of Fermus. The tithes are compounded for £190, and belong to H. K. G. Morgan, Esq. The perpetual curacy of Ardamine comprises both this inappropriate parish and the adjoining one of KILLENAGH: which see. Length of the union, 3 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$. Gross income, £76 3s. 6d.; nett, £32 0s. 7d. Patron, H. K. G. Morgan, Esq. The church was built in 1829, by means of a grant of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance 104. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 2,000; and shares with the chapel of Donaghmore the services of two officiates. In 1834, the parish contained 265 Protestants, and 1,282 Roman Catholics; and the union 388 Protestants, and 1,920 Roman Catholics. In the same year, 2 day-schools in the parish were attended by 10 boys and 16 girls; three in the union, by 23 boys and 40 girls; and a Sunday school, under the superintendence of the curate, by 13 boys and 24 girls.

ARDANDRIDGE. See ARDCANDRIE.

ARDARA, a quoad sacra parish on the coast of the barony of Bannagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. The parish consists of portions of the civil parishes of KILLYBEGS and INNISKEEL, [see these articles,] comprises a large part of the rugged upland sea-board between the bays of Guibarra and Donegal, and is deeply indented near its centre by the bays of Loughrisbeg and Loughbrismore. By far the greater part of the surface is rocky or shallow-soiled mountain, with large and numerous interspersions of bog. The broken and deeply cut shore possesses little or no scenic beauty; and, excepting in a few cultivated spots around the village of Ardara, presents few patches of even softness or verdure. Various mountain-paths are traversable in summer; and tolerably good roads lead, in one direction, toward Killybegs, and in another toward Lifford. Woodhill, close to the village, is the only mansion. Ardara village stands within the quoad civilia parish of Lower Killybegs, at the head of the long, narrow peninsula formed by Loughrisbeg and Loughbrismore; and is distant 5 miles from Narin and 8 from Inver. Area, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 456; in 1841, 603. Houses 102. The OWESCOCKER and the OWENEA [which see] fall into Loughrisbeg, the former a little below the village, and the latter a mile above. In Ardara is a branch of the Killybegs and Ardara dispensary. See KILLYBEGS. The village of Glenties, within the parish, and 5 miles from Ardara, is the head of a Poor-law union. See GLENTIES. Length of the parish, 10 miles; breadth, $9\frac{1}{2}$; area, 16,000 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,154.—This parish is a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Raphoe. Gross income, £90; nett, £70. Patron, alternately the incumbent of Killybegs, and the incumbent of Inniskeel. The church was built on the site of a former one in 1833, at the cost of £600, gifted by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 330; attendance 300. The Roman Catholic chapel is the sole care of one officiate, and has an attendance of 1,000. A schoolhouse, used as a Wesleyan place of worship, is attended by 40. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 1,206, and the Roman Catholics to 5,180; a Wesleyan Sunday school was attended by 29 boys and 38 girls; and 4 daily schools—one of which was aided with £24 from the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and another with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's fund—had on their books 229 boys and 99 girls. In 1840, the National Board salaried a school at Ardara with £10, and one at Cronyabai with £2; and granted £7 10s. toward the building and fitting up of a girls' school at Ardara.

ARDBEAR, an arm of the sea, stretching up to Clifden, and forming a beautiful natural harbour, in Cunnemara, or the barony of Ballinahinech, co. Galway, Connaught. It is the more northerly, while Mannin bay is the more southerly, of the inner indentations of the large, isleted, and ramified bay which sweeps round between Achris and Slyne Heads. South of Tarbert Isle, are the rocks of Carrigaroan, usually whitened by a heavy breaker, and marking the entrance to Ardbear harbour. The channel on the south side of these rocks is confronted by them with bold cliffs, and is the usual passage; but a good though narrow channel on the north side is available in southerly winds. The seaman, passing the rocks of Carrigaroan, brings Clifden Castle just clear of Renard Point, and is guided by it free from all the rocks toward Mannin bay. A little past the narrows, a spit of sand on the north side, covers an excellent anchorage in 6 or 8 fathoms, opposite the castle. Further up, the inlet divides into two parts. The southern one of these has a bar of one fathom at its entrance; it affords, over some space within, both deep and safe anchorage; and in the upper part is rocky, but has a good salmon fishery. The northern division is dry at low water, but takes up the tide 12 feet deep to Clifden quay; it presents, a mile below Clifden, a good landing-place [see DOONEG]; it afterwards narrows with a deep passage, between rocks; and it then opens in a completely landlocked basin of 20 acres, overlooked by CLIFDEN: which see. The harbour is much frequented by the revenue cruisers.

ARDBRACCAN, a parish in the barony of Lower Navan $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains part of the village of BOHERMEEN: which see. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 4; area, 6,491 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,798; in 1841, 4,596. Houses 678. Pop. of the rural districts in 1841, 3,884. Houses 536. The land is, for the most part, arable and good. The surface, in common with that of five contiguous parishes with which it is ecclesiastically united, is a luxuriant plain, skirted along the west with bog, and relieved in its flatness principally by a richly wooded and conspicuous hill, having somewhat the form of an obtusely truncated cone. A white limestone, quarried on the lauds of Arilbraccan, is peculiarly suitable for embellished architecture: it is purely white when chiselled, and assumes a dark greyish tint when polished; it becomes blackish when long exposed to the air, but can be restored by chiselling; and, unlike much of the building-stone in Ireland, it neither absorbs water, nor contracts a green hue from nurturing the growth of lichens. Ardraccan, "the knoll of Braccan," is said to have been, in 650, made the site of a religious establishment by St. Braccan. The saint, whether Culdee or whatever else, is in the usual style represented as having made the affair both a see and an abbey; and he currently figures in story as the first of a line of local bishops and abbots. The religious house, whether cathedral or abbey, or both, or neither, was often plundered and burned by hostile dynasts and by Danes; and is said to have partly fallen to the ground in 1170. The see was one of several small bishoprics which became consolidated into the see of Meath. A "strong castle"—at least an edifice designated such in a scarce pamphlet which details many events of the rebellion of 1641—was, from an early period, the episcopal residence of this great diocese. Arilbraccan-house, the successor of the castle, and the present episcopal palace of Meath, was built since 1766 from designs by James Wyatt, Esq., and is regarded, for beauty and splendour, as the second edifice of its class in Ireland. It is composed of the Ardraccan limestone; consists of a main building and two wings, connected by circular walls and niches; and combines the magnificence of the palace with the comfort of the English mansion. The circumjacent demesne is extensive, and highly as well as tastefully embellished; and, among various beautiful trees and shrubs, it contains some cedars of Lebanon and other exotics, planted by the oriental traveller Pococke during the time of his being bishop of Meath. A small, ill-designed, and ill-sculptured slab in the churchyard of the parish does burlesquing duty as a monument to Bishop Pococke. The tomb of George Montgomery, bishop of Meath and Clogher, stands on the north side of the slab; and strongly fixes attention by its minglement of pretension, barbarousness, and absurdity. Figures which it exhibits of the bishop, his wife, and his daughter, are the rudest productions of the chisel that can well be conceived. Beneath the figures are the words, "Surgens morieris, judicaberis." On the east side is a bust, with three plumes surmounted by a mitre; above the mitre is a cup, with a representation of the Roman Catholic sacramental wafer; and beneath the bust are two swords, laid across each other, and intersprinkled with fleurs-de-lis. On the west side is an angel blowing a trumpet, and a shield charged with armorial bearings, and surmounted also with a cup and the Roman Catholic wafer. An old square tower near this masterpiece of absurdity is surmounted by a spire and a vane, and forms a noticeable object in the plain.

Arilbraccan is a rectory in the dio. of Meath; and, together with the vicarage of MARTRY, the chapelry of CHURCHTOWN, and the rectories of LISCAVIN, RATAINE, and CLONMACDUFF, [see these articles,] forms the benefice of Arilbraccan. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 5½. Gross income, £890 11s. 1½d.; nett, £686 17s. 4d. Patron, the Crown. A curate has a stipend of £100, a house, and upwards of 19 acres of laud. The church is a homely structure, rather in the domestic than in the architectural style; and contains, in the interior, an episcopal throne. It was built in 1777 by means partly of a donation of unknown amount from Bishop Maxwell, and partly of a contribution of £369 4s. 7½d. from the parish. Sittings 350; attendance, from 160 to 200. A Roman Catholic chapel at Bohermeen is attended by 2,000, and one at Boyerstown by 800; and, along with Courtown chapel in Rathboyne parish, are under the care of two officiates. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also at Churchtown. In 1834, there were in the parish 311 Protestants, and 3,613 Roman Catholics; and, in the union, 391 Protestants, and 6,517 Roman Catholics. In the same year, there were in the parish, the Arilbraccan free-school, aided with £8 from the bishop, and £22, house and garden, from the rector, and attended by 84,—the Boyerstown free-school, aided with £2 10s. from Lord Ludlow, £2 10s. from bequest by Rev. Mr. Branningan, P.P., and £15 from subscription, and attended by 211,—the Bohermeen free-school, aided with £3 5s., a house and garden, and attended by 161,—and two hedge-schools, attended by 10 and 45; and the only other school in the union was one in Churchtown.

ARDCANDRIES,* a parish in the barony of West Shelmalier, 3½ miles west-north-west of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, three-fourths of a mile; area, 1,227 acres. Pop., in 1831, 242; in 1841, 286. Houses 44. The river Slaney flows along the east; and is here pleasing in its scenery. Ardcandries-house, the seat of G. K. Morgan, Esq., figures well in an extensive and variegated landscape, seen from the bank of the Slaney or the road to Dublin.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ferns; and unites with 13 others to constitute the benefice of St. Patrick, or WEXFORD: which see. Tithe composition, £43 18s. 6½d. There is neither church, glebe-house, chapel, nor school. The parishioners, in 1834, consisted of 16 Protestants, and 230 Roman Catholics.

ARDCANNY, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Kenry, 8 miles west by south of Limerick, co. Limerick, Munster. It is bounded on the north by the Shannon, and on the east by the Maig; and occupies the peninsula below their confluence. Most of the land is good; and very little unprofitable. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,100 acres. Yet though these measurements are given, the boundaries are disputed and undefined. Pop., in 1831, 1,318; in 1841, 1,283. Houses 201.—This parish is a rectory, a separate benefice, and the corps of Ardcanney prebend of St. Mary's cathedral, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £300. Gross income, £363; nett, £276 17s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1736, and was reported in 1837 to have been recently condemned as unworthy of repair. Public worship was then conducted in the glebe-house. Attendance, about 25. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 114, and the Roman Catholics to 1,258; and a pay-school was attended by 87 children.

the barony of Boyle, and 3½ miles east-south-east of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connought. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3; area, 19,963 acres,—of which 1,160 acres are under water, chiefly in Lough Key. Pop., in 1831, 6,718; in 1841, 8,304. Houses 1,472. Lough Key skirts the north-west, and the river Boyle runs south-eastward through the interior. See KEY and BOYLE. The land is generally good, and possesses so large an amount of forest, orchard, garden and park embellishment, as to be quite luscious in aspect. A large part of the area is occupied by Viscount Lorton's splendid demesne of ROCKINGHAM; see that article. Opposite Rockingham, and near Oakpark Lough, on an agreeable site, well sheltered with trees, stands Oakpark-house, an edifice with an extended front and numerous windows in one range, erected by the Earl of Kingston, but since alienated on a long lease. Knockvicer bridge, across the Boyle, to the north of Oakpark, was built in 1727 at the expense of the county, and commands a stretch of finely wooded scenery along the river. The parish-church crowns an eminence, and is sheltered with trees, near the road from Boyle to Dublin. Though modernized in the interior, it is so old a building that it may have been connected with a celebrated Benedictine nunnery which stood on the hill. A crowded cemetery beside it has long been a city of the dead, and packed with rude, crumbling, and lichen-covered tombstones. Two other monastic establishments stood in Lough Key, and will be noticed in the articles ISCHMACHERIN and TRINITY-ISLAND. See also, for antiquities, CASTLE-ISLAND.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Elphin. Tithe composition, £280. The rectories of Ardcarne and KILLUKEN, and the vicarages of KILCORKEY and KILBRINE, [see these articles,] constitute the benefice of Ardcarne or Killuken, and the corps of the archdeaconry of Elphin. Length of the contiguous parishes of Ardcarne, Killuken, and Kilbrine, 7 miles; breadth, 4. Gross income of the benefice, £492 19s. 3d.; nett, £446 2s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate for Killuken has a stipend of £75, and the use of the glebe-house, and 13 acres of land. The church of Ardcarne was enlarged in 1828, by means of a grant of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 150. There is a church also in Killuken. The Public Instruction Commissioners report—though the Ecclesiastical Revenue Commissioners do not—two chapels-of-ease, attended by 70 and 60. Three Roman Catholic chapels in the union are attended by 700, 550, and 400, and have three officiates. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 514, and the Roman Catholics to 6,610; the Protestants of the union to 741, and the Roman Catholics to 10,939; the daily schools of the parish to 4, with 143 boys and 79 girls; and the daily schools of the union, exclusive of Kilcorkey, to 15, with 375 boys and 235 girls. Two of the schools in the parish were aided each with £5 from the archdeacon, and one of them with a house and an acre of land from Captain Lloyd.

ARDCASTLE, a locality on the peninsula of Maas Point, between Biterly and Kilkerran bays, Cunnemara, co. Galway, Connought. A creek at the place affords some shelter to fishing-boats; and was, at one time, under the notice of the Commissioners of Irish Fisheries as the proposed site of some harbour-works.

ARDCATH, a parish in the barony of Upper Duleek, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains a village of its own name, and lies 6½ miles south-south-west of Drogheda. The land is in general good. Fairs are held on May 7, June 21, and Oct. 27. Length of the parish, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,380 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,774; in 1841, 1,481. Houses 278. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 103. Houses 20.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Meath; and forms part of the benefice of DULLECK; which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £70, and the rectorial for £195; and the latter are impropriate in Dr. Beaufort. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 800 persons; and shares with Clonalvy chapel the care of two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 22, and the Roman Catholics to 1,815; and 2 pay-schools were attended by from 74 to 79 children. In 1840, the National Board salaried a school at Cloghan with £8.

ARDCAVAN, a parish in the barony of East Shelmalier, 1½ mile north-east of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. It occupies the peninsula which projects southward into the estuary of the Slaney, opposite the town of Wexford; and is, in consequence, bounded on three sides by that estuary. The land is in general excellent. Most of the village of CASTLE-BRIDGE [which see], stands on the Ardavan side of the Castle-Bridge river, which forms the north-west boundary. The road northward from the long bridge of Wexford traverses the interior. See WEXFORD. Length of the parish, 5 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,458 acres. Pop., in 1831, 858; in 1841, 947. Houses 155. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 779. Houses 121.—This parish is an impropriate curacy in the dio. of Ferns; and forms part of the benefice of ARDCOLMIE; which see. The vicarial tithes belong to the curate, and are compounded for £66 16s. 3d., and the rectorial tithes belong to Lord Portsmouth, and are compounded for £73 1s. 10½d. A Roman Catholic chapel in Castle-Bridge has an attendance of 1,100; and, in common with chapels in Screen and St. Margaret's parishes, has two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 56, and the Roman Catholics to 839. In 1840, a school at Castle-Bridge was aided with £12 from the National Board, and had on its books 104 boys and 58 girls.

ARDCLAIRE, or CLONIGORMICKAN, a parish about 5 miles south-south-west of Tusk, and in the barony of Ballymoe, co. Roscommon, Connought. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4; area, 8,544 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,633; in 1841, 2,555. Houses 430. Most of the land is of good or even prime quality. The surface is drained by the Suck, and traversed north-westward by the road from Roscommon to Castlereagh.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £88 6s.; and the latter are impropriate, and belong to the Earl of Essex. The vicarages of Ardclaire, KILLUKEN, KILCOOLEY, SHANKILL, KILMACUMST, CREEVE, and TUONNA [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Ardclaire. The first three are mutually contiguous; the next three are also mutually contiguous; but the seventh is remote from all the rest. Gross income, £424 12s. 7½d.; nett, £379 7s. 8½d. But the incumbent holds likewise the sinecure prebend of Kilcooley in the cathedral of Elphin, and receives the rectorial tithes of Kilcooley parish, compounded for £56 7s. 4½d. Patron, the diocesan. Mr. Weld, in his very able Statistical Survey of Roscommon, mistakenly represents the whole benefice as the corps of Kilcooley prebend; and, apparently from the circumstance that the rectorial tithes of Shankill, Kilmacumsey, and Creeve, are appropriated to the precentorship of the cathedral, the Commissioners of Public Instruction represent the benefice as the corps of the precentorship,—at the same time, and for seemingly the same reason, associating with it the vicarage of Kilcorkey, which forms part of the benefice of Ardcarne. Three curates are employed at salaries of respectively £69 4s. 6d., £50, and £25. Three churches, in Ardclare, Killuken, and Creeve, are attended by respectively 10, 32, and 14. One of them was built about the year 1750, at the private expense of Mr. Hawks, and has 100 sittings. Six Roman Catholic chapels in the union have 10 officiates, and are averagely attended by 1,000, 1,000, 860, 700, 500, and 450. In 1834, the Protestants of Ardclare amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 2,779; the Protestants of the union to 323, and the Roman Catholics to 21,483; the daily schools in Ardclare to 3, with 112 boys and 41 girls; and those in the union to 19, with 736 boys and 367 girls. Excepting two in Creeve, the whole of the schools were hedge-schools.

ARDCCLARE, a small village in the parish of Kilnateigue, barony of Lenev, co. Sligo, Connaught. It is about 8 miles distant from Foxford in Mayo. Pop. returned with the parish.

ARDCCLINIS, a parish on the coast of the barony of Lower Glounm, 6 miles north by west of the town of Glenarrig, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains part of the village of CARNEGLOUGH: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 2; area, 15,691 acres, 2 rods, 24 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,617; in 1841, 1,742. Houses 279. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,404; in 1841, 1,439. Houses 228. The parish consists principally of a mountainous peninsula between Carnlough bay on the south, and Red bay on the north. Excepting belts of low ground along the coast, and up the principal glen, the surface is nearly all upland, rough, and moorish. The heights have an average altitude of 600 or 700 feet above sea-level; they are heathy, and interpatched with forest-paved bog; and, while they abound in moor-game, they at the same time afford tolerable pasturage, and are usually attached in lots to pendicles of the low and arable grounds. The glens and rivulets which cleave them, and the escarpments and bold acclivities which they themselves present to the sea, furnish many groupings of decided landscape. Glenarrig, on the northern boundary, and the river Acre which traverses it, have numerous charms for the eye of taste; Red Bay, at the embouchure of the glen, is replete with interest; and the glen of the Carnlough rivulet, along the southern boundary, as well as some interior ravines and depressions of the hill-ground, present to the view some powerful specimens of picturesqueness and romance. See ACRE, GLENARRIFF, and RED BAY. But a main charm for the tourist is the contour of the overhanging face of hill along all the sea-board belt of low ground, and the exquisite combinations of its recessions and advances with the embellishments of the plain, and the curvatures on the edge of the sea. A traveller, just when he enters the parish from the south, descries such scenery as challenges his wonder and awe, and provokes him to hasten onward that he may gaze upon its power. The road he treads boldly, yet giddily, overhangs the sea; and is overhung, in its turn, by dark, lofty, and precipitous cliffs, which begin to fling their shadow over his path at an early hour after meridian. Drumnasole, the splendid recently erected mansion of F. Turnly, Esq., soon looks out from a most romantic and sheltered site at the base of the perpendicular hills; the ground in front of it bosky with luxuriant shrubberies, a ravine behind it mirthful with the perpetual frolics of a beautiful waterfall, and the cliffs occasionally all silver-haired and hoary with a series of long tiny casades. From Drumnasole-house, an expanse of plantation extends to a great distance along the base of the hills, and promises, in a few years, to render perfect this range of thrilling and impressive scenery. Close to the road at Drumnasole, and crowning an eminence, stands an extraordinary edifice, used as a school-house, two stories high, and surmounted by a belfry cupola. At a short distance onward, are Knappan Lodge, peeping out from a mass of wood and foliage; rising grounds carrying, over all their sides and their summits, sheets of forest to the mountains; and a little ruined chapel, ensconced among trees beneath the dark impending basaltic cliff. Farther on, are the grand natural fortalice of Dunmaul, and the conspicuous pinnacled headland of Gerron Point. See DUNMAUL and GERRON. After passing Gerron Point, the tourist had formerly to proceed by a road called Foaran Path, which was so delectuous as to be nearly impracticable for a vehicle, and is thus described by the statist of 24 years ago: "The road lies through limestone rocks" that have fallen from the hills upwards of 800 feet high; so that, in a winter storm, a traveller is exposed to stones from above, the spray of the sea beneath, and the risk of slipping, in some spots of the road, from pressure of the clay under his feet. It is not forty years since this south entrance to the low glens was impassable for any thing but a single horse, and even that with difficulty." Through the seal and liberality of Francis Turnly, Esq., an excellent road, cut at great expense and with great labour out of the side of the mountain, now curves along the coast, and offers every facility of progress. The enormous blocks of chalk which lie on each side of the road, and appear sprinkled and agglomerated in the wildest confusion, contain nodules of flint so loosened from the cavities in which they seem once to have been firmly embedded, that they can easily be disengaged without aid of tool or fracture. On the shore, a few yards from the Foaran Path, stands a singular mass, somewhat resembling a colossal figure seated on a ledge of rock. This curious object, popularly called 'Clocken Stookan,' was formerly regarded as the most northerly spot in Ireland, and seems now as anciently to be regarded with superstitious feeling. Farther on, the precipitous heights of Carrig-Murphy and Slieve-Baraghad, rise murally from the road, and soar sublimely to the clouds. Ardclinis proper, or the small townland which gives name to the parish, speedily comes into view. The ruin of a small chapel, surmounting a pleasant eminence between the base of a lofty mountain and the sea, is the only memorial of its ancient importance. Near this ruin, a stream leaps down the face of the mountain; and, just when it has drawn attention to its beautiful frolics, it dives into the earth and trots along a natural tunnel beneath the hill and the highway into the sea. Farther description belongs to the articles on Red Bay and Glenarrig.

Ardclinis is a rectory in the dio. of Connor. Tithes composition, £240. Though at the distance of between 25 and 30 miles, it is united with the rectory of Aggherton to form a benefice, and the corps of the treasurership of Connor cathedral: see AGGHERTON. A curate is employed for it at a salary of £50. Two school-houses, used as parochial places of worship, have each an average attendance of 60. A Methodist chapel is attended by 40,—a Roman Catholic chapel, by 500; and the latter shares with the Roman Catholic chapel of Layde the care of one officiate. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 148 members of the E-stablished church, 281 Presbyterians, 8 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,287 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools were attended by from 172 to 257 children; and 5 daily schools had on their books 367 boys and 260 girls. One of the daily schools was aided with £20 from Mr. Turnly; one, with £10 from Mr. Turnly, and £5 from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £13 from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £10 from the National Board; and one, a free-school, with £24 from the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

ARDCOLLUM, co. Tipperary. See KILMURRY.

ARDCOLLUM, ARDCOLME, or ARDCOLON, a parish in the barony of East Shelmaliel, 5 miles north-north-east of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. It lies along the north shore of Wexford Harbour or the estuary of the Slaney, yet is partly bounded on the south by the peninsular parish of Ardavan. The land is of a fair average quality, but includes some sandy and unprofitable ground. The road northward from the long bridge of Wexford traverses the interior. The island of Erin-Beg, 'Little Ireland,' in Wexford Harbour, belongs to the parish. A small part of the village of CASTLE-BRIDGE [which see], stands within the south-west corner. Length of the parish, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,232 acres. Pop., in 1831, 751; in 1841, 804. Houses 143. Pop. of the rural districts in 1841, 681. Houses 122.

—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ferns. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £54 11s. 11d., and the rectorial for £71 4s. 10d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Lord Portsmouth. Ardcollum vicarage is united with the inappropriate curacies of ARDCAVAN, ST. NICHOLAS, SKREEN, and BALLYVALOO, the rectories of ASTRAMONT and ST. MARGARET's, and part of the vicarage of TICKILLEN [see these articles], to constitute the benefice of Ardcollum. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6. Gross income, £657 10s. 11d.; nett, £513 15s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The church, situated in Ardcollum, was built in 1706, at the cost of about £411 7s. 5d., more than half of which was a grant from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 180; attendance, about 100. Three Roman Catholic chapels, at Castle-Bridge, in Skreen, and in St. Margaret's, are respectively attended by 1,000, from 1,000 to 1,100, and from 400 to 500, and have jointly two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 75, and the Roman Catholics to 730; the Protestants of the union, 12 of whom were dissenters, amounted to 354, and the Roman Catholics to 4,914; two schools in the parish, one of which was aided with £20 from the incumbent, were attended by about 100 children; and these, with 3 other daily schools in the union, had on their books 112 boys and 61 girls.

ARDCRONEY, a parish in the barony of Lower Ormond, 3½ miles south of Borris-o'-kane, co. Tipperary, Munster. It is bisected southward by the road from Borris-o'-kane to Nenagh, and lies very nearly midway between these towns. The surface declines to the west, and is drained by rivulet-affluents of the Shannon, or rather of Lough Derg. The land is in general good, and covered with luxuriant crops and herbage. There are several pleasant mansions. Length of the parish, 5½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,429 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,975; in 1841, 1,571. Houses 271.—This parish is a vicarage and a separate benefice in the dio. of Killaloe. Vicarial tithes composition, £92 6s. 1½d. Gross income, £97 6s. 1½d.; nett, £67 14s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes, compounded for £205 1s. 0½d., are appropriated to the patron, and leased to T. White, Esq., of Miltown, Queen's county. The church was built in 1824, by means of a grant of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120; attendance, from 50 to 60. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by about 800; and, jointly with Kilruane and Muderney chapels, is under the care of two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 101, and the Roman Catholics to 1,608; and two schools, one of which was parochial, and salaried from subscription with £8 or £9, had on their books 63 boys and 37 girls.

ARDEA, a hamlet in the parish of Tuosist, barony of Glancrough, co. Kerry, Munster. It stands on the south shore of the Kenmare river or estuary, 10 statute miles south-west of Kenmare. In its vicinity is Ardea-castle. A dispensary here is one of six under the Kenmare Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it received and expended £132 3s., administered to 1,271 patients, and served for a population of 6,208, dispersed over an area of 40,000 acres. Pop. returned with the parish.

ARDEA, Queen's co. See ARDREA.

ARDECLEAVE, or ARTICLAVE, a village in the parish of Drumboe, half-barony of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands 5 miles west by north of Coleraine, on the coast-road toward the contraction of Lough Foyle. Area, 19 acres. Pop. in 1841, 450. Houses 83.

ARDEE, a barony in co. Louth, Leinster. It is bounded, on the north, by the barony of Louth; on the east, by the Irish sea; on the south, by the barony of Ferrard; and, on the west, by the counties of Meath and Monaghan. Its length, from Dunany Point westward, is about 11½ miles; its breadth, from north to south, is about 7 miles; and its area is 53,832 acres. The rivers Dee and Glyde run eastward, the former through the centre, and the latter along the northern boundary.—The parishes in this barony are Ardee, Cappog, Charlestown, Clonkeen, Dromin, Drumcar, Gernonstown, Kildemock, Kilsaran, Mapastown, Moostown, Philipstown, Richardstown, Shenlish, Smarmore, Stabannon, Stickillen, and Tallestown, and part of Killaney and Louth.—The annual valuation, under the Poor-law Act, is £55,796 13s.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of Spring and Summer 1841, were £2,167 3s. 10d., and £2,170 5s. 4d. Pop., in 1831, 28,413; in 1841, 28,704. Houses 5,091. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,585; in manufactures and trade, 1,211; in other pursuits, 559. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,183; who could read but not write, 2,097; who could neither read nor write, 5,868. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,735; who could read but not write, 2,292; who could neither read nor write, 8,888.

ARDEE, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Ardee, co. Louth, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,885 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,181; in 1841, 6,392. Houses 1,207. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,206; in 1841, 2,713. Houses 500. Excepting about 400 plantation acres of bog, the land is nearly all good or excellent. Ardee-house, the principal mansion of the parish, and the seat of the Ruxton family, stands amidst a handsome and well-wooded demesne. The Dee, running eastward, is the principal stream. Other objects of interest are in the town of Ardee, or grouped with it, and will be noticed in next article.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Armagh. The entire tithes are inappropriate in Viscount Ferrard, and are compounded for £392 13s. 11d. Lord Ferrard is the improprisor also of the entire tithes of Shenlish, and the rectorial tithes of Stickillen, jointly compounded for £182 10s.; and he allows £7 10s. to the vicar of the three parishes. The vicarage of Ardee is united to the rectory of KILDEMOCK and the vicarages of STICKILLEN, SHENLISH, and SMARMORE [see these articles], to constitute the benefice of Ardee. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4. Gross income, £877 18s. 4d.; nett, £806 19s. 11d. Patron, the Archbishop of Armagh. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church is supposed to have been built by Roger de Pipard, at the beginning of the 13th century, and given to the Crouched friars, or friars of St. John. Part of it was destroyed in the time of the Commonwealth; and the remainder has been repaired and renovated. Sittings 800; attendance 221. The Roman Catholic chapel at Ardee is attended, at three services, by respectively 1,173, 1,620, and 2,147; that at Drakestown is attended by 420; and they are jointly under the care of two officiates. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 458 Churchmen, 45 Presbyterians, and 5,648 Roman Catholics; and the inhabitants of the union, of 518 Churchmen, 45 Presbyterians, and 7,905 Roman Catholics. In the same year, 11 daily schools in the union, 9 of which were in Ardee, had on their books 464 boys and 345 girls. One of the Ardee schools was aided with £30 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and £18 9s. 3d. from the corporation of the town; and another, with £18 from the Board of Erasmus Smith. In 1839, the National Board granted £247 toward the building and fitting up of a boys' school and a girls' school at Ardee.

ARDEE, an ancient, incorporated, market, and post town, the capital of the parish and the barony just noticed, stands on the river Dee, 11 miles north-west of Drogheda, 34 north-north-west of Dublin, and 68 south-south-west of Belfast. Its principal street, called Castle-street, extends half-a-mile north-north-westward from the left bank of the Dee, and forks, at the fair green, into the road to Dundalk, and the old road to Carrickmacross. Lanes, back tenements, and cross-streets so wing this street as to effect an average edified breadth of rather less than a furlong. John-street, running upwards of $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile east and west, somewhat parallel to the river, is the chief of a cluster of edified thoroughfares on the right bank of the Dee. A stone bridge, at the end of Castle-street, connects the two parts of the town; and Dawson's Bridge, $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile lower down, is out of repair. Ardee-house, and its sylvan and ornamented grounds, immediately behind the west side of Castle-street, produce warmth and amenity of aspect. But neither the contour of the surrounding flat country, nor the sluggish course of the muddy and prosaic Dee, are favourable to the composition of a mixedly town and country landscape. Though the town contains a few good houses, it consists, for the most part, of miserable cabins. The chief public buildings are the parish-church, a plain though ancient structure; the Roman Catholic chapel, a bulky, unfinished edifice; and the court-house and bridewell, a quondam castle, strong, built in the 13th century by Roger de Pipard, and long the chief residence of his descendants. The bridewell section of the castle contains 2 day-rooms, 6 cells, and 2 small yards; and is kept remarkably clean, orderly, and subordinate to the objects of discipline and reform.—A large artificial mount, called Castle-yard, at the south entrance of the town, is a remarkable and curious object. It is encompassed by a double ditch and vallum; it is approached and ascended by a raised path across the ditch and up the side; and has on its summit the vestiges of apparently an octangular tower, surrounded by a wall or rampart. Wright, who describes it in the Louthiana, says, "The perpendicular height of the mount, from the bed of its foundation, is nearly 90 feet, and the depth of the main trench betwixt 30 and 40; the circumference at the top is not less than 140, and round the foundation, upwards of 600 feet." The mount appears to have been designed for both residence and defence; and bears marks of having been occupied at different times by distinct races of people.—A Crouched friary at Ardee was founded by Roger de Pipard in 1207, and dedicated to St. John; but, excepting the part of its church which exists as the parochial place of worship, it has nearly all disappeared. The friary had ample possessions, and held sway over eight chapels in different parts of the county. George Dowdall, the last prior, surrendered its possessions in the 31st year of Henry VIII., but he obtained a life-grant of them in the 1st year of Mary, and was made primate of all Ireland. In 1612, the possessions were granted by James I. to Sir Garrett Moore, the ancestor of the Marquis of Drogheda.—A White or Carmelite friary at Ardee is supposed also to have been founded by the Pipard family; and, in the reign of Edward I., received large endowments from Ralph Pipard. In 1315, it was the meeting-place of a chapter of the Carmelites; and, in the same year, a crowd of men, women, and children, fled to its church from the ravages of the Scots and Irish under Edward Bruce, and, in common with their asylum, were reduced to ashes by the assailants. The edifice was speedily restored; and, in the years 1320, 1325, 1489, and 1504, was the scene of provincial chapters or synodical assemblies. This friary, like the former, was dissolved in the 31st year of Henry VIII.

In Ardee are 14 large malting establishments, 1 tannery, 2 corn-mills, and a considerable domestic manufacture of baskets. Much corn is sold at the weekly Tuesday market; a considerable retail trade exists in the supply of the circumjacent country; and fairs are held on March 1st, April 10th, May 26th, July 8th, August 10th and 11th, October 12th, and December 6th. A corn-market was erected by the corporation, about the year 1810, at the cost of nearly £2,000; and a meat-market or shambles, in 1796, at the cost of about £600. A mail car is daily in transit between Drogheda and Louth. The town is the head of an excise district which extends into the county of Monaghan. The county quarter-sessions for the division of Ardee are held in the town in January and July, when the assistant barrister for the county disposes by civil bill of cases within his jurisdiction; and petty-sessions are held once a-week by the county magistrates.

The Ardee Poor-law union ranks as the 65th; and was declared on August 21st, 1839. It lies partly in co. Meath, but more extensively in co. Louth; and comprehends an area of 95,039 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 42,035. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are in co. Meath, Drumcondra, 3,865; Killary, 3,862; and Grangegeeth, 1,025;—and in co. Louth, Collon, 2,918; Drumear, 2,559; Dunleer, 2,832; Dromin, 1,545; Castle-Bellingham, 3,254; Stabannon, 2,758; Ardee, 10,065; Clonkeen, 2,530; Tallanstown, 2,179; and Mansfieldstown, 1,693. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively, 8 and 24; and of the latter, 5 are returned by the division of Ardee, 1 each by the divisions of Grangegeeth, Dromin, Clonkeen, Tallanstown, and Mansfieldstown, and 2 by each of the other divisions. The total net annual value of the property rated is £92,490; the total number of persons rated is 3,996; and of these persons, 498 were rated for property whose valuation is not exceeding £1,—279, not exceeding £2,—205, not exceeding £3,—198, not exceeding £4,—and 257, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on August 4th, 1840,—to be completed on October 10th, 1841,—to cost £5,175 for building and completion, and £1,375 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 5 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches, obtained for £50 of compensation to occupying tenant, and an annual rent of £18 4s. 4½d.—and; to contain accommodation for 600 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was May 13th, 1842; the expensiture thence till February 6th, 1843, amounted to £2,497 18s. 5d.; and the total amount of previous expenses was £426 5s. 10d. Six dispensaries within the union are situated at Ardee, Collon, Castle-Bellingham, Dunleer, Drumcoulra, and Syddan; and in 1839-40, they expended £778 6s., and administered to 7,759 extern patients. No fever hospital relief is given in the union. The Ardee dispensary house is partly the residence of the medical officer, and partly disposed in two good fever wards, which are designed for the domestics of the gentry; but, in spite of the prevalence of fever, both in the town and in the surrounding country, have not for many years been used. The corporation of the town make an annual grant of £20 to the dispensary; and, in 1828, they gave for its use, at a nominal rent, the part of the fair green on which it stands. A large balance has, for a series of years, been in the hands of the treasurer; and was proposed by the Poor-law Commissioners to be appropriated to the erection of a fever hospital. At the close of August 1841, the vaccination act had been carried into effect in all the districts of Ardee union except that of Syddan.

A corporation appears to have existed in Ardee by prescription. The earliest known legal record of the town is a writ of 'amovens manus,' of the year 1358, or 32 Edward III., which reiters the seizure of "the toll of the town of Athirdee," into the king's hands. A corporation is first mentioned in a charter of 1376, or 51 Edward III. Subsequent charters, statutes, and patents were given by Richard II., Henry IV., Henry V., Henry VI., Charles II., James II., Anne, and George III. The governing charter is that of Anne; and the corporation it warranted consisted of a portreeve, 23 other burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen. The borough boundaries were ill-defined; they are traditionally said to have extended northward from the Dee to the fair green; yet they seem to have gradually expanded without challenge so as to include whatever contiguous area became edified. A borough court, constituted by the charters, was co-extensive in jurisdiction with the royalty, and seems to have tried all cases, real and personal, and to any amount, arising within the borough; but it has been in total desuetude during upwards of 56 years. "A tradition, apparently entitled to some credit," say the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations, "prevails amongst the inhabitants, that the corporation were long since possessed of very extensive tracts of land, and particularly 'commons,' around the town, in two parcels, called 'the North Commons,' and 'the South Commons,' which the ancestors of the Ruxton family were enabled to get into their possession, under some conveyance from the corporation. The extent was variously stated by the witnesses at from 500 to 900 acres." In 1833, the gross public income, from both property and tolls, was £135 2s. 6d. The borough sent two members to the Irish parliament; but it was a mere pocket borough of the Ruxtons; it suffered disfranchisement at the national union; and it saw the compensation sum of £15,000 for the loss of its franchise coolly lodged in two pockets in which all its own rights had been carried. Area of the town, 253 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,975; in 1841, 3,679. Houses 707.

Ardee—anciently and unabbreviatedly Athirdee, 'the ford on the Dee'—has its name from the river on which it stands. Roger de Pipard, whose name we have repeatedly mentioned, obtained a grant of the manor soon after the entry of the Anglo-Normans. He and his descendants bore the title of Lords of Athirlee; they were not only wealthy, but greatly distinguished in Leinster and in several of the midland counties of England; and having adopted Athirdee as their chief residence, and made it the site of two monastic establishments, they could hardly fail to attract to it a large population. The manor was surrendered by Ralph de Pipard to Edward I., and was granted by Edward II. to Sir John Birmingham, whom he created Earl of Louth. The town severely suffered, in common with its Carmelite friary, from the sanguinary assault of the Scots and Irish under Edward Bruce; and, owing to its position on the northern frontier of the English pale, it was exposed to frequent and fierce attacks from the northern Irish. In 1538, it was burned by an invading force from Ulster under O'Neil; and in 1641, it was captured by the joint force of the troops of Sir Phelim O'Neil, and the disaffected in the north of Leinster. On the latter occasion, Sir Henry Tichborne marched to its relief, and after a sharp contest about a mile from the town, and a skirmish at the foot of the bridge, succeeded in expelling the enemy. Ardee gives the title of Baron in the Irish peerage to the family of Brabazon, Earls of Meath.

ARDEE, co. Kildare. See ARDRE.

ARDERA, a parish in the barony of Iverk, and on the southern border of co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 777 acres. Pop., in 1831, 334; in 1841, 300. Houses 44. It is represented by the Commissioners of Public Instruction as comprised in the compound parish of ABBEY-JERPOINT [which see]; and it forms one of the numerous and curiously-connected members of the benefice of BURNCHURCH; which also see. It lies detached from every other part of the benefice, and is 30 miles distant from the Johnstown section. Its land is all good.

ARDES, a creek, a peninsula, and a demesne, on the south side of Sheephaven Harbour, 14 miles north-west of Letterkenny, and in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. The creek is an unimportant fishing station. The demesne runs out upon the peninsula; and, considering its sequestered situation behind a broad band of bleak uplands, it is splendid, well-wooded, and luscious. Doe-castle is in the vicinity.

ARDES, a barony on the coast of co. Down, Ulster. It comprises the whole of the peninsula which extends southward between Lough Strangford and the Irish sea; and over the 4½ miles of isthmus which connects it between Newtown-Ardes and Bangor with the mainland, it is separated from the barony of Castlereagh, chiefly by the Bangor rivulet. Length, 19½ miles; greatest breadth, 5½; area, 68,159 acres. Pop., in 1831, 43,110; in 1841, 46,875. Houses 8,754. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,075; in manufactures and trade, 4,137; in other pursuits, 1,042. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 10,854; who could read but not write, 4,771; who could neither read nor write, 2,822. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 7,812; who could read but not write, 10,690; who could neither read nor write, 3,951. The Valuation Reports under the Poor-law Act divide the barony into Lower and Upper Ardes; the former comprehending 38,447 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches, and the latter 29,679 acres, 18 perches. The annual valuation of Lower Ardes is £31,059 18s. 2d.; and the sums levied under the grand warrants of Spring and Summer, 1840, were £1,423 18s. 2d., and £1,544 12s. 2d. The annual valuation of Upper Ardes is £25,170 15s. 7d.; and the sums levied in Spring and Summer of 1840 were £1,191 17s. 3d., and £730 9s. 10d. The parishes in Ardes are the whole of Ard-keen, Ardquin, Ballyphilip, Ballytrastan, Ballywalter, Castleboy, Donaghadee, Inishargy, Greyabbey, St. Andrews, Slanes, and Witter, and part of Newtown-Arles, and Bangor. The presbytery of Ardes, in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland, has under its inspection 19 congregations, and meets on the last Tuesday of Jan., April, July, and October.—A patent roll of Henry IV., or the year 1400, granting to Robert Fitz-Jordan Savage the office of sheriff of the Ardes in Ulster seems to prove that Ardes was formerly a county. It was anciently called, Altitudo Ulterior Juxta Mare Orientale, 'the height of Ulster adjoining the Eastern sea'; and the word ard in Erse signifies 'high,' or 'height.' Several English families, particularly the Savages, settled in the district as early as the 12th century, and long maintained themselves in a flourishing condition. But during the confusion which followed the murder of William Burgh, Earl of Ulster, in the reign of Edward III., the sept of Hugh-Boy O'Neil, who inherited part of Tyrone, drove part of the English settlers into Lecale, and shut up the remainder in a small territory, called Little Ardes, extending about 7 miles northward from the point of the peninsula. From that time, the Great Ardes, or the whole of the barony excepting the small district at the point, came, in common with a large adjacent tract west of Strangford Lough, to be called the Southern Clan-Hugh-Boy, or abbreviated, South Clanboy. See CLANEBOY.

ARDES (LOWER), a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Down and Connor. Post-town, Kirkeubbin. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

ARDESS, a hamlet about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north by east of Irvinestown, barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. During 1842, a loan fund had a capital of £392, circulated £1,391 in 521 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £13 12s. 4d.

ARDFERT, a parish, partly in the barony of Trughenackmy, but chiefly in that of Clanmaurice, co. Kerry, Leinster. The Clanmaurice section contains the village of ARDFERT: see next article. Area of the Clanmaurice section, 6,797 acres; of the Trughenackmy section, 3,337 acres. Pop. of the Clanmaurice section, in 1831, 3,585; in 1841, 4,074. Houses 602. Pop. of the rural districts of the Clanmaurice section, in 1831, 2,808; in 1841, 3,419. Houses 492. Pop. of the Trughenackmy section, in 1841, 1,260. Houses 174. The census of 1831 does not notice the Trughenackmy section. The shore of the parish is part of the bleak and bold coast which extends between Tralee and Ballyheigue bays, is everywhere exposed to the full swell of the Atlantic, and, except in a small inlet near the village of Ardfert, nowhere affords anchorage or shelter. The country along the coast, though bare and much swept by sea-storms, is somewhat thickly inhabited. The aggregate quality of the land in the parish is moorish or otherwise inferior, yet the plain of Ardfert, extending north-north-westward from the village, and declining to the sea, lies on thick strata of argillaceous sandstone, and is rich and well-cultivated. Copper ore has been found in the parish. Adjacent to the village stands the mansion of Ardfert-Abbey, the ancient seat of the family of Crosbie, formerly Earls of Glandore, but now untitled; and in the vicinity is Tobritt, another old seat of the Crosbie family. Within Ardfert-Abbey demesne, and very near the mansion, stands a picturesque monastic ruin,—that from which the place has its name. The tower, the nave, and a great part of the cloisters, are in tolerable preservation; but the form and tracery of the eastern window are completely hid by a mantle of ivy. The style of the architecture does not indicate a very early date. Archdall says that, in 1253, Thomas, Lord of Kerry, founded at Ardfert a Franciscan monastery, and that he and several of his successors were interred within its walls; and the editor of the 8vo. edition of the Monasticon Hibernicum, says that a monastery was built in 1389 at Ardfert, by one of the Fitzmaurice family, who were Barons of Kerry and Lixnaw, and that, in 1518, it was reformed by the observants. Both of these accounts, though discrepant, seem to refer to the monastery within Ardfert-Abbey demesne. Other antiquities will be noticed below, in connection with the village.—This parish is a rectory, and also a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Ardfert and Aghadoe. The tithes are compounded for £253 16s. 11d.; one-fifth of them belongs to the perpetual curate; and four-fifths are appropriate and divisible among the dean, the precentor, the chancellor, and the treasurer of the cathedral church of Ardfert. Gross income of the curacy, £143 ls. 5½d; nett, £100 10s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The parish-church is the cathedral; and, in 1831, was completely repaired at the expense of the diocesan and the five dignitaries. Sittings 150; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has two officiators, and an attendance of 800. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 59, and the Roman Catholics to 3,775; and 2 free-schools, the one supported by Mrs. Crosbie, and the other by the Roman Catholic clergyman, had on their books 165 boys and 120 girls. In 1840, a National school was salaried with £16, and attended by 106 boys and 94 girls.

ARDFERT, the capital of the parish just noticed, the seat of the cognominal diocese, and formerly a royal borough, and the metropolis of Kerry, is situated 4 miles north-north-west of Tralee, and 142 south-west by west of Dublin. Area, 34 acres. Pop., in 1831, 717; in 1841, 655. Houses 110. This ancient and once important city is now a poor and declining village, without trade, without manufacture, and without either advantage or more than antiquarian attraction from its nominal cathedral. Only five of its houses are slated; while all the rest are thatched cabins, and a large proportion of them miserable cabins. The borough limits are said to have comprehended the Sheep-walk, Grague, Killarane, Brandon Well, Kilcloghquane, Laragh, Gortaspidale, and all the commons of Ardfert; an area which, while strangely excluding a part of the town, extends, in one direction, two miles into the country. Though no charter is either on record or known to have existed, the place returned two members to parliament from 1639 till the Union, and has always been considered a borough by prescription. The Crosbie family, very long, and perhaps always, were "patrons" of the place, or used it as a mere pocket borough; and, after its disfranchisement, they received for their sole and private use £15,000, awarded as compensation for the loss of its privileges. A nominal corporation—consisting of a portreeve, who was generally the Crosbie family's agent, and burgesses, who were their friends or creatures—existed for some years after the disfranchisement, and exercised a care over the corporate property in the commons. The last regular corporate meeting—or the last assuming such a name—was held in 1823. Unless the pound-keeper may be called a corporate officer, none now exists. The only public property which remains is about 200 acres of commons, with about £70 a-year, and is only a ninth part of what once existed. A court of record, and a court-leet or borough court, were formerly held, but have gone completely into desuetude. A seueschal, appointed by the Earl of Listowel, now lord of the manor of Ardfert, holds, every three weeks within the borough, a manor court for the trial of actions of debt amounting to 40s. Irish; and he exercises jurisdiction within a radius from the centre of the town of about 2½ miles. Petty sessions, generally attended by two or three of the county magistrates, are held once a fortnight. The only police are a small party of the county constabulary. A borough gaol or marshalsea formerly existed; and a building called a bridewell, which probably was the gaol, still exists, but is not in use as a prison, and is the subject of a disputed claim between the town and the Crosbie family. Fairs are held on Whitmonday, July 9, and Aug. 15; and might also be held on St. Peter, and St. Paul's day, and on March 27. A grant by James I. to the Lord of Kerry, confers the privilege of a weekly market on Thursday. In 1839-40, a dispensary in the town, under the Listowel Poor-law union, received £149, and expended £139 3s. 2d. A sumptuous monastery is represented, in the usual style of the ecclesiastico-political history of Ireland, as having been founded at Ardferd by St. Brendan. We are told, too, that, in common with the town, it was, at three periods, or in 1089, 1151, and 1179, reduced to ashes; but that, at each period, it rose like a phoenix from the flames, and soared in beauty and magnificence till deplored by the civil war of 1641. The cathedral, which seems to have been the church, if not of the original religious establishment, at least of a monastic successor, bears many marks of high antiquity. The west front shows four round arches, with the zigzag ornament; and the eastern front shows three elegant narrow pointed windows. On the north-west side are two small buildings; one of which has a window curiously ornamented with fretwork, a wide Saxon doorway to the east, a smaller Saxon doorway to the west, and appears to have had at each angle a Saxon pillar. Near the west front of the cathedral stood a slated round tower, 120 feet high; but this fine adjunct of the edifice's grandeur and interest, and noble specimen of the unique class of antiquities to which it belonged, fell in 1771. A university, which is alleged to have existed at Ardferd, is said to have been held in the highest esteem; but is too obscurely known to be an object of remark.

The BISHOPRIC OF ARDFERT claims a remote origin, and may, in general terms, be regarded as one of the most ancient in Ireland. Both recently, and from a distant period which is not noted in record, it has been so consolidated with the bishopric of Aghadoc, that the dioceses of the two are undistinguishable, and have been capable of description simply as the diocese of Ardferd and Aghadoc. The joint, or consolidated diocese was, at one time, known as the diocese of Kerry; and ever since 1600, as well after the late Church Temporalities act as before, it has been united to the see of Limerick. The episcopal revenues are not separately stated. See LIMERICK. The dignitaries are a dean, a chancellor, a treasurer, a precentor, and an archdeacon. The dean holds the benefice of Ratass, the rectory of Killanear, the sinecure rectory of Noboval-Daly, and part of the rectory of Ardferd; and has, in addition, a gross revenue of £349 9s. The chancellor holds the benefices of Kilmelchedor and Fenet, and part of the rectory of Ardferd; and has a separate revenue of £230 15s. 4d. The treasurer holds the benefices of Kilconloe and Killemy, and part of the rectory of Ardferd; and has a separate revenue of £290 15s. 5s. The precentor holds the benefice of Kilfeighny and Ballyconry, and part of the rectory of Ardferd; and has a separate revenue of £207 14s. 10d. The archdeacon holds the benefice of Ballinvoher, and part of the rectory of Ardferd; and has a separate revenue of £276 18s. 8½d. The diocese of Ardferd and Aghadoc comprehends all the county of Kerry, and a small contiguous part of the county of Cork. Its length and breadth are 66 and 61 English miles; and its area is 1,014,108½ statute acres. Its parishes are 47 in number, and are disposed in 48 benefices, 20 of which consist of two or more parishes. The resident incumbents are 25; the non-resident 23. Gross income of the benefices, £15,618 11s. 9½d.; nett, £13,580 18s. 0½d. Nine of the benefices are in the collation of the Crown; 21 in that of the diocesan; 17 in that of laymen and corporations; and 1 in alternate presentation. Thirty curates, employed in 25 benefices, have aggregately a gross income of £1,537 10s. 11d. There are in the diocese 35 parish churches, 8 other places of worship connected with the Establishment, 8 Protestant dissenting meeting-houses, and 76 Roman Catholic chapels. In 18 benefices there is no church; and in 4 there is more than one. In 1834, the population amounted to 304,687; and consisted of 7,529 members or adherents of the Established church, 27 Protestant dissenters, and 297,131 Roman Catholics. In 2 benefices there was no member of the Established church; in each of 16 there were fewer than 50; and in each of only two, were there upwards of 500. The daily schools, in 1834, amounted to 227, and had on their books 8,065 boys and 3,677 girls, besides 115 children whose sex was not specified. Five of the schools were aided by the National Board; 1 by the Society for Discourteasing Vice; 2 by Erasmus Smith's fund; 1 by the London Hibernian Society; 58 by endowment or subscription; and 169 were supported wholly by fees. In the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical division, the area of Ardferd diocese is included in that of KERRY; which see.

ARDFIELD, a parish on the coast of the Ibane section of the barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. It lies 4½ miles south by east of Clonakilly; and runs out to the extremity of the peninsula on the east side of Ross bay. Part of the surface is upland and unproductive; but most is champagne, arable, and moderately fertile. A fresh-water lake of about 52 acres is well stored with fish. The coast is bold, denoted with creeks, and occasionally perforated with caves. The peninsula, like that of Kinsale, extends a considerable distance beyond the average coast-line; is conspicuously high; and suffers furious buffetings from the tempestuous wave. An islet at its extremity, separated from the mainland by a very narrow channel, is regarded by seamen as the real headland, and used often to be mistaken by them for the old head of Kinsale. Several caverns worry the waves around its base; and an old castle crowns its summit. The headland is the Dundee of topographers, and the Galley-Head of mariners. Length of the parish, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 2,645 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,023; in 1841, 2,460. Houses 412.—This parish is a vicarage and separate benefice in the dio. of Ross. Vicarial title composition, £92 6s. 1½d. Gross income, £102 6s. 1½d.; nett, £95 10s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectorial tithes are inappropriate, compounded for £110 15s. 4½d., and in the possession of Messrs. Foot and Roberts. A curate has a stipend of £50. A licensed school-house serves as the parochial place of worship. Attendance 28. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 1,500; and, jointly with the chapel of Rathbarry, is under the care of one officiate. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 39, and the Roman Catholics to 2,039; a Sunday school was attended by 9 children; and 3 daily schools, one of which was aided with £17 from the National Board, had on their books 147 boys and 177 girls. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school had respectively £10 and £8 from the National Board.

ARDFINNAN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Ifla and Offa West, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,813 acres. Pop., in 1831, 878; in 1841, 1,214. Houses 197. The surface forms part of the immediate banks of the Suir; lies 6½ miles west-south-west of Clonmel, and is traversed by the great road from Dublin to Cork. The land is arable, wheat-bearing, and fertile. The landscape consists of a noble sweep in the vale of the Suir,—a band of luxuriant low ground, striped with a brilliant river, and flanked by picturesque heights. The public road, in passing along, curves between the Galtee mountains on the one hand, and the Knockmeleadow mountains on the other, and opens at every turn on some charming novelty of a rich series of scenery. Ardfinnan village, though an ancient and once important place, is now a poor, small village. Area, 31 acres. Pop., in 1831, 316; in 1841, 530. Houses 93. St. Finnan, from whom it takes its name, is alleged to have founded at it a monastic establishment; and MacCuillinan, the noted monarch and archbishop of Munster, is said to have bequeathed to this establishment, at the beginning of the 12th century, an ounce of gold, an ounce of silver, and his horse and armour. The monastery eventually belonged to canons regular; and another monastery was subsequently erected for Franciscan friars. A ruin which still exists is, of course, regarded by the credulous as the actual and undoubted edifice of St. Finnan. Beside it stands the conspicuous and picturesque ruin of a castle which was built, in 1184, by King John, and eventually destroyed by Cromwell. An extant deed of 4^o Edward II., or the year 1311, grants pontage for three years to "the bailiffs and good men of Ardfinnan," and seems to imply that the place was then a corporate town. From a point of junction with the Cork line of railway, 6 miles off, near Cahir, Ardfinnan will be brought within 5 hours and 10 minutes travelling of Dublin, from which it is distant by the highway 113 miles.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Lismore. Tithe composition, £170. The rectories of Ardfinnan and Rochestown, and the vicarage of Neddins [see ROCHESTER AND NEDDINS], constitute the benefice of Ardfinnan. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2. Gross income, £378 2s.; nett, £289 7s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75, and the use of the glebe-house. The church, situated in Ardfinnan, was built in 1807, by means of subscriptions, parochial assessments, and a grant by the diocesan out of the rectorial tithes of Cahir. Sittings 120; attendance 35 or 40. There is no dissenting or Roman Catholic place of worship. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 44, and the Roman Catholics to 871; the Protestants of the union to 64, and the Roman Catholics to 1,937. In the same year, 3 schools in the union, all supported wholly by fees, and 2 of them in Ardfinnan, had on their books 161 boys and 90 girls.

ARDFRY, a peninsula at the head of Galway bay, 3 miles south of Oramore, in the barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. The marine inlet on the south side is about 2 miles long, but narrow; is shallow and rocky in the upper part; and nowhere affords harbourage to more than small craft. The inlet on the south is that of Renville or New-Harbour: which see. A long spit or reef between Renville and Ardfry, terminating at the cockle rocks opposite Hare Island, is a menacing object to the navigator of Galway roads; it is cleared with Oran-castle open of Subeen Point. Near the extremity of Ardfry peninsula, stands Ardfry-house, the charming mansion of Lord Wallscourt. The whole peninsula is bosky with wood or green with embellishment; and while running far out, in a stream of trees and verdure, into the capacious and beautiful bay of Galway, it combines with a rich series of associated objects, both near and at a distance, to form a magnificent panorama.

ARDGLASS. See ARLES.

ARDGLASS, a parish on the south-east coast of the barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. It contains a town of its own name: see next article. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 1,137 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,628; in 1841, 1,433. Houses 279. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 460; in 1841, 367. Houses 80. The coast is bold and rocky, dangerous to navigators, but replete with interest to the lovers of landscape. The land, in the interior, is rough and stony, yet produces such fine cereal crops that it may be aggregately pronounced good. The ancient parish-church surmounted an eminence, called Ardhol, in the vicinity of the town of Ardglass; and is said to have been abandoned on account of the sept of the MacCartanes massacring within its walls a whole congregation, assembled for Christmas midnight mass. The harbour, antiquities, and other matters, will be noticed in connection with the town.—This parish is an appropriate rectory, in the dio. of Down; and forms part of the corps of the chancellorship of Down cathedral. All Ardglass, and parts of Ballee and Kileief, constitute the perpetual curacy of Ardglass. The cure and tithes of the townland of Ross in Kileief, the tithes of the townland of Ballyhosset in Ballee, and the cure and tithes of the townlands of Jordanscrew and Kildarescrew, are the parts and interests added to the former curacy, which was co-extensive with the parish; and they were added by order in council, dated 31st October, 1834. Gross income, £214 7s.; nett, £202 3s. 9d. Patron, the Chancellor of Down. The church was built in 1813, at the cost of £1,107 13s. 10½d., two-thirds of which was gifted, and one-third lent, by the Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 180 to 280. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 150; and, jointly with a chapel in Dunford, is under the care of one officiate. In 1834, the parishioners of Ardglass consisted of 661 Churchmen, 29 Presbyterians, and 338 Roman Catholics; and the population within the curacy, of 685 Churchmen, 53 Presbyterians, and 1,216 Roman Catholics. In the same year, a boys' school and a girls' school, aided, the former with £30, and the latter with £18, from the Board of Erasmus Smith, had on their books respectively 92 boys and 83 girls; and three pay-schools had 53 boys and 48 girls.

ARDGLASS, the capital of the above parish, an ancient but decayed town, once a parliamentary borough and a place of great military strength, stands at the head of its cognominal bay or harbour, 7 miles south-east by south of Downpatrick, and 28 in the same direction from Belfast. Its site is picturesque; its aspect is imposing; and its ward-hill, a green eminence adjoining it, commands an impressively brilliant view of the coast and sea-board, the mountains of Mourne, the Irish sea, the Isle of Man, and the blue far-away Scottish heights of Galloway. A profusion of fortified and castellated old edifices in the town gives great uniqueness and force to its scenic character, and renders the comparative obscurity of its history a problem. The largest, popularly called King's Castle, was a fortress of considerable size and strength, but is now much dilapidated, and rapidly loosening toward extinction. Another, called Horn-castle, is only a plain building, yet appears to have possessed some importance as a fortalice. A third is called Coud-castle,—a name which the natives, even a century ago, could neither account for nor explain. A fourth, plain and strong, stands detached from a long range of castellated houses which we have yet to notice, and seems as if it had been designed to flank it in correspondence with a flanking strength attached to the other end of the range. A fifth, called Jordan's Castle, though inferior in size to the King's Castle, is constructed with greater elegance than either it or any of the other castles, and was a place of considerable strength. It stands in the centre of the town, and appears to have been the citadel. The range of castellated houses to which we alluded, is called, by the inhabitants, the New Works, and is said to have been erected about the year 1570 by Shane O'Neil. It is 234 feet long, 20 feet broad in the clear, and 3 feet thick in the walls; and it presents a bold appearance along the margin of a rocky shore of the bay. Its design is uniform, and, in a certain degree, elegant. A battlement breast-high surmounts the inland side; a platform, broad enough for a promenade, runs all round, immediately below the battlement; three equidistant towers rise in the centre, and at the ends of the inland side, each containing three apartments 10 feet square; and the intermediate spaces are occupied by 15 arched doorways of cut stone, and 16 square windows,—each door and window being so uniformly alternated as to leave no doubt that the apartments within were shops, and that the fortifications of the range were erected to defend merchants from the insults of the neighbouring septs. In the story over the shops are apartments exactly commensurate with those below, and each accessible by a separate stone staircase; but they have no fire-place, and the merchants appear to have used Horn-castle as their kitchen and dining-hall.

These buildings would seem to indicate a prolonged, eventful, and perspicuous history; yet, in a great degree, they are compelled to tell their own story and the town's with the pantomime of silent ruins, unaided by the memoranda of record. Ardglass, as a matter of course, claims to be the site of an ecclesiastical edifice founded by St. Patrick. But its religious antiquities, whatever they were, have quite or very nearly perished. In the reign of Henry VI., as appears by a deed or charter made in that reign by its incorporation, was a corporate town and royal borough, governed by a portreeve, and returning members to parliament. Previous to the reign of Elizabeth, it ranked with Newry and Downpatrick as one of the three principal towns of the county, and was second in the province of Ulster only to Carrickfergus as a seat of trade; and so late as the beginning of the reign of Charles I., the duties of its port were let to farm. But its castles, which so highly provoke curiosity by their strength and number, are, in some instances at least, of altogether unascertained origin and design. Jordan's Castle may be inferred, from the armorial bearings of a cross and three horse-shoes in a stone near the top, to have been built by one of the family whose name it bears. Though the ancient English sept of Savages (see ARDES), are supposed to have built some of the other castles, and are even regarded by some writers as the founders of the town, they appear to have been intruders in Lecale, and not to have attempted any settlement in it till after their expulsion from northern and central Ardes. A tradition exists, or at least was current a century ago, that when the Savages had embodied a strong force to oppress the Magenis-ses and other Irish families to whom Lecale originally belonged, the Earl of Kildare was called in by the latter as a protector or an ally; that, when he had marched as far as Ballykinler, he received the submission of the Savages; and that, having both parties now in his power, he grasped as his own and transmitted to his posterity the object of their contention,—Ardglass and the circumjacent country. Such history, while so far as we know the whole of what is authentic, rather obscures than enlightens the questions of the town's ancient importance, and the origin of its fortalices. Nor, after the place is viewed apart from its antiquity and early connections, is there much real history to be told. All the grand and petty customs of the ports of Ardglass and Strangford were granted by Henry VIII. in fee-farm to Gerald Fitzgerald, Earl of Kildare; and, excepting during the period of the family's attainder, they continued in the possession of the Earl's descendants till 1637, when they were sold to Charles I., and said to be worth £5,000 a-year to the king; and, by a clause in the Act of Explanation 17 and 18 Charles II., they were confirmed to Charles II. and his successors. In the reign of Henry VIII., one of the castles of Ardglass, being garrisoned by the Crown, was so galling a check to Con O'Neil, that, in 1537, he sent a force under the command of his son into Lecale to besiege it; but on learning that the Lord-deputy Gray was making preparations to march against him, he desisted from his attempt, and caused the force to be disbanded. About the year 1578, a strong garrison was placed in some of the castles by Sir Nicholas Bagnal, marshal of Ireland; but they were besieged by the O'Neils, and, after a stout resistance, were obliged to surrender. During three years of the Tyrone rebellion preceding June 1601, Simon Jordan valiantly defended Jordan-castle against all assailants; and, when eventually relieved by the Lord-deputy Mountjoy, was rewarded for his service both out of the private bounty of the deputy, and by a concordatum from the queen. In the memorable rebellion of 1641, the castles were for some time in possession of the Irish. So greatly and rapidly did the town decline after the close of that rebellion, and the rise of Belfast as a sea-port and the seat of a chief custom-house, that a century later the historian of Down describes it as "now in a mean condition, consisting only of a few ordinary cabins, and 4 or 5 old decayed castles." This description has been copied or imitated in most topographical notices down to the present day. Yet the town has revived, experienced great improvement, and become at once a favourite summer retreat of sea-bathers, the rendezvous of an extensive coast-line of fisheries, and the scene of considerable hustle and trade.

The bay of Ardglass is a small rocky creek about 150 fathoms wide, extending at high water 500 fathoms inland, and ramified at its head into three or four sandy coves, divided from one another by rocky ledges. At the north-east point of the bay is a very curious limestone cavern, possessing a large entrance aperture, and penetrating about 60 feet. The outer ledge on the west side of the bay has been built up at the public expense into a sort of pier, so as to cover the cove immediately on its inner side. This cove has an area of 70 fathoms by 130 at high water, and constitutes the harbour of Ardglass. It is provided with a light at the extremity; it has always 3 or 4 fathoms of water at the entrance; and, much to the convenience of craft on an iron-bound coast, it may at any time be run for, either at low water or by night. On the end of the adjoining ledge on the west side is a stone perch; and though all the rest of the bay is in its natural state, the innermost cove, called Kimmer's Port, which is dry at low water, affords thorough shelter to small vessels from all winds. Much public money has been expended to effect such improvements as exist, and much more—more than was at their command—has been asked of the Commissioners of Public Works for the execution of various other plans. "It is to be regretted," says Mr. Nimmo, "that after all the money which has been expended upon this harbour, it is still far from answering expectation. When south-east winds set in, which are the most violent on this coast, the deep water being near, a heavy ground-swell runs into Ardglass, and being brought up in a short space by the ledge of the perch-rock, is deflected into the cove forming the present harbour, which, being so much bounded by wall and steep rock, becomes excessively turbulent; the craft thump much on the bottom, and can with difficulty hold on with all their tackle; nor is there any means of escaping at such times into any of the other coves of the bay, so that vessels are frequently seriously damaged." He then points out the defective or erroneous construction of the present works, and proceeding to suggest a remedy, adds: "My advice would be to cut a passage across the rocky ledge which separates the present from the middle harbour, as far as the opening behind Maggy's Rock, all of which is accessible at low water, and build with this a breakwater on the outer and broader part of the ledge behind the perch. The run having then room to pass away into the middle harbour, and out at its present entrance, would be vastly diminished near the present pier; and vessels which lie uneasy there, might pass away into the middle harbour when the tide made, lie behind the breakwater aforesaid, or even go on to Kilmor's Port. Again, vessels coming in with too much way to luff up clear of the perch-rock, might go on, enter by the middle harbour, and bring up to the pier by the new passage." In 1827, the port possessed 4 sloops, 2 packets to the Isle of Man, 19 herring smacks of 20 or 25 tons each, and 30 yawls. In 1830, as the rendezvous of the Down fisheries, it had 39 decked vessels of aggregately 1,123 tons, 100 half-decked vessels of 1,231 tons, 69 open sail-boats of 412 tons, and 300 row-boats of 1,200 tons; and employed 2,441 fishermen. The export trade of the town, in its ancient time of prosperity, was for the most part conducted through Killyhugh Harbour, a mile distant, on a straight line; and that place was, in consequence, called by Speed the Haven of Ardglass. See KILLOUGH. Even yet the trade of the two places, landward and seaward, is so blended as to be treated cumulatively in all the estimates we have seen of its amount. In 1835, the total of carriage inland from the two places was 2,820 tons, and consisted chiefly of coals and manure; and the total of carriage from the interior to them was 13,700 tons, of which 10,000 were for exportation, 1,800 were stone, lime, and turf, and 1,900 were articles, chiefly agricultural produce, for local consumption. In the same year, the estimated value of imports was £2,070, of which £2,860 was for coal, culm, and cinders; and the estimated value of exports was £35,161, of which £21,770 was for corn, £8,846 for potatoes, £3,275 for cows and oxen, £768 for flax and tow, and the rest for horses, kelp, linen, butter, and eggs. A light-house at Ardglass exhibits a fixed light, red toward the sea, and bright toward the harbour. The disbursements on account of it in 1840 amounted to £269 1s. 9d. In 1839-40, a dispensary in the town, under the Downpatrick Poor-law union, received £145 19s., expended £159 17s. 1½d., administered to 520 patients, and served for a district containing a pop. of 8,021, and comprehending an area of 16,553 acres. Ardglass formerly gave the title of Earl to the family of Cromwell, and afterwards that of Viscount to the family of Barrington. Area of the town, 31 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,162; in 1841, 1,066. Houses 199.

ARDGOWELL, an ancient castle, now in ruins, on the western border of the barony of Turaney, and co. Armagh, Ulster. It overlooks the road from Monaghan to Armagh by way of Middleton; and was anciently a stronghold of the O'Neils.

ARDGROOM, a creek and a village, about the middle of the south side of the Kenmare river or estuary, Munster. The creek projects upwards of two miles inland, at the boundary between Cork and Kerry; is partly covered by Dutch-island; and receives at its head a rivulet which runs 5 miles northward to it from a lake. The village stands on its east shore. Pop. not separately stated.

ARDGUIN, or ARDQUIN, a parish in the barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. Area, 3,043 acres. Pop., in 1831, 994; in 1841, 916. Houses 174. It lies along the shore of Lough Strangford, immediately north of Portaferry; and is traversed by the road from that town to Newton-Ardes and Belfast. The seat of Ardgquin or Abbey is situated about 2 miles north-north-west of Portaferry; it was a bishop's lease, and a family possession of the Echlin for several generations, even before the rebellion of 1641; and Robert Echlin, bishop of Down and Connor, died here in 1635. Southward of the house rises a mountain which is reckoned the highest land in Ardes. The name Ardgquin is a corruption of Ard-Cuan, 'a height over Cuan,' the ancient appellation of Strangford; and alludes to the position of the mountain relatively to the lough. The alias name, Abbey, seems to imply that a monastery once stood on or near the place,—probably the priory of Eynes, which, though not traceable or easily identified with a specific locality, is known to have stood in the Ardes. Seven townlands in Ardgquin are said to have been given to the church in Roman Catholic times, by Savage of Portaferry, as a votive offering. —This parish is not noticed in the Population Returns of 1831, and seems to have been included in the parish of Ballyphilip; nor, except incidentally, and in connection with episcopal expenditure, is it noticed in the Reports of the Ecclesiastical Revenue Commissioners.—Ardguin is a rectory in the dio. of Down. The tithes, the amount of which is not stated, are held by the bishop, yet are in dispute; and till the question respecting them be settled, he pays to a curate a salary of £74. The church is reported in 1833 to have been recently built. Attendance, from 19 to 40. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 109 Churchmen, 290 Presbyterians, and 613 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was attended by 119 children; and a daily school had on its books 42 boys and 32 girls.

ARDHOLL. See ARDGLASS.

ARDKEEN, a parish in the barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It lies along Lough Strangford, immediately north of Ardquin; and, owing to similarity of name and contiguity of position, seems to be very generally confounded with that parish. Ardkeen-house stands on the shore of a little narrow creek called Dorn, 'the haft of a sword,' ½ mile north-north-east of Ardkeen-house, and ¾ north of Portaferry. The name Ardkeen signifies 'a high head;' and alludes to a somewhat lofty eminence which overhangs Lough Strangford. On this eminence anciently stood the seat of the Savages [see ARDES]; a castle and dwelling-house, surrounded by a rampart, and looking boldly down upon the lake. The parish is traversed northward by the road from Portaferry to Belfast. About one-fourth of the parochial surface is land of second-rate quality; and all the rest is either impractically rocky soil or cut-out bog. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,801 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,176; in 1841, 2,238. Houses 429. —Ardkeen is an appropriate rectory and a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Down. The rectory forms part of the benefice of Inch and corps of St. Andrews' prebend in the cathedral of Down; and the rectorial tithes are compounded for £200. The tithes of 6 townlands are reserved for the curacy, and compounded for £264 18s. 9d. Gross income, £277 18s. 9d.; nett, £260 12s. 8d. Patron, the prebendary of St. Andrews. An assistant curate has £150 a-year, and the use of the glebe-house. The church is supposed to have been built in 1500, and repaired in 1630 by private subscription. Sittings 200; attendance 75. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700 and upwards, and is served by two officiates, who serve also the chapel of Witter. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 173 Churchmen, 630 Presbyterians, and 1,429 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school was attended by 27 children; and 2 daily schools, one of which received £50 a-year from Colonel and Lady H. Forde, had on their books 118 boys and 97 girls.

ARDKILL, a parish in the barony of Carbery, co. Kildare, Leinster. Post-town, Edenderry. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 5,848 acres. Pop., in 1831, 864; in 1841, 1,214. Houses 191. The average value of the land, in common with that of 7 adjacent parishes, is 26s. per plantation acre.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Kildare, and forms part of the benefice of CASTLE-CARBERY: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £56 5s. 9½d., and the rectorial for £112 11s. 7½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600, and, jointly with Dunlough chapel, is under the care of two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 62, and the Roman Catholics to 1,121; and a daily school at Derrentum had on its books 14 boys and 16 girls.

ARDMAYLE, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, 3 miles north by west of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. It lies in the basin of the Suir, on the road from Cashel to Thurles, between the former town and Holycross. The average value of the land is about 30s. per plantation acre. Near the highway are the mansions of Ardmayle and Longfield. Length of the parish, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 4,941 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,914; in 1841, 1,757. Houses 251.—This parish is wholly inappropriate, and constitutes a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Cashel. The rectorial tithes, amounting to £150, and also £24 of the vicarial tithes, belong to W. Cooper, Esq., as lessee of the Rev. W. Sutton, and the remainder of the vicarial tithes, amounting to £138 9s. 2½d., belong to Mr. W. Linton as lessee of the vicars choral of St. Patrick's, Cashel. Gross income of the curacy, £140 5s. 10d.; nett, £108 8s. 10d. The church was built in 1814, at the cost of £876 18s. 5½d.; most of which was gifted, and the rest lent, by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by between 2,000 and 3,000, and has two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 37, and the Roman Catholics to 1,976; and a National school had on its books 56 boys and 22 girls.

ARDMILLAN, a hamlet in the parish of Tullynaskill, barony of Lower Castleragh, co. Down, Ulster. Area, 10 acres. Pop. in 1841, 108. Houses 21.

ARDMORE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It contains a village of its own name: see next article. Length, about 8 miles; breadth, 5; area, 24,215 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,318; in 1841, 8,737. Houses 1,374. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 6,904; in 1841, 8,031. Houses 1,258. The coast is prevalently bold and rocky; it is perforated with various caverns, the chief of which, called the Parlour, is large and curious; and it describes a boldly sinuous or serpentine curve, projecting in Ardmore Head on the west, and receding round Ardmore bay or harbour on the east. The headland is a conspicuous promontory of St. George's Channel, 8 miles south-west of Helwick Point, and the same distance north-east of Ring Point; the bay will be noticed in connection with the village. The surface along the seaboard is champaign, and generally excellent land, affording either rich artificial pasture, or luxuriant crops of corn. But inward, and athwart the larger part of the interior, it consists of a congeries of lofty upland, topographically designated Slievegrine, or 'the Mountain,' and is only partially arable. The higher ridges of the upland are generally carpeted with a light gravelly soil, while the hollows are, to a considerable extent, occupied by bog. Cattle grazed on the unarable summits and declivities, especially toward the sea, where snow seldom lies 48 hours, have long been observed to bear the rigour of a severe winter better than such as are pastured on richer lands. Iron ore was at one time dug from some large pits, on the side of the upland road leading from Dungarvan to Youghal. 'The Mountain,' or Slievegrine, is separately noticed in the census of 1831, and had then a pop. of 2,374. The chief objects of interest belong to our notice of the village.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £216, and the rectorial for £432; and the latter are appropriated to the precentorship of the cathedral church of Lismore. The vicarages of Ardmore and BALLYMACART [see that article] constitute the benefice of Ardmore. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 6. Gross income, £276; nett, £254 8s. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church is so ancient, that the date of erection is unknown. Sittings 150; attendance, from 30 to 60. The Ardmore Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 700 to 1,000; and in common with the chapels of Ballymacart and Kinsalbeg, has 3 officiates. In 1834, the Protestants of Ardmore parish amounted to 55, and the Roman Catholics to 7,565; the Protestants of the union to 63, and the Roman Catholics to 8,580; and 5 pay-schools in Ardmore, and a National school in Ballymacart, had on their books 367 boys and 118 girls.

ARDMORE village is charmingly situated near the west end of Ardmore bay, in the parish just described, about 4 miles east-north-east of Youghal. Area, 39 acres. Pop., in 1831, 414; in 1841, 716. Houses 116. This village overlooks a smooth, sheltered, and extensive beach; and ought to be a favourite retreat of sea-bathers. Several neat and pleasant cottages, occupied by annuitants, or designed for the use of visitors, have already been built. The inhabitants are supported chiefly as agriculturists and fishermen. The harbour possesses many natural advantages; and, if it had a pier and a quay, it would afford shelter not only to large fishing-boats, but to vessels of from 6 to 8 feet draught. A slip, too, would be of service to facilitate the hauling up of boats. Ardmore is rich in architectural antiquities; and, in consequence, makes extravagant claims upon popular belief as to the marvellousness and remoteness of its history. Thaumaturgic tales, not one of which must we repeat, are current respecting various objects in its vicinity, and some alleged epochs in its early annals. Rather discrepantly with the usual style of the local ecclesiastical historiography of Ireland, Ardmore is made to figure as a retreat of Christianity, a home of the canonized, and even the seat of a bishopric considerably before the time of St. Patrick. St. Declan, son of the Desii, is alleged, when 7 years old, to have been baptized here or in the vicinity by a priest of the name of Colman,—to have been put under the literary tuition of Dymna, a pious Christian,—to have travelled, for the completion of his education, to Rome,—to have been ordained there by the pope,—to have returned to Ireland about the year 402,—to have founded at Ardmore an abbey and a bishopric,—and to have been constituted, in 448, the archbishop of Munster, and patron of the Nan-Desil. A manuscript Life of Declan, some extracts from which were published by Archbishop Usher, represents St. Patrick as oracularly designating him to his tutelary station, in the words:—

'Declan Padraig Nan-Desil, ag Declan go brath.'

Thus translated by Dr. Dunkin:—

'Declan the mitred honour of divines,
The deathless Patrick of his Descie shines.'

We need hardly say that the wild popular fables to which we have alluded are very nearly on a footing of authenticity with this pretty piece of pretended hagiography; or that such utter confusion pervades the whole story of Declan as to prevent the edification from it of almost any portion of real history. Ardmore—we are told too, and with more probability—was anciently a Danish settlement. A short deed of the year 1197, seen by Dr. Smith, conveyed from a Dane of the name of Christiana Hy-Dorothy, a small tract of land to the family of the Meruins, with whom it remained till they sold it in 1745. In the vicinity are circular intrenchments and other Danish works. In the village, when Dr. Smith wrote, was "the stump of a castle;" and not long before a much larger one was taken down. In the churchyard, on a rocky eminence, near a sandy cove, stand the chief of the ecclesiastical antiquities,—St. Declan's dormitory or shrine, the church, and a round tower. The dormitory is a mere stone hut, lighted by one small square window, and derives all its interest from containing the remains of the real or supposed tomb of St. Declan. The church, judging from the massive irregularity of its architecture, and the clumsiness of its buttresses, is evidently very ancient. Only the part of it used for service is now roofed. On the interior of the west wall are twelve figures, each under a small Saxon arch, but much defaced by the attrition of weather; and beneath these, within the semicircular projections, are irregularly executed bas-reliefs of various subjects, the chief of which seem to be the baptism of Christ, a Jewish sacrifice, the judgment of Solomon, and Adam and Eve in paradise. The round tower, immediately south of the church, is 91 feet in height, and 15 feet in diameter at the base; the doorway is 16 feet from the ground; and 4 windows in the highest story, each two mutually opposite, are larger than any other apertures except the doorway. The tower gradually diminishes in diameter from bottom to top; and terminates in a pyramidal roof of cut stone. "A kind of crutch, like a cross," which formerly surmounted it, has disappeared. Four projecting belts or courses of masonry carried round the tower, and separating it into a basement and 4 stories or compartments, render it unique among the curious antiquities of its class. Tradition takes occasion from the existence of two transverse pieces of oak in the highest story, and from some other indications of the uses of a belfry, to assert that a bell once hung in the tower of so powerful a tone that its sound was heard at the distance of 8 miles, in the Glin-More, or Big Glen. The tower is a conspicuous feature, in a landscape of many miles in diameter, and occasionally serves as a landmark to mariners. About a mile from the village, and crowning the brow of some shelving rocks which immediately overhang the bay, are slender vestiges of a place of worship, supposed to have been older than that in the churchyard, and called the old Temple of Disart. A high gable of it, ornamented with a well-cut Gothic window, was, about 15 years ago, demolished by a sudden gust of wind. A 'holy well,' in a remaining fragment of one of the walls, was dressed into neatness, and adopted as a kind of hermitage, by a private soldier of the Donegal militia, who retired hither after the rebellion of 1798. Adjoining are some holes, whence silver is said to have been mined. St. Declan's stone, his alleged scull encased in silver, the observances of visitors to the 'holy well,' and the crowding of peasants to the Ardmore 'patrons,' are matters which, as topographers, we merely name.

ARDMORE, co. Armagh. See MOYNTAGHS.

ARDMOY. See ARMOW.

ARDMULCAN, a parish in the barony of Screen, 2½ miles north-east of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 3,583 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,000; in 1841, 1,038. Houses 168. The parish forms part of the immediate banks of the Boyne; and is rich in the features of verdure, wood, and cereal produce. Ardmulcan-house is the seat of Robert Taaffe, Esq.; and confronts, on the opposite side of the Boyne, the far-stretching and well-wooded demesne of Swinerton.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Meath; and forms part of the benefice of PAINSTOWN: see hicc. Tithe composition, £253 16s. 10½d. There is neither church nor chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 119, and the Roman Catholics to 946; and a school of the London Hibernian Society had on its books 20 boys and 25 girls.

ARDNACRUSHA, a hamlet in the parish of St. Patrick, barony of Lower Burren, co. Clare, Munster. Area, 2 acres. Pop., in 1841, 136. Houses 17.

ARDNAGASHILL, a delightfully situated demesne, at the embouchure of the long, narrow, precipitous and winding glen of the Courlum into Bantry bay, co. Cork. Various parts of the demesne command extensive and thrilling views of the scenery of the bay and the circumjacent country.

ARDNAGEEHY, a parish in the barony of Barrymore, 5½ miles south-west of Rathcormac, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the villages of WATERGRASSHILL and GLENVILLE: see these articles. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 8; area, 16,335 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,715; in 1841, 4,798. Houses 715. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,639. Houses 543. It is traversed southward by the post-road from Dublin to Cork; and cut eastward into nearly equal parts by the river Bride. The section south of the river consists of excellent arable land; and the northern section, though mountainous, is grassy and productive.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £438 9s. 3d. Gross income, £458 9s. 3d.; nett, £406 13s. 3½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7½d. The church was built about the year 1798, by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 25. Two Roman Catholic chapels, at Watergrasshill and Glenville, have two officiates; and are attended, the former by 2,200, and the latter by 2,300. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 98, and the Roman Catholics to 3,942; a Protestant Sunday school was attended by 18 children; and 7 daily and pay-schools had on their books 166 boys and 99 girls. In 1840, a National school at Glenville, salaried with £12, was attended by 171 boys and 121 girls.

ARDNAGLASS, a bay on the coast of co. Sligo, Connaught. It opens from the south-west corner of Sligo bay, and projects south-eastward to the village of Ballysader; and from that village being situated at its head, it is very generally called Ballysadere bay. It is about 6 miles in length, and a mile or upwards in breadth. Across more than half of the entrance, it is invaded by a line of sand hills from the north; and across the remainder is a sand bar exposed to the whole run of the Atlantic, and ill-adapted to the purposes of a fishery. Within the bar, the bay forms a safe harbour; but is mostly dry at low water, and little used for navigation. The channel up to the falls near the village is intricate, and wants perches.

ARDNAREE, a town in the parish of Kilmore-moy, barony of Tyreragh, co. Sligo, Connaught. It extends along the right bank of the river Moy, directly opposite Ballina; and, except for political position in a different parish, barony, and county, from that town, would be regarded as, in all respects, a part of it. Ardaree, to the eye of the traveller, as well as in relative size, beauty, and importance, is the twin-town of Ballina, and not a mere suburb. Its parish-church of Kilmore-moy, and its spacious ornamented Gothic Roman Catholic chapel, regarded as the cathedral church of the Roman Catholic diocese of Killalla, render it, in an ecclesiastical point of view, quite the superior of Ballina; which has only small meeting-houses and no parish church or chapel. In trade, it is not much inferior to its competitor; and in the appearance, street-arrangements, and grouped effect of its houses, it is altogether equal. In 1427, a monastery of Augustinian Eremites was founded in Ardnaree. Fairs are held on June 20th, Oct. 10th, and Dec. 13th. See BALLINA and MOY. Area of the town, 43 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,482; in 1841, 1,699. Houses 325.

ARDNURCHER, or HORSELEAP, a parish, partly in the barony of Kilcurry, King's co., partly in that of Moyashebel, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4½. Area of the King's co. section, 2,813 acres; of the Westmeath section, 9,199 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,701; in 1841, 3,687. Houses 663. Pop. of the King's co. section, in 1831, 1,079; in 1841, 1,154. Houses 205. Pop. of the Westmeath section, in 1831, 2,622; in 1841, 2,533. Houses 458. The hamlet of Horse-leap stands in the Westmeath section, 2½ miles west-north-west of Kilbeggan; and had, in 1831, a pop. of 87. The parish is bisected westward by the mail-road from Dublin, ramifying at Ballinasloe toward Westport and Galway. The land, though containing some interspersions of bog, is, in general, arable and fertile. On a moat at Ardnurcher, a castle was erected by Hugh de Lacy. "Probably," says a writer in the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy, "de Lacy found this, like other of the curious ancient moats, an high truncated cone, though not quite circular or insulated, as it is part of a long and narrow ridge. It is surrounded with a trench and an outer mound of earth, having very rude caves down through its centre, which were open lately. On the western part of the high mound are the remains of a small and round tower, built of lime and stone. A stone wall, whose fragments are still visible, surrounded the remainder of the platform of this high mound. The next lower area, on the south-east side, was defended by a sweeping wall, in which was the great gate of entrance, accessible only by a drawbridge over a deep fosse, supported by two piers of stone-work, one communicating with the gate of the fort, and the other joined to the high land on the south side of the fosse. All the walls that surrounded the upper work are now disparted, and scattered in large fragments over the lower area. Traces of their foundation, however, are visible. The principal stone-work that has escaped the ravages of time and war, is found in the two piers of the drawbridge and lower gate, vulgarly called the Horse-leap." The circumstance whence, at once, this part of the fortalice, the hamlet, and the parish, are popularly termed Horseleap, is a traditionary and failed leap made by Sir Hugh de Lacy's horse over the space between the piers of the drawbridge.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £94 12s. 3½d., and the rectorial for £189 4s. 7d.; and the latter are improriate in the Marquis of Downshire. The vicarages of Ardnurcher, KILCUMREAGH, KILMANAGHAN, RANUE, and KILBRIDE-LANGAN, [see these articles,] constitute the benefice of Ardnurcher. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6. Gross income, £850 15s. 9d.; nett, £612 16s. 1½d. Patron, the Crown. A perpetual curacy is erected within the parishes of Kilmanaghan and Kilbride-Langan. See CLARA. The church of the union, situated at Horseleap, is a very ancient building, of unascertained cost and date. Sitings 150; attendance, about 50. The Roman Catholic chapel of Ardnurcher is attended by about 2,000; and shares with a chapel in Clara the cure of two officiates. Roman Catholic and Protestant dissenting chapels exist in the other parishes. In 1834, the Protestants of Ardnurcher amounted to 116, and the Roman Catholics to 3,662; the Protestants of the union, but exclusive of those in Clara curacy, to 392, and the Roman Catholics to 8,404. In the same year, 8 daily schools in Ardnurcher, one of which was parochial, and aided with £13 of salary, had on their books 132 boys and 80 girls; and 14 in the union, but exclusive of those in Clara curacy, had 207 boys and 108 girls.

ARDOYNE, a parish partly in the barony of Shillelagh, co. Wicklow, and partly in the baronies of Rathvilly and Forth, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½. Area of the Shillelagh section, 1,600 acres; of the Rathvilly section, 131 acres; of the Forth section, 4,645 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the S. section, 494; of the R. section, 30; of the F. section, 1,267. Houses in the three sections respectively, 77, 6, and 206.—The district is not noticed as a parish by the majority of even quite modern authorities; it was ecclesiastically erected out of the parishes of Fennagh and Barragh; and most of its statistics are still mixed up with those of these parishes.—Arloynoe is a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Leighlin. Gross income, £70; nett, £50. Patrons, the incumbents of Fennagh and Barragh alternately. The church was built in 1833, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. The land, though light, is good.

ARDPATRICK, a parish in the barony of Costlea, co. Limerick, Leinster. The civil parish and the ecclesiastical differ enormously from each other in extent. Area of the civil parish, 624 acres. Pop., in 1841, 101. Houses 14. Area of the ecclesiastical parish, 16,997 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,739. Houses 393. The parish lies along the northern skirt of the Galtée Mountains, 4 miles south-east of Kilmallock. A grand feature of both topographical and historical interest is the object referred to in its name,—the height or eminence of Patrick; yet the explanation of the name is nearly the sum of all authentic attraction; though the village of Ardpatrik, on the side of the Castle Oliver hills, contains the ruin of an ancient round tower. Fairs are held on March 17th, April 26th, September 12th, and November 12th.—This parish is grouped, in a manner not explained, with the union or benefice of Kilmallock, the tithes of which constitute the economy fund of the dean and chapter of St. Mary's cathedral, Limerick. See KILMALLOCK. One Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 500, and each of two others by from 500 to 600; and the three share with Ballygaddy chapel the care of two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 177, and the Roman Catholics to 2,673. There is no school.

ARDRA. See ARDRAH.

ARDRAHAN, a parish partly in the barony of Loughrea, partly in that of Kiltartan, but chiefly in that of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 5. Area of the Loughrea section, 4,630 acres; of the Kiltartan section, 3,078 acres; of the Dunkellin section, 10,240 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 3,805; in 1841, 4,191. Houses 683. Pop. of the Loughrea section, in 1831, 291; in 1841, 912. Houses 148. Pop. of the Kiltartan section, in 1831, 969; in 1841, 1,162. Houses 200. Pop. of the Dunkellin section, in 1831, 2,445; in 1841, 2,117. Houses 335. The hamlet of Ardahan stands $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Gort, on the post-road from that town to Loughrea. Near it, and within the parish, are the mansions of Castle-Taylor, Cregclare, and Tylara. Fairs are held in the village on March 21st, September 12th, and November 12th. The rivulet Gurtamackin, much of whose course is subterranean, bisects the parish south-south-westward. Wheat is raised around the village of Ardahan for the Galway market. Yet most of the parochial surface is high and pastoral; consisting of part of the long broad band of uplands called the Slieve Baughta mountains. A dispensary in the parish is a branch of that in Gort, the only one which exists in a Poor-law union of 89,828 acres, and 38,342 inhabitants. See GORT.—Ardahan is a rectory in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. Tithe composition £356. This rectory and that of BEACH, [which see,] constitute the benefice of Ardahan. The two parishes are mutually 4 miles separate, by the intervention of Kiltartan and Kilmacduagh. Gross income of the benefice, £785 11s. 14d.; nett, £691 10s. 2½d. Patron, the Marquis of Clanricarde. A curate has a stipend of £18 9s. 2½d. The church was built in 1809, by means of a parochial assessment of £369 4s. 7½d., and a grant from the late Board of First Fruits of £461 10s. 0½d. Sittings 200; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel of Ardahan is attended by from 800 to 1,000, and a Roman Catholic place of meeting in Tylara-house by from 50 to 60; and the two are served by one officiate. There is a chapel also in Beach. In 1834, the Protestants of Ardahan amounted to 60, and the Roman Catholics to 4,013; the Protestants of the union to 109, and the Roman Catholics to 9,691; the daily schools of Ardahan to 6, with an average attendance of 247 children; and the daily schools of the union to 12, with an average attendance of 587. One of the Ardahan schools was a free-school, whose teacher received £5 a-year from Sir John Taylor, and £10 a-year, besides board and lodging, from Captain Shaw of Castle-Taylor; and the other 5 were pay-schools at the Roman Catholic chapel, at Castle-Daly, at Cox-town, at Ballinduff, and at Moneen.

ARDREA, or ARDEA, a parish in the barony of Portneinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It contains the village of IRISH-TOWN, and part of the town of MOUNTMELICK: see these articles. Area, 7,726 acres. Pop., in 1841, 5,185. Houses 845. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 3,603. Houses 564. The surface lies along the road from Maryborough to Monasteren, very nearly midway between these towns; and either includes the post-village of Emo, or extends to its immediate vicinity.—Though Ardrea is a rectory, charged in the King's books at £10 3s. 10½d., all its statistics, topographical, political, and ecclesiastical, except the few which we have given, are amassed with those of COOLBANAGHER: which see.

ARDREE, or LITTLE ARDREE, or ARDEE, a small parish on the western border of the barony of Kilkennedy and Moone, co. Kildare, Leinster. The surface consists chiefly of light tillage land, and forms part of the immediate banks of the Barrow, about a mile south of Athy. Length, $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 323 acres. Pop., in 1831, 372; in 1841, 205. Houses 41.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Dublin; and forms part of the benefice of ATHY: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £8, and the rectorial for £16; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the representatives of John Gould. There is neither church, chapel, nor school. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 32 Protestants and 276 Roman Catholics.—The name Ardree is a corruption of ATHIRDIAGH, 'the ford of the royal height'; and originally designated a town which stood on a rising ground in the parish, and commanded a ford and pass of the river on the great southern road to Dublin. A rath, called Dunbrin, still remains on the west side of the river; and, from its having yielded up a number of Danish coins, is supposed to have been a Danish station. The town stood on the east bank opposite the rath; and figures in history as the scene of a battle, in the 10th century, between the Danes and the Irish. After the arrival of the English, a castle was erected in the town; so late as the reign of Elizabeth, a garrison was maintained; and, at more recent periods, a number of that queen's coins have been found on the spot. The town fell into decay on the establishment of Athy; and has long been extinct. A writer of the year 1793 says, "Several streets may still be traced, in particular one called Botharbellagher, or the street of the great road leading to the town of Ardsaul or Ascul, now also no more. The road also which led through it is still visible on both sides of the river for some miles, and seems to have been paved." See ARDSKULL.

ARDRESS, a small village in the parish of Kilmalaghton, barony of Kilmonee, about 6 miles from Ballinasloe, co. Galway, Connaught. Ardress is the name also of a seat, 3 miles east of Charlemonnt, co. Armagh, Ulster.

ARDRISTAN, a parish in the barony of Rathvilly, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length and breadth, each half-a-mile; area, 1,571 acres. Pop., in 1831, 543; in 1841, 598. Houses 107. The surface forms part of the immediate banks of the Slaney, is of average quality as to soil, and is traversed south-westward by the road from Tullow to Leighlin Bridge.—This parish is an inappropriate and perpetual curacy in the dio. of Leighlin, and, previous to 1832, formed part of the union of Aghade. Tithe composition and gross income, £145 1s. 6d.; nett, £87 1s. Patron, the diocesan. There is neither church, chapel, glebe-house, nor school. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 530.

ARDRUM, the seat of Sir N. Colthurst, Bart., 6 miles west of Cork, and 1 mile north of Inniscarra, co. Cork, Munster. It pleasantly surmounts a rising ground on the south side of the road from Cork to Killarney. The baronetage of the proprietor dates from Aug. 3, 1744.

ARDS. See ARDES.

ARDSALLA, a small parish on the right bank of the river Boyne, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Navan, barony of Lower Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Length and breadth, each $\frac{1}{4}$ mile; area, 1,739 acres. Pop., in 1831, 289; in 1841, 341. Houses 61. Though the land is of an indifferent quality, yet the seat and demesne of Ardsalla combine with the adjacent ones of Bellinier greatly to ornament the banks of the Boyne. Ardsalla demesne, however, seems to be as ill kept as it is delightfully situated. The estate anciently formed part of the extensive landed property of the Nangles, Barons of Navan, but passed by marriage, early in the 17th century, into the possession of the family of Ludlow. In 1719 and 1727, Peter Ludlow represented Meath in parliament; and in 1735 and 1760, his son was created successively Baron Ludlow, Viscount Preston, and Earl Ludlow. A monastery, or religious establishment of some sort, is said to have been founded at Ardsalla, early in the 6th century, by St. Finian of Clonard.—This parish was formerly a vicarage, but is now a rectory in the dio. of Meath, and forms part of the benefice of NAVAN: which see. Tithe composition, £150. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 225; and 3 daily schools, 2 of which were aided from various quarters with respectively £19 14s. and £17, were attended by about 120 children.

ARDSALLIS (THE), a rivulet of the county of Clare, Munster. It rises among uplands not far from the northern border of the county; runs sinuously, but, on the whole, in a south-westerly direction, through the baronies of Bunratty, and falls into the Fergus, near the head of that river's estuary. The stream, comparatively with its length of course, is bulky in volume, and has been subordinated for the irrigation and fertilizing of a large tract of formerly unproductive land.

ARDSALLIS, a village on the above river, 6 miles above its embouchure, co. Clare, Munster. It stands on the road from Ennis to Limerick, about 3½ miles east-south-east of Clare, and upwards of 5 north-west of Six-mile-Bridge. It was formerly noted for its horse fairs and horse-racing. In its vicinity are the ruins of an ancient castle.

ARDSKEAGH, a parish, formerly in a detached part of the barony of Condons and Clangibbon, but now in the north-west corner of the barony of Fermoy, 1½ mile south by east of Charleville, and on the northern border of co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, ¾; area, 1,929 acres. Pop., in 1831, 302; in 1841, 280. Houses 36. The land, disposed partly in tillage, and partly in pasturage, is excellent.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne; it was formerly united to the parish of Charleville; but it became a suspended benefice under the provisions of the Church Temporalities Act. Tithe composition, £88 11s. 9d; gross value, £100 18s. 5d. There is in the parish neither church, chapel, school, nor Protestant.

ARDSKULL, the site of an ancient but quite extinct town, on the road from Dublin to Cork, 3 miles north-east of Athy, co. Kildare, Leinster. The Scots, under Edward Bruce, obtained a victory here in 1315. On the brow of a hill, and skirted by a curvature of the public road, appears the moat of Ardskill, one of the most remarkable antiquities of its class, for both size and situation, in the kingdom. The moat is conspicuous enough in itself; but it particularly arrests the eye for miles round, in consequence of being sheeted with young wood.

ARDSTRAW, a large and important parish in the barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the town of NEWTOWN-STEWART, and the villages of ARDSTRAW and DOUGLASS BRIDGE: see these articles. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 2 miles over the one half, and 4½ miles over the other half; area, 44,974 acres, 1 rood, 3 perches. Pop., in 1831, 18,602; in 1841, 17,384. Houses 3,085. Pop. of the rural districts in 1841, 15,728. Houses 2,763. The ecclesiastical parish is more extensive than the civil parish; it includes a district in the barony of Omagh; and, in 1831, its pop. amounted to 21,212. Three considerable rivulets drain the surface; and, becoming confluent, pass away in one stream to pay tribute to the Foyle. See GLENELLY, STUELL, DERG, MOYLE, and MOURNE. The streams produce both trout and salmon. Three wooded and beautiful lakes adorn the demesne of Baron's-court, and a fourth, called Creevy, and situated near Magherycigan, is circular, and about a mile in circumference. The surface of the parish possesses such an aggregate of wood, so general a carpeting of verdure and cereal crop, and such a diversified and strongly-featured contour, as to be rich in the number and not poor in the character of its landscapes. A mountain, called Douglass, shoots up on the north-east border; two mountains, called Bessy Bell and Mary Grey, rise, the one immediately behind Newtown-Stewart, and the other about a mile to the east; various minor heights finely screen or tumulate the vales; and a beautiful hill-range extends westward from Newtown-Stewart, crowned in the vicinity of the town with a picturesque old castle, and luxuriantly mantled in other places with groves of oak. Bessy Bell and Mary Grey are bare in the summit and russeted on the sides, but green and arable round the skirts. How or when Irishmen imposed on these mountains names so thoroughly and nationally embalmed in the pathetic ballad associations of Scotland, cannot be ascertained; but 'canny' Scotsmen may be pardoned for regarding the affair as one of the unaccountable freaks which distinguish the workings of Hibernian humour. Antiquarian conjecture, aided by tradition, suggests that pagan rites called 'Baase' were, in heathen times, performed on the summit of the westerly mountain to Bell, Beal, Apollo, or the Sun; and that 'Baase-Bell,' the ceremonies of Bell, 'was a sound which, subsequent to the celebrity of the Scottish ballad, easily glided into Bessy Bell, and suggested the counterpart of Mary Giey. Bogs, while numerous, are so equally dispersed as rather to serve for an acceptable supply of fuel, than to incumber and dispirit by a display of sterility. Mountains and bogs jointly occupy about one-third of the parochial area; and arable, pasture, and meadow grounds occupy the remainder, in the proportions to one another of respectively 3, 2, and 1. Excellent sandstone is quarried near Douglass Bridge, and sent to distant parts of the country. The principal seat is the noble mansion of BARON'S-COURT: which see. Other seats are Castleinoyle, an ancient but respectable mansion; Woodbrook, a neat modern house; Aldoghal, on an upland site; and Glencock Cottage, crowning a hill north of Newtown-Stewart, and commanding an exquisite view of the vale and bill-screens of the Struell. The parish is bisected by the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry; and traversed by various other roads, the chief of which radiate from Newtown-Stewart. The castle, already alluded to, as surmounting a shoulder of the hill-range west of Newtown-Stewart, is an interesting object, and will be noticed in our account of that town. Two extinct castles, traditionally said to have been built by brothers of Henry O'Neil, a storied king of Ulster in the fifth century, stood, the one near the confluence of the Struell and the Glenelly, on a spot now occupied by a neat circular cottage orneé, and the other on an alluvial and river-girt plain, called the Holme, and used as the Newtown-Stewart parade and race-course. The disappearance of the latter has been ascribed to the propensity of castle-eating, or the vulgar practice of quarrying an architectural antiquity for the construction of a modern dwelling, on the part of the early inhabitants of the town. A surviving ancient castle, situated opposite the Holme, was burned by Sir Phelim Roe O'Neil in 1641, rebuilt by Sir William Stewart after he became Lord Mountjoy, and again burned by King James on his retreat from Londonderry. Another extant old castle crowns a thickly wooded rising ground on the east side of Baron's-court demesne. Rath or Danish forts are so numerous that about a dozen may be counted within a mile on the western skirts of Mary Grey. A cromlech, called by the country people a clogh-ogle,* stands on a hill a mile north of Newtown-Stewart. It consists of 3 upright stones, triangularly placed, and about 7 feet high, supporting a horizontal stone, 15 or 16 inches thick, 11 feet long, and nearly 7 feet broad.

Ardstraw is a rectory and separate benefice in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £1,089. Gross income, £1,646 13s.; nett, £1,536 19s. 3d. Patron, Trinity College, Dublin. A curate is employed at a stipend of £75. The church was built about 105 years ago, and received the ornament of a steeple after the commencement of the present century; but at what cost, or from what fund, it was either built or ornamented, is not known. Sittings upwards of 500; attendance, from 300 to 400. Two school-houses at Cavandarragh and Clare are also jointly used as parochial places of worship. Sittings 150 and 200; average attendance, from 200 to 300. A grant was made by the late Board of First Fruits of £600 toward the erection of a new church; but, up to 1837, the difficulty of obtaining a suitable site had prevented the erection. There are in the parish 3 Roman Catholic chapels; 3 Wesleyan Methodist meeting-houses, the congregations of which rank either as Presbyterians or as Churchmen; and 7 meeting-houses belonging to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, 5 of which were formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and 2 of the Secession Synod. The Roman Catholic chapels of Deragish and Carn-core have jointly 2 officiates, and respectively an attendance of from 750 to 800, and from 600 to 650; and that at Glenock has an officiate for itself, and an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,500. The Wesleyan meeting-house at Newtown-Stewart is attended by from 30 to 50; that at Lislea, by from 120 to 200; and the Primitive Wesleyan meeting-house, by from 120 to 200. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses at Newtown-Stewart are attended each by from 100 to 200; that at Ardstraw-Bridge, by from 100 to 400; that at Douglass, by from 150 to 300; that at Clady, by from 50 to 150; that at Garveteagh, by from 100 to 250; and that at Drumlinagh, by from 200 to 300. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,658 members of the Established church, 9,058 Presbyterians, and 9,556 Roman Catholics; 13 Sunday schools had aggregated an average attendance of from 732 to 1,000 children; and 33 daily schools had on their books 1,353 boys and 825 girls. Thirteen of the daily schools were under the London Hibernian and Kildare Place Societies, and one of these 13 received in addition £3 3s. from the Hon. G. Stewart, one £10 from the Marquis of Abercorn, one about £3 8s. from the rector, and seven £5 each from the Marquis of Abercorn; 4 of the other daily schools received either £8 or £10 each from the National Board; one received £5 from the rector, and £6 6s. from Mr. Gardener's trustees; and the rest were supported wholly by fees. In 1840, when we find the parish divided into Ardstraw, Ardstraw-East, and Ardstraw-West, the National Board had 2 schools, salaried at £10 and £4 in Ardstraw; 3 at £12, £12, and £8, in Ardstraw-West; and 2 at £5 6s. 8d., and £8 in Ardstraw-East, or Newtown-Stewart.—In the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical divisions occur Ardstraw-East and Ardstraw-West; and both have Newtown-Stewart as their post-town.

ARDSTRAW-BRIDGE, a village in the parish just described, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the river Derg, and on the road from Dublin to Londonderry, 3 miles north-west of Newton-Stewart. In its vicinity is a large flax-spinning factory; and some distance to the west are the ruins of the church of Scarvagherin abbey. In the village itself are the ruins of the old parish-church of Ardstraw, forming part of the cemetery's enclosure. A road leading to Urney cuts this cemetery into two parts; the one of which is used by Protestants, and the other by Roman Catholics. The site of the village is the original Ardstraw or Ardstrath;† and takes its modern surname from a bridge across the Derg. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 134. Houses 27.

ARDTRAMONT. See ARTRAMONT.

ARDTREA, or ARTREA, a parish partly in the barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, but chiefly in that of Loughisholin, co. Londonderry, Ulster. The Londonderry section contains part of the town of MONEYMORE; which see. Length, 14 miles; breadth, 3; area, 20,963 acres, of which 2,526 acres are under water. Area of the Tyrone section, 2,284 acres; of the rural districts of the Londonderry section, 18,648 acres. Pop. of the parish, in 1831, 12,302; in 1841, 13,046. Houses 2,202. Pop. of the Tyrone section, in 1831, 1,391; in 1841, 1,519. Houses 273. Pop. of the rural districts of the Londonderry section, in 1831, 10,299; in 1841, 10,981. Houses 1,847. The parish extends along parts of Lough Neagh and Lough Beg, and along the short run of stream which connects them, and is traversed eastward to them by various rivulets. Excepting interspersions of bog which, while blots upon a face of beauty, subserve utility nearly as much as they detract from ornament, the whole surface is an opulent champaign expanse of the most luxuriant meadow and cornfield. The expanse, though low, and gliding softly down to the great and monotonous inland sea of Lough Neagh, would be pronounced by natives of the flat districts of England surpassingly rich in landscape. The prevailing soil is a light sandy earth, disposed in flats, but alternating with swells and undulations of strong wheat-bearing clayey loam. A comparatively high ridge running parallel to Lough Neagh, and not far from the western border, shows pleasing features over all its length, and is particularly beautiful at Spring-Hill and opposite Moneymore. It is a stately terrace, whose perpendicular section, viewed from the westward below, exhibits, under a very thin covering of basaltic debris, a plane of white chalk and reddish marl, the latter intermixed with gritty and argillaceous substances. Other, though less noticeable, heights of similar formation, elsewhere diversify the surface. Spring-Hill, the chief seat, is an old mansion, in a well-wooded demesne. The parish is traversed northward by the road from Armagh to Coleraine, and north-westward by that from Moneymore to Toome and Aboghill; and it maintains extensive communication through Lough Neagh and its veins.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £738 6s. 2d. Gross income, £998 1s. 2d.; nett, £732 10s. 9d. Patron, Trinity College, Dublin. Of 47 townlands comprehended in the parish, 16 constitute the perpetual curacy of WOOD'S-CHAPEL; which see. A curate is employed for the remaining division, at a stipend of £69 4s. 7d. The statistics which follow are those of the parish, quoad sacra, or exclusive of the Wood's-Chapel division. The parish-church was built about the year 1829, by means of a loan of £1,200 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; attendance 55. Two meeting-houses belonging to the General Assembly, the one formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and the other of the Secession Synod, are attended by 450 and 150. Two Roman Catholic chapels, at Moneymore and Ballinagh, have 2 officiates, and an attendance each of 700. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,070 Churchmen; 2,069 Presbyterians, and 1,990 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 189 boys and 182 girls. Three of the schools had respectively £50, £30, and £10 10s. from the Drapers' Company, London; one had £8 from the National Board; and one had a subscription from the rector. In 1840, the National Board salaried three schools with £12 each, and one school with £1 6s. 8d.

ARDVARNEY, a hamlet, the site of a church and school-house, in the parish of Magheraculmone, barony of Lurg, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands about $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-east of Kesh, near the north-east corner of Lough Erne.

ARGULA (THE), a rivulet of about 6 miles length of course, in co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It divides, for some distance, the baronies of Ida and Knocktopher, and has a northerly course to the Nore above Innistogue.

ARIGADEEN (THE), or the SILVER STREAM, a rivulet in the southern division of co. Cork, Munster. It rises near the centre of the district of Carbery; and flows eastward, past Timoleague, to the north-west corner of Courtmacsherry bay. Its length, as a stream, is about 12 miles; and, afterwards, as an estuary, is about 3 miles. "This river," says Dr. Smith, "abounds with many kinds of fish, which come up with the tide, particularly a trout with white scales, that boils red like a salmon; there are also plenty of salmon, bass, and mullet, smelts, sprats, dulse, dabs, &c.; there are likewise pearl fish taken up, which are found in a large kind of shell, resembling a muscle, but bigger, called here by the Irish, a-closhkeen. The Rev. Mr. Bligh, the present incumbent of Timoleague, showed me one that he bought from a poor man as large as a pea." Salmon begin to ascend the Arigadeen in July, and continue till about the middle of January.

ARIGAL, a lofty mountain in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It is situated 3 miles west of the Derryveagh mountain-range, $\frac{7}{8}$ miles east of Guidore bay, and about 10 south of the remarkable reverberating cavern, called M'Swine's Gun. It raises its conical summit to the altitude of 2,462 feet above sea-level; commands a magnificent view of the coast and Highlands of Donegal; and can easily be ascended from a point on the east, where its sides curve into connection with the high adjoining moorlands. Mr. Fraser, speaking of the view from its summit, and of the road past its base toward Falcarragh, says, "The valley through which our present road runs is seen in all its length and windings. The pretty Lough Nacun lies sparkling below; and farther to the east are the serrated tops and rugged steepes of Doosh, which enclose the lovely Lough Veagh. In the south are seen many of the towering summits which diversify the dreary wastes of Boylagh and Bannagh; and, on the west, the Rosses and the comparatively flat coast extending northerly, studded with little loughs, and deeply-indented with the sea-bays which form such impediments to the traveller, together with all the islets and rocks lying between the islands of Arran and Tory."

ARIGNA (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Lei-trim and Roscommon, Connaught. It rises in the barony of Dromahaire, co. Leitrim, and flows 7 miles south-eastward through that barony, and through the northern part of Boyle in Roscommon to the Shannon, a little below Lough Allen. As the stream occasions sudden floods, and consequent loss of agricultural produce along the banks of the Shannon toward Jamestown, the Commissioners for the Improvement of the Shannon Navigation, propose to enlarge an old cut, and draw into it the Arigna, so as to make the stream discharge itself into Lough Allen. Estimated cost, £1,215 15s.

ARIGNA, an important mineral district in the vale of the Arigna river, on the borders of the counties Roscommon and Leitrim, Connaught. The iron-works of the district, the most noted and extensive in Ireland, are situated near the mouth of the vale, on the right bank of the river. A mountain which begins to rise almost at the verge of the works, constitutes what Mr. Griffith, in the report of his survey of the coal-district of Connaught, calls the fourth or southern division of the coalfield; and it contains several coal-pits both on the side next the valley and on the further side, and is unquestionably the most important division of the four. Two of the principal collieries, both situated on the side next the vale, were leased to the earlier undertakers of the iron-works. The nearer one, called the Rover colliery, is $\frac{1}{2}$ mile distant from the works; and the further and larger one, called the Aughabehy colliery, is 3 miles distant from them, but connected by a winding and not injudiciously planned road. The coal, though thin, is of excellent quality, or at least well-adapted to the smelting of ironstone; and the ironstone is peculiarly rich, and has yielded prime iron, both in castings and in bars. The area of coal is 20,000 acres, and is supposed to contain 20 millions of tons. Limestone also abounds in the vicinity. While the forests continued to supply wood for charcoal, iron was long made on the opposite side of Lough Allen, at the base of the range of Slieve-a-neern, literally, in Erse, 'the iron mountains.' But there, as in various other parts of Ireland where the smelting of iron had been effected, the works were abandoned when the woods were destroyed. But about the year 1788, three brothers of the name of O'Reilly spiritedly adopted the idea, which had been recently introduced to England, of using pit-coal for smelting; and applied it to the mineral field of Arigna. They immediately produced iron which obtained the highest reputation in Dublin, and in every place to which it was sent; but, from causes which are imperfectly explained, or at least variously stated, they speedily became embarrassed, obtained repeated and large assistance from the banking-house of Messrs. Latouche, and finally mortgaged their works, and saw them brought to sale under the court of chancery. One of the partners of the bank, hurried away with the opinion that money alone was necessary to render the works remunerating, bought them for £25,000, and resolved to conduct them for his private advantage. "I well recollect taking a ride with that excellent and kind-hearted man, at a venerable period of his life," says Mr. Isaac Weld, whom we are at present following as our authority, "and on stopping before a large iron gate in his beautiful park of Bellevue, being asked whether I had ever before seen so costly a piece of workmanship? The gate was a spacious and a goodly one, but there was nothing extraordinary in its appearance. 'I see you are hesitating, Sir,' said the good old gentleman; 'and yet I can venture to assert, that you never before saw a gate which cost the owner so much. That gate, Sir, cost me £80,000; for it is the only thing I ever got out of the Arigna iron-works, in return for all my money expended there.'"

In 1808, Mr. Istouche abandoned the works as not only unprofitable, but hopeless. Six years afterwards, and while the collieries connected with them also lay neglected, Mr. Griffith made his survey of the Connaught coal-district. "Perhaps," says he, in reference to the iron-works, "the frequent change of managers, more than any other cause, tended to accelerate the failure of the undertaking; for the plans of each new master, (that is, of each new agent or manager of the works,) were generally at variance with those of his predecessor; and the destruction of old and the erection of new works caused great additional expense. Some were undertaken which sound judgment would have disapproved; and others, most useful, injudiciously destroyed." Several reports made by Mr. Griffith, and evidence given by him and other parties before a committee of the House of Commons, occasioned the Lough Allen mineral district to revive suddenly in fame as a noble sphere for the investment of capital. Before a year had revolved, the Arigna Coal and Iron Company, the Irish Mining Company, and the Hibernian Mining Company, all joint-stock companies, commenced operations in the district, the first in the original Arigna division, and the other two in the mountains on the left side of the Arigna river. See article CONNAUGHT. The proceedings of the new Arigna company are so involved in intricacies connected with the formation and management of their London committee, that any attempt to detail them within our necessary limits would be hopeless. During 7 years, or till February 1832, the results were most inauspicious; upwards of £50,000 having been expended, and less than 300 tons of iron having been produced. But in a report before us of the year 1838, it is stated that the produce was then from 40 to 50 tons of metal per week, or about 2,340 tons per annum; and that a second furnace was just about to be employed, when the produce would amount to about 60 tons per week, and bar-iron would be manufactured. We may therefore, in the words of the Railway Commissioners, "hope that these works on which public expectation has been so often raised and as often disappointed, will at length become profitable to the speculators, as well as advantageous to the labouring population of the surrounding district." The cost of conveying each ton of metal to the canal at Drumsambo is 2s., and thence by canal to Dublin, 9s.

ARKANDRISH. See ARDCANDRIS.

ARKLOW, a barony in the south-east of the co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is bounded on the west by Ballinacor; on the north-west and north by New-castle; on the east by the Irish sea; and on the south by the county of Wexford. Its greatest length, from north to south, is 16 miles; its greatest breadth, from east to west, is 7½; and its area is 67,357 acres. The parishes it includes are the whole of Arklow, Ballintemple, Castle-Adam, Dunganstown, Enoreley, Kilbride, Killahurler, Kilpoole and Redcross, and part of Drumkey, Glenealy, and Kilcommon. Pop., in 1831, 22,796; in 1841, 25,263. Houses 3,854. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,161; in manufactures and trade, 1,603; in other pursuits, 674. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,637; who could read but not write, 2,201; who could neither read nor write, 4,149. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,421; who could read but not write, 3,125; who could neither read nor write, 4,513. The barony of Arklow gives the title of Baron, in the one case by tenure, and in the other by creation, to the house of Ormonde, and to His Royal Highness, the Duke of Sussex.

ARKLOW, a parish on the coast, and at the southern extremity of the barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It contains the town of ARKLOW; see next article. Length and breadth, each 3¼ miles; area, 8,127 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,511; in 1841, 6,236. Houses 1,026. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,128; in 1841, 2,083. Houses 502. Three of its most remarkable objects are the magnificent river Ovoca, which drains it southward to the sea; the noble, castellated and wood-environed mansion of Glenart, which adorns the bank of that stream; and the auriferous mountain Croghan, which shoots up on the boundary with co. Wexford. See OVOCA, GLENART, and CROGHAN. Shelton, the demesne of the Earl of Wicklow, though not within the parish, extends close along its boundary, and contributes exulting features to its scenery. See SHELTON. Ballyrane-house, within a mile of the town of Arklow, commands a fine view of the sea-board and the ocean. Lambarton-house, about half-a-mile south of the town, overlooks an exquisite fore and middle ground of wood and hill and sea, with the magnificent mountain-range around Lugnaquilla in the perspective. Emma-Vale, a mansion ¼ mile west of the town, has fine plantations of its own, and looks out upon a wooded expanse of 800 acres around Kilcarra. Emoolew, a lodge on the south side of the town, vies with Lambarton in its view of sea and mountain. Cooladange, near the boundary with co. Wexford, is a comfortable and well-sheltered seat. The scenery of the parish, whether that within its own limits, or that beheld from its vantage-grounds, or that constituted by the blending of the two, is full of character, rich in beauty, and imposing in power; but, in its principal groupings, will be noticed in separate articles,—chiefly BALLYARTHUR, and those already noted. The vale of the Ovoca, with its flanking hills and lateral glens and mountain and sea perspectives, is such a natural picture gallery in itself that its contents, in order to be estimated, must be seen piece by piece. Elsewhere, the parochial surface varies, in the very prodigality of landscape, from the Alpine height, to the flat band of sea-bench or alluvium. From Croghan, whose summit soars 2,044 feet above sea-level, the ground rolls fitfully down to the shore, picturesquely contoured in height and hollow, and starting up, immediately on the coast, in the low conical hills called the greater and the smaller Arklow rocks. The soil of the parish is partly light, but prevalently good.

Arklow is a rectory in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £230 15s. 4d. A portion of the rectorial tithes, compounded for £51 13s. 10½d., is inappropriate, and belongs to Messrs. Howell and Johnson. The rectory of Arklow, the vicarage of Killahurler, and part of the vicarage of Kilgorman, constitute the benefice of Arklow. See KILLAHURLER and KILGORMAN. Length and breadth of the union, each ¼ miles. Gross income of the benefice, £304 12s. 4d.; nett, £206 5s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a salary of £75. The church was built in 1810, and enlarged, in 1823, at the cost respectively of £1,384 12s. 3¼d., and of £1,200; and most of the former sum was lent and all the latter gift, by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance, from 300 to 800. A Wesleyan Methodist chapel is attended by 100. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended at one service by 1,400, and at another by from 1,800 to 2,000; and it shares with two chapels in Inch, and one in Ballintemple, the care of 4 officiates. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 2,037, and the Roman Catholics to 4,357; the Protestants of the union to 2,246, and the Roman Catholics to 5,118; and the daily schools of both parish and union to 11, attended by 239 boys and 219 girls. One of the schools had £30 a year from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one had £20 from Mrs. Proby, and about £4 from the London Hibernian Society; one, a female school, was supported chiefly by Mrs. Proby; and one, an infant school, was supported by private contributions. A Protestant Sunday school had on its books 416 children; and a Roman Catholic Sunday school had between 400 and 500. In 1840, the National Board gave £36 toward the fitting up of a boys' and a girls' school.

ARKLOW, a market, post, and sea-port town, the capital of its cognominal parish and barony, is situated $8\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-east of Gorey, $9\frac{1}{2}$ south-south-east of Rathdrum, and $39\frac{1}{2}$ south by east of Dublin. Its site is on the river Ovoca, about 500 yards from the sea. About 65 years ago, the place was merely a fishing hamlet, a collection of thatched mud cabins, superintended by a single slated house. Even the present lower town, or the division nearest the sea, and east of the coast road from Wicklow to Gorey, is a wretched segregation of wretched huts, a huddled assemblage of squalid hovels, a magnified copy of a Hottentot or Caffre kraal, with the putrid increment of the accumulated offals of a slovenly fishery. Mr. Inglis, in his 'Ireland, in 1834,' appears to have mistaken this for the whole town, and, accordingly, says, "Arklow is one of the poorest villages that can well be seen; it is entirely supported by the herring-fishing during the season, but all the rest of the year is miserably off." This "Arklow" of the superficial tourist, and "lower town" of topographers, is, by the inhabitants, called "the Fishery." West of it the public road is carried across the Ovoca, on a bridge of 19 arches. Above the bridge commences "the upper town," or the division which would gladly claim to be the whole of Arklow, and which alone presents to the eye the real features of a town. It consists principally of one street, tolerably spacious, slowly ascending, and placed parallel with the river. Its houses are numerously slated, generally neat, and aggregately of respectable mediocre character. Near the centre of the town, and crowning a rising ground, stands the parish-church; a handsome edifice, with a tower and minarets, from a design by the same architect, Francis Johnson, Esq., who planned the beautiful structures of the royal chapel and St. George's church in Dublin. In an open and convenient spot in the upper part of the street stands the Roman Catholic chapel; a neat square edifice, built in 1816, and not unornamental to the town. On a commanding site, overlooking the river, stands the barrack, surrounded by a wall, and containing accommodation for two companies of soldiers, and the appendage of a drill-yard. Connected with it are the fragmentary remains of Arklow-castle; consisting chiefly of a mutilated and ivy-clad tower. This castle was erected in the 13th century, by Theobald Fitzwalter, fourth lord butler of Ireland. In 1331, it was assaulted and captured by O Toole, but soon recaptured by Lord de Bermingham; and, in the following year, it was again taken by the Irish, and retaken by the English. Either originally, or as now enlarged or re-edified by the English, it possessed seven strong towers, and was a fortress of considerable importance. In 1649, Oliver Cromwell captured it, overturned six of its towers, and reduced the remainder of it to the condition of a yawning ruin. Theobald Fitzwalter, the founder of the castle, founled also in Arklow a Cistercian monastery, and colonized it from the abbey of Furness in Lancashire. The founder died at the castle in 1285, and was buried in the monastic church beneath a monument which bore his effigies. The monastery stood behind the town; and is said to have been a noble and extensive series of buildings. Large remains of it existed in the time of Archhall, and some were to be seen several years after the commencement of the present century; but they have quite disappeared. On part of the site stood the predecessor of the present parish-church. The possessions of the monastery are reported to have been considerable; they included, in addition to landed endowments, the right of $3\frac{1}{2}$ flagons of every brewing of ale for sale in Arklow; and, at the dissolution, they were granted in perpetuity to John Travers for the nominal rent of 2s. 2d. Irish. A fever hospital and a dispensary were erected in the town about the year 1809; and are now under the Rathdrum Poor-law union. In 1839-40, the fever hospital received £166 13s. 4d., expended £190 16s. 10d., and had 236 intern patients. The dispensary has a district of 33,143 acres, with a population of 14,723; and, in 1839-40, it received £174 11s., expended £180 9s. 0½d., and made 6,213 dispensations of medicine.

Arklow is the head-quarters of the whole coast fishery of the county of Wicklow. The natural harbour formed by the Ovoca within its tide-bar is the only retreat of boats, and is unsupplied with either pier or any other artificial improvement. All vessels which frequent it are built to suit its peculiarities; and even they must all lighten on the outer side of the bar. The very fishing-boats are obliged to lie off, and watch an opportunity of passing the bar on a rise of the wave; they seldom or never enter without striking; and they are occasionally compelled to run for Wexford, Waterford, or Dungarvan. Even at high water of spring tides, the depth over the bar seldom exceeds from 4 to 5 feet. Yet, in spite of such serious disadvantages, the county coast fisheries, in 1836, numbered 1,378 fishermen, and 39 decked vessels of aggregately 1,174 tons, 153 half-decked vessels of 1,425 tons, 57 open sail-boats with 246 men, and 14 row-boats, with 48 men. The Arklow fishermen are so industrious and enterprising, that they not only contrive to overcome the enormous disadvantage of wanting a sheltered or an accessible harbour, but succeed in keeping themselves constantly employed in some one or other of a series of fisheries. They fish for herrings and hake between Mizen Head and Cahore Point, but, for the last 14 years, have had little success in that fishery; they frequent the Isle of Man when there is a fishery there; and, when they are not better engaged, they pursue the oyster-fishery from January till September, and find it not only an unfailing employment, but a succedaneum for the agricultural alternative on which most other fishermen in Ireland rely. They load their boats with oysters, and proceed to Beaumaris in Anglesey; and having there laid the oysters on banks, they afterwards, at those periods when they are in good season, and most in demand, draw supplies for the markets of Liverpool and Manchester. All materials for boats and fishing-gear are procured from Dublin; sails are purchased in Whitehaven; and, in 1836, boat-building was so brisk that, though 4s. 4d. per day was paid, a sufficient number of shipwrights could not be obtained. In 1835, the exports of the town, consisting of copper ore, corn, herrings, sheep, swine, and beer, amounted in value to £3,677; and the imports, consisting of coal, oatmeal, salt, slate-stone, iron, tallow, sugar, tea, wines, and spirits, amounted to £6,762 10s. A soap-work and some other small operative concerns exist. Fairs are held on May 14th, Aug. 9th, Sept. 25th, and Nov. 15th. A car runs between Arklow and Dublin, by way of Rathdrum and Bray; and 3 coaches are in transit, one between Dublin and Enniscorthy; and 2, one of which is the mill, between Dublin and Wexford. Area of the town, 116 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,383; in 1841, 3,254. Houses 524.

In 1281, the Irish, in an action near Arklow, sustained a total defeat from the English, under Stephen de Fulborne, bishop of Waterford, and lord justiciar. But an incomparably more noted battle, and one not a little sanguinary, was fought at the town in 1798. A large body of rebels who had, for several days, remained inactive around Gorey, marched northward on the morning of the 9th of June, to form a junction with another body in the county of Wicklow, and to assault the town of Arklow. At any period during the previous four days, they might have seized the town without a blow, pursued its garrison, who were in retreat toward the north, and easily pushed their way to the very core of the metropolis. But, previous to their movement, the fugitive garrison had been remanded and reinforced; and, on the very day of their attack, arrived the regiment of Durham fencibles, commanded by the brave and accomplished Colonel Skerrett. "The royal force," says Gordon, "consisted of 1,600 men, arranged in lines, with artillery in front, so as to cover three sides of the town, the fourth of which was guarded by the Ovoca river. The army of the assailants amounted to above 20,000, of whom 4,000 or 5,000 carried guns, but were very scantily furnished with ammunition, the want of which is assigned as the cause of their four days' delay at Gorey. The approach of a column, which advanced by the sea-shore, was so rapid, that a part of it entered and fired what is called the Fishery, composed of thatched cabins inhabited by fishermen. A guard of yeoman cavalry, stationed at that quarter, had no other means of escape than galloping through the flames, and most of them were so terrified that they stopped not their flight till they had crossed by swimming their horses, at the extreme peril of drowning, the broad stream of the Ovoca. This body of assailants was easily repulsed; but if a great force had been directed to that point, the town very probably would have been taken. Happily, to the rebel force where the main attack was directed the most efficient part of the royal army was opposed, the Durham regiment, whose line extended across the fields in front of the barracks to the road leading from Gorey; General Needham, the first in command, hail, with laudable attention to the object of defence, given discretionary orders to Colonel Skerrett to exert his abilities and skill to the best of his judgment. As the rebels at first poured their fire from the shelter of ditches, where they could be little affected by the opposite fire of the soldiery, Skerrett commanded his men to stand with ordered arms, their left wing covered by a breastwork, their right by a natural rising of the ground, until the enemy, leaving their cover, should advance to an open attack. Thrice was made this attack with such impetuosity that the assailants rushed within a few yards of the cannon mounds; but they were received with so close and effective a fire, as to be repulsed with great slaughter in every attempt. During the whole engagement, which lasted four hours, from about 4 o'clock p.m., this regiment maintained as perfectly unbroken ranks as a parade, though sometimes obliged to shift its ground to avoid being enfiladed by a cannon, which was so well directed by Esmond Ryan, a chief among the insurgents, that by a shot from it the carriage of one of the battalion guns was broken. At length General Needham, who had displayed all the personal courage which could be useful in his place, perhaps apprehensive that the pikemen of the assailants, none of whom had hitherto come into action, might, under the shadow of the near approaching night, make, as was far from impossible, an irresistible onset, sent to notify to Skerrett the expediency of arranging matters for a retreat. The latter returned a determinate answer in the negative, declaring that in that case all would be lost. Fortunately nocturnal fighting was not in the plan of these insurgents, who, exhausted of ammunition, and discouraged by the fall of Michael Murphy, a priest, their principal commander, ceased from combat as soon as darkness came, and retired unpursued toward Gorey. As the rebels could not, without fruitless danger, be molested in their retreat by the garrison, they had sufficient leisure to carry away their wounded. Consequently their loss is unknown, but may have amounted to 300 or 400. Of the royal troops also the number of killed and wounded is unknown to me, except of the Durham regiment, which, out of 360, lost 20 men. The importance of this repulse can be fully appreciated only by those who know in what state the country then was, the general indiscipline then prevalent in the royal army, and the danger to which the capital would have been exposed if the insurgents had gained Arklow, and followed the blow." The death of the popular and gallant leader, Father Murphy, in this action, was probably more important than even the repulse; as it deprived the insurgents both of their most intrepid leader, and of a principal portion of the moral courage which, in connection with his daring and dexterity, they had hitherto experienced. Murphy pretended to be supernaturally protected, and in consequence invulnerable; and when his followers showed some reluctance to rush to close quarters with the determined royalists, he is said to have shown them musket balls with which he pretended to have been hit, or which he had caught in his hands and pocketed. While shouting to his followers, and waving a banner inscribed with the words 'Liberty or Death,' he was shot through the breast with a cannon-ball, and died instantaneously, within a few yards of a gun with which a party of the Antrim militia were defending the entrance of the town; and after the break of day, his body, which had lain for hours on the spot where it fell, was beheaded, thrown among the smouldering ashes of some adjoining houses, and afterwards buried in an adjacent ditch.

ARKLOW BANK, an extensive shoal off the coast of the barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It commences 3 miles due east of Kilmichael Point, a little within co. Wexford, and extends, at a mean distance of between 4 and 5 miles from the coast, 9 miles north-north-eastward to a point 4½ miles east-north-east of Mizen Head. This bank is remarkable for its oyster and herring fisheries; and it affords also cod and ling, but not in considerable quantities.

ARLES, a small but pleasant and picturesque village, in the parish of Killabin, barony of Slieumargy, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands on the east border of the county, about 4 miles north of Carlow, on the road between that town and Maryborough. Its name is a corruption of Ard-glass, 'the green hill.' Amidst a grove on the summit of the tufted height to which the name refers, a cruciform and thatched place of worship was built upwards of 100 years ago, by a lady of the family of Hartpoles, and contained, in one arm, a small funeral chapel belonging to the ancient and respectable family of Grace. On the site of this chapel now stands a cut-stone mausoleum, in imitation of St. Douglough's church in co. Dublin, and remarkable for its combination of strength, chasteness, and beauty. A lower and arched apartment is the repository of the dead; an upper chamber, also arched, is disposed for the reception of mural monuments; and the roof, wholly composed of stone, rests on the high pointed arch of the upper apartment, and is imbedded in Roman cement. The simple and unostentatious variety of the pointed style adopted, displays great correctness of taste; and the interior is chaste, solemn, and imposing. On each of the exterior flanking walls is an old marble monument of the Grace family; and over the entrance to the burial vault is a tablet of Kilkenny marble, with a long appropriate inscription in Greek and Latin. The Graces trace their ancestry to Raymond Fitzwilliam, surnamed Le Gros, who accompanied Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, to Ireland in the 12th century; and, through him, they further trace it to Other de Windsor, who descended from the Dukes of Tuscany, and was a Baron of England in 1057. Grace's castle in Kilkenny, and a large tract of country lying to the west of it, and still called Grace's country, indicate their naturalized position and importance. Branches of them became fixed in co. Wexford, at Ballylinch, Carney, and Leighlin in co. Tipperary, and at Shaganah, afterwards called Gracefield, in Queen's co. Their principal modern representatives are the family of Grace, Barons of Courtstown and Lords of Grace's country, and the family of Fitzmaurice, Earls of Kerry, and Marquesses of Lansdowne. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 205; in 1841, 231. Houses 47.

ARLES and BALLYLINAN, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kildare and Leighlin. It includes the village just noticed; and its post town is Ballylinan by Carlow. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

ARLEY, an occasional residence of Lord Farnham, on the southern border of co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands on the north shore of Lough Sheelin, a little to the south of the village of Mount Nugent. The demesne around it and along the lake is richly wooded and adorned; and the condition of the farms and farmers on the noble proprietor's circumjacent estate, indicates the presiding care of patriotism and beneficence.

ARMAGH,

An inland county of Ulster, extending from Lough Neagh to the northern boundary of Leinster. It is bounded, on the north-west, by Tyrone; on the north, by Lough Neagh; on the east, by Down; on the south, by Louth; and on the west, by Monaghan and Tyrone. The boundary-line, on the north-west, is the Blackwater; on the north, is of course the shore of the monarch-lake of Ireland; from Lough Neagh to Knockbride, a distance of about 9 miles, is a series of well-defined enclosure through a beautiful and highly improved country; from Knockbride to the head of Carlingford bay, or along much the greater part of the east, is the Newry navigation; along most of the south, is a series of water-sheds, streamlet-courses, miserable enclosures and imaginary marches, aggregately ill-defined, and extending across so wild, bleak, and barren a district as to afford small inducement for its being accurately ascertained; along the north-west and west, over a distance of about 20 miles, is retrogradely the Fane and one of its tributaries; over the next 4 miles, is a chain of poor fences and naked ditches; and, along the remaining distance downward to Lough Neagh, is an affluent of the Blackwater to Caledon, and the Blackwater itself thence to the lake. Its form is a parallelogram of 24 miles by 11, with a considerable triangular protrusion at the north-east corner, a smaller triangular protrusion at the south-east corner, and a large curved expansion of 14 miles by 7 on the west side. It lies between $54^{\circ} 4'$ and $54^{\circ} 30'$ north latitude, and between $6^{\circ} 5'$ and $6^{\circ} 45'$ longitude west of Greenwich. Its greatest length, from Maghera on Lough Neagh to the townland of Dromleece near Foxfield, is 25 miles; its greatest breadth from Scarvah on the Newry canal, to the boundary with Monaghan near the village of Glasslough, is upwards of 16 miles; its circumference is about 80 miles; and its area, according both to Dr. Beaufort's estimate and to Sir Charles Coote's Statistical Survey of the county, is upwards of 454 English square miles, or 290,786 English acres; but according to the Ordnance Survey, 328,076 acres,—of which 265,243 acres are arable land, 35,117 acres are uncultivated, 8,996 acres are plantations, 778 acres are towns, and 17,942 acres are water.

Surface.—A broad band of country, bordering on Lough Neagh and the Blackwater, and expanding at one point as far south as to the environs of the city of Armagh, is flat, extensively boggy, and prevalently dull and irksome. Much the larger part of the remaining surface is rolling ground, a sea of undulations, swells, hillocks, and hills with intermediate hollows, flats, and vales; producing, with the aids of wood and culture, a rich and constant variety of close and luscious landscape. In this great and characterizing district, extensive views are few, imposing or brilliant views are limited and rare, sublime and strictly romantic views are unknown; but views such as please the eye of gentle and nicely cultivated taste, and evoke the songs of the melodious but energetic poet, exist in absolute profusion, and eventually almost tire by continual repetition. A district, comprehending about one-sixth of the whole area, and occupying nearly the whole of the southern border, is prevalently upland, partly mountainous, and nearly all pastoral or waste. The Fathom mountains, flanking Newry river south of Newry town, have an altitude above sea-level of 820 feet; the Foughal mountains, on the southern border, 4 miles west of the former, have an altitude of 822 feet; the Slieve Girkin or Newry mountains, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-north-west of Newry, have an altitude of 1,340 feet; the Slieve Gullion mountains, west of the Slieve Girkin range, and separated from it by a narrow vale and a lake, have an altitude of 1,900 feet; and the Fewes mountains, extending north and south in the baronies of their own name, are remarkable more for expanse of area and tameness of outline, than for either altitude or any other property of strictly mountain character. Most of these heights and of others which connect them, exhibit scenes of wildness and solitude which may be pleasing to the anachorite, but are at best impressive to either the man of social habits or the lover of the picturesque. Slieve Gullion and some heights on its western skirts, indeed, display escarpments, ravines, cliffs, pinnacles, and general intricacy of outline, in sufficient amount to constitute both force and character in the higher orders of landscape. Around Slieve Gullion, too, is hung out one of the most magnificent natural panoramas in the kingdom. "Perhaps," says Sir Charles Coote, "a bolder prospect is not presented in our island than from its summit, comprising a great extent of country. The lakes and streams, the several towns and well-cultivated demesnes, together with the bay of Dundalk, where the declivity is terminated,—these, with a thousand other natural beauties which are presented to the view, will repay the fatigue of the ascent; and an awful and impressive pleasure is afforded in contemplating the bold promontories and rugged cliffs, bared by the tempests,

Waters.—The great inland sea on the north, shared by Armagh with four other counties, will be separately described: see NEACH. A chain of small lakes occurs on the south-west border, 9 or 10 in number, the chief of which are called Ross, St. Patrick's, and St. Peter's. A still smaller chain on the western boundary, near Middleton, possesses some importance for yielding water-power to mills. A tiny lake in the vicinity of the city of Armagh, draws notice from its supplying the city with water. But even the largest lakes in the county, which are Camlough between Slieve Girkin and Slieve Gullion, and Clay-Lough in the vicinity of Keady, are of very inferior magnitude compared to the fresh-water sheets of some neighbouring counties. The navigation of the Newry canal along the eastern boundary, and that of the Ulster canal along the northern border, will be separately noticed: see NEWRY and ULSTER. The river Bann, which continues the Newry navigation to Lough Neagh, has a north-north-westerly course within the county of about 11 miles. The Blackwater flows north-north-eastward along the boundary with Tyrone, over a distance of 15 or 16 miles. The Callen and Tall rivulets, which fall into the Blackwater a little below Charlemont, but become confluent about 1½ mile above that point, have each a course of between 10 and 12 miles, the former in a northerly and the latter in a west-north-westerly direction. The Cushier rises on the east side of Slieve Gullion, and runs 16 miles north-north-eastward to the Newry canal. The Newtown-Hamilton river, under the successive names of Whitewater, Tullyvallen river, and Craghan river, runs 14 miles southward past the town of Newtown-Hamilton, and passes into Louth to inosculate with the sea at the head of Dundalk bay. Taree or Mullybawn river, flows 9 miles parallel with the former, and to the east of it, and passes away to become tributary to it in Louth. The Fane, upon the south-western boundary, is exclusive of its affluent, connected with the county over only about 7 miles, and afterwards runs across a wing of Monaghan and the body of Louth to the sea at Lurgan Green. These streams, and also the minor ones of Camlough, Tynan, and Fleury, will be more fully noticed in their alphabetical place.

Climate.—The gentle undulation of the general surface of the county, the regularity of declination to the valleys, and comparative rapidity of gradient in the water-courses, the warm and irrelative properties of the prevailing soil, and extensive expansion of gravelly or limestone subsoil, the absence of any noticeable extent of marsh, the prevalence and almost profusion of bosky fences around the fields, and sheltering orchards around the peasants' houses, the absence of any mountains farther north than those of Fews to interrupt the vernal north-east winds, the protection of the bielly and broad screen of heights along the southern border, and the umbrella-service of the lofty mountains in Down from Mourne to Slieve Croob, which arrest the heavy clouds and the violent and moist gales from the Irish sea, and prevent most of their force from reaching Armagh, are circumstances, which, in their joint influence, render the climate of this county at once more mild, genial, dry, and healthy, than that of most other parts of Ulster. The harvest, in consequence, is from 10 to 14 days earlier than in some neighbouring counties. South-east winds are the most violent, moist, and prolonged; they seldom bring fair weather, and are often accompanied with torrents of rain; and they prevail during the winter months, and frequently do not abate till spring is far advanced. North-east winds, when they prevail in March, very materially retard vegetation, and are most pernicious to fruit-trees, and to almost all the tenants of the garden; and they have been observed to be now more severe than during the labours of a former generation. The medium temperature at the Armagh observatory is 49.5°.

Minerals.—Excepting in a small part of the Slieve Gullion range, all the upland district in the south-east of the county, including the Slieve Girkin, the Fathom, and the Newry mountains, consist principally of granite. Some small spots in the neighbourhood of Newry are sienitic. The vale between Slieve Girkin and Slieve Gullion, and a band of country about 1½ mile in mean breadth and about 17 miles in length, which curves round the skirt of the granite district, from the southern boundary of the county by the west side of Slieve Gullion to the north side of the Newry mountains, consist variously of rocks metamorphosed by granitic protrusion, of serpentine or crystalline micaceous schist, of micaceous shining schist, of siliceous schist, and of argillaceous schist passing into greenstone or greenstone slate. The remaining district south of the city of Armagh, and two triangular northerly projections, the one immediately east of the city, and the other on the eastern boundary, or around and north of Tandragee,—districts jointly constituting the larger moiety of the county, consist principally of greywacke and greywacke slate, or at least are, in all their extent, characterized by the transition series. The part of the Slieve Gullion range which we remarked as an exception to the granitic formation, consists of old red sandstone and sandstone conglomerate. A district comprehending about 64 or 70 square miles, and lying north and west of the city of Armagh, but also sending a narrow belt along the western boundary to a point 5 miles south of the city, consists of carboniferous or mountain limestone. A district of 11 miles from east to west, and averagely about 4½ from north to south, almost equally bisected by the river Bann, and lying around the towns of Lurgan and Portadown, consists of tabular trap. This district is the continuous offshoot, and the southern termination of the great trap-field of Antrim, Londonderry, and Down; and exhibits, we presume—though we want precise information—the same curious and interesting phenomena as are witnessed in the south of Antrim: see ANTRIM COUNTRY. The district along Lough Neagh is of the tertiary formation, but has been noticed by anticipation in the mineralogical section of our article on Antrim.

The rocks of the county are, in comparatively a very small degree, metalliferous or otherwise subservient to economical purposes. Lead, though traceable in various places, occurs in considerable quantity only around Keady, and even there has ceased to be mined. Ironstone is found rich in contents but not great in amount. Other forms of iron ore appear to exist, but not in such quantity as to invite investigation with a view to mining. Regulus of manganese and antimony have been seen in a very few and limited spots. Soapstone, coloured earths, a variety of ochres, and the clays in the tertiary formation, rank among the useful minerals. Marble of fair quality is quarried from the limestone beds in the vicinity of Armagh. The limestone, as raised and burned for manure, is the grand article of mineral wealth. The sandstone of the county, though occasionally applicable to such purposes as rude masonry or coarse grinding-stones, is not esteemed by stone-cutters, or in request as a building material.

Soil.—So great a variety of soil exists, that only a very general notice of it can be attempted within our necessarily narrow limits. Though forming pendicles of sterility, and little expanses of moorish or mountain wilderness, the general soil is notwithstanding excellent,—occasionally prime, prevailingly fertile, and rarely incapable of improvement and cultivation. A sandy loam is probably of rarer occurrence than any other soil; and yet loam of other varieties predominates, and generally lies on a retentive subsoil. The valleys have naturally a rich and loamy soil, very grassy, producing in great luxuriance, and even rankness, the poa dultans or water-fescue grass, yet neither marshy nor yielding many aquatic plants. The southern declivities of the hills and swells are carpeted with such rich natural grasses, that cattle show great reluctance to leave them for a fresh pasture on a northern exposure. Though much of the uplands is yet clothed with heath, ferns, and kindred herbage, very little is carpeted with moss, or of a character akin to turf-moor. Even the entire bog of the county would, if equally distributed, be little if any more than sufficient to supply the current local demand for fuel; and occupies, to any extent, the place of a soil to be reclaimed and cultivated, chiefly in consequence of its being largely aggregated in particular localities. As to the vastly preponderating district of naturally arable ground, the soil of the hilly portion is, for the most part, deep and retentive, but superincumbent on such gravelly strata, as, when trenched up, affords all the resources of improvement,—the limestone portion is very grateful both in tillage and in meadow, red in colour at Armagh, shading off to white as it recedes to the west, and forming along the banks of the river a very deep brown loam, so very rich as to be almost a perennial soil, yielding great crops without any manure,—the eastern or Orior barony portion is a light friable stony earth, now sternly siliceous, now mixedly argillaceous, and often superincumbent immediately on rock,—the low, flat, and considerably boggy portion in the north, is partly sheer bog, convertible into red ashes, and easily reclaimable, and partly a light moor on a whitish or yellowish clay, with a sufficient declination to facilitate draining,—and the great north-east portion, or the greater part of the baronies of O'Neilland, is a rich deep brown loam, lying on clay or gravel, and highly improvable by the application of lime.

Estates and Farms.—The estates of the county consist of freehold, church, and college lands; and the second and third, in many parts, considerably exceed the first. Leases in perpetuity are few in number and small in value. Some leases are for three lives or 31 years; but greatly the majority are for one life only, or for 21 years and a life. Owing to the prevalence of the linen trade, and the very great density of population, land is in such high demand that, even 40 years ago, a well-situated small estate currently brought in the market from 25 to 30 years' purchase; and at that period, the average rental of the cultivated districts was about 25s. per English acre.—Most of the larger proprietors' mansions are modernized castles, quite in the old style of architecture; and they generally occupy low sites at the base of hills, and display the wealth more than the taste of their owners. Though most of the more modern mansions are large, nearly all are neat or handsome, and a few are both capacious and noble. The farmhouse of a character prevalent in England and Lowland Scotland, or of a class intermediate between the gentleman's house and the peasant's cottage, exists in such few specimens as scarcely to challenge notice. Even the better sort of prevailing farm-house is a mere thatched cottage, of stone and mortar walls, disposed in kitchen, workshop, and one or more bed-chambers, and accompanied under the same roof-tree, by cow-house, pig-sty, and perhaps a stable. Houses, whose inmates attend little or subordinately to agriculture, and largely to the linen manufacture, are usually neat, cleanly, and comfortable. The poorer cottages are, for the most part, white-washed, well-thatched, and accompanied by a trimly enclosed and thrifflily dressed kitchen-garden. The miserable hovel, presenting so sad a spectacle in many other parts of Ireland, whether the hut of the appalling bog-hole character, or the cabin of the haggard and squalid kind which covers shivering in the breeze, is, in its worst features, quite unknown in Armagh, and, even in its mitigated form, occurs more seldom than probably in any other county in Ulster.—Farms, if the tiny parcels of land usually held by agricultural tenants may be dignified with that name, do not average, throughout the arable parts of the county, more than 5 acres; they possibly average even less; and, Lilliputian as they are, they suffer, in many instances, virtual subdivision between the head of a family and one or more married children. He, however, who should infer from the smallness of the holdings the penury, idleness, or unenterprising spirit of the tenants, would be guilty of hasty and utterly incorrect induction; for he would forget at once the high fertility of the soil, the peculiar arts of husbanding mere pendicles of land, and the general practice of combining the pursuits of agriculture with the work of the loom, or some other department of productive labour. Tracts of considerable extent are occupied as bleaching-grounds; still larger and more numerous tracts are farmed for the raising of provisions to knots or communities of persons employed in the linen manufacture; very large tracts are disposed, for the mingled purposes of utility and ornament, in gentlemen's demesne grounds; and the Fewa mountains, as well as other pastoral districts, are distributed in extensive grazing farms. The enclosures which prevail are incomparably richer than what might be expected from the puny average amount of the holdings, and are even such as would do honour to some British districts of farming aristocracy. Thorn fences are very common, well-trained, well-dressed, and of neat and sheltering aspect; and, owing to the smallness of the fields, the inter-spersion of single trees, and the great prevalence of little tufts of orchard ground, they give the country a warm, woody, and joyous appearance. Paling, so common in Britain, so starchedly formal, so stiffly unpicturesque, and eventually so rickety and broken-toothed, is nearly unknown in Armagh. Sunk fences occur only in demesne grounds; and there they are peculiarly estimable, completely serving their characteristic object, without either marring the natural contour of the surface, interfering with its beauties, or obstructing the general prospect.—In 1841, the number of farms of from 1 acre to 5 acres each in extent, was 11,632; from 5 to 15 acres, 9,428; from 15 to 30 acres, 2,072; and upwards of 30 acres, 606. But this statement is exclusive of all out-districts.

Agriculture.—Amidst a chaotic mass of what we either know or strongly suspect to be misrepresentation, there is before us, of a kind on which we can rely, no later a detail of the agriculture of Armagh, than that in Sir Charles Coote's Statistical Survey, published in 1804. We shall, therefore, simply give the substance of Sir Charles' information, and add, from good authority, a general statement respecting improvements which have been made, and are in progress.—Tillage, on the small farms, is effected, to a large extent, with the spade; and, when properly conducted, serves better than that by the plough, and also saves manure. Wheat, which is a very general crop in the baronies of Armagh and O'Neilland, yields, on an average, 160 stones per statute acre; oats, which are the great cereal crop throughout the county, yield 168 stones; and barley, flax, and potatoes, yield respectively 124, 90, and 2,000 stones. Courses of crops, excepting approved and judicious ones practised by proprietors and the well-informed, are too generally of the scourging kind, which defy all nurture of the soil, and attempt to secure present advantage without comprehensively regarding aggregate profit. One example is, first, potatoes on a lea, stubble ploughed, and manured with dung; second, flax; third, fourth, and fifth, oats, all prepared by two ploughings and two harrowings. Another example is, first, potatoes; second, wheat, sowed immediately in the potatoe fallow, and always trenched in; third and fourth, oats. Another course, practised on very fine ground, exhibits flax, barley, and two crops of oats; the barley prepared with two ploughings and harrowings, but more frequently with trenching. Plain fallowing is scarcely known. The average proportion of crops, supposing one-fifth of a farm of 5 acres to be reserved as cow-pasture, exhibits 2 acres of oats, 1 acre of potatoes, three-fourths of an acre of wheat, and one-fourth of an acre of flax; and, supposing two-fifths to be kept in grass, it exhibits $\frac{1}{2}$ acre of oats, 1 acre of potatoes, and one-fourth of an acre of flax. A portion of the potatoe ground of the preceding season is always sown in flax; and the remainder is appropriated sometimes to wheat, and sometimes to barley. Such is a summary of the most important parts of agricultural economy as practised in 1804. But now the produce in cereal crops is probably 60 per cent. greater than at that period; excellent corn and green crops are produced even in the granitic district; the intermixture of green and cereal crops in regular approved and profitable systems of rotation, is extensively practised; improvements in tillage, manuring, field-dressing, and other departments, have been largely accomplished; the cultivation of flax has very much declined; the lazy-bed method of potatoe-culture has been extensively superseded by the drill method; sub-letting and the con-acre system are much on the decline; the principle is recognised, and, so far as comports with the people's peculiar condition, has been somewhat acted on, of consolidating small holdings; and, in general, agriculture, both as a science and as an art, has made a degree of progress highly creditable to the county, proportionally very much greater than in some boasted districts of England, and so steadily and expansive as to augur none of the long pauses of complacent inaction, or the fitful alternations of advance and stationariness which have characterized it in some of the earliest scenes of improvement in Britain. A skilful farmer from Lowland Scotland or most parts of England would still, in traversing the county, detect one or two prime matters, and several second-rate ones, which stoutly call for reform; but, were he a liberal and candid man, and inclined to allow for the peculiar disadvantages under which the county labours, he would observe much more to admire, and something even to reprove the extensive farmers of more favoured lands.

Several days after completing what we had to say on the county of Armagh, we obtained possession of the voluminous Reports of "Commissioners for Inquiring into the Condition of the Poorer Classes in Ireland;" and, turning to their "Observations on the Nature and State of Agriculture," we were so much gratified with their statement of facts respecting the barony of Lower Fews, regarded as a fair specimen of the entire county, that we resolved, while allowing our article to remain just as it was written, to dovetail into it a few of the Commissioners' remarks; and, in order that continuity may be only once broken, we

"Agriculture appears to have made great advances in a few years in the county of Armagh, and in the barony of Lower Fews in particular." "The farms in this barony are mostly very small, say 3 to 10 English acres, upon which a man and his wife subsist by the produce of their own labour, in some cases obtaining two crops in the year from the same ground, viz., winter tares followed by turnips or cabbages, and rape followed by tares, potatoes, turnips, or cabbages; these crops are succeeded by grain or flax the next year, on which clover is sown for mowing and stall-feeding. The crops of clover, tares, cabbages, turnips, potatoes, and rape, are sown at such periods and to such extent as will command a full supply of green food and turnips throughout the whole year. According to the improved system, the green food is mowed or shorn, and given to the cattle in the house. By this economical mode of using it, one acre will support as many cattle as three acres when grazed, and it possesses the advantage of affording profitable employment to the wives and children. It has also been the means of enabling the small farmers and cottiers to keep a cow or two. This practice of raising green crops for the summer food of cattle in the house is greatly superior to the general one in use in England, of allowing the cattle to roam at large in the pastures, as it not only admits of more cattle being fed in the same farm, but by the accumulation of manure the produce in grain has also increased." "A man here occupying 20 to 50 acres is considered a large farmer, and the general opinion is that a farm of 20 acres or upwards will not be able to produce as much food in proportion as one under that size." "The soil is in general a fertile friable loam, upon a moderately retentive subsoil, and well-adapted to the cultivation of potatoes, turnips, and other green crops, as well as all kind of grain and flax; oats predominate. The average produce per acre is—wheat, 16 to 18 cwt.; oats, 15 to 17 cwt.; barley, 17 to 19 cwt.; potatoes, 8 to 10 tons; flax, 30 to 40 stones." "Great labour has been bestowed in taking down crooked fences, or meerings, as they are called, between one farm and another, and making them straight, laying each farm compact and square, thereby facilitating the operation of ploughing and working the land. Many internal fences have also been removed, as where no pasturing is admitted they are useless; these have been converted into productive arable land: every corner is also cultivated with the greatest care, and even in the mountain district patches of land, amongst rocks inaccessible to horses, are cultivated by the hand. The country, when seen from any elevation, is one continuous patchwork of grain and potatoes, densely crowded with habitations." "Red clover and Pacey's perennial rye-grass are almost the only artificial grasses sown in the lower parts of the barony, that is, on the low and good lands; but on the moory ground near the mountains, where the land is worth about 7s. or 10s. per acre, they prefer what they call the white grass, Holcus lanatus. Mr. Blaker showed us a patch of Italian rye-grass in the Earl of Gosford's demesne, which was very luxuriant, leafy, and succulent, and promises to be of great benefit." "Many of the implements used in this barony have undergone considerable improvement, particularly the plough, the improved iron one having superseded a clumsy wooden one. The old cars have nearly all disappeared, and their place is now occupied by a light one-horse cart, to which they judiciously attach the horse as near as possible to his work; the horse now draws 15 or 20 cwt. with the same ease that he frequently drew 10 or 12 cwt., independently of the great improvement in the roads which has in many places been made."

Live Stock.—The horned cattle of the county are light, seldom exceeding 3 or 4 cwt. The cows are chosen rather for milk than for feeding; and the larger proportion of the milk being intended, not for the dairy, but for domestic consumption, they are usually esteemed in the degree, not of their milk's quality, but of its quantity. They yield, on the average, about two quarts in winter, and ten quarts in summer; and, were their pasture not so much limited by the smallness of their farms, they would yield greatly more. Though no farms are devoted exclusively to the dairy, and most devote to it scarce the moiety of the produce of, on the average, 1 or 1½ acre of pasture, a very considerable aggregate of butter is sold in the markets of Armagh and Newry for exportation. The fattening of black cattle for the market is unknown among the farmers of any ground capable of tillage, and is practised to so limited an extent even in the uplands, as hardly to constitute a regular trade. Such stock as are designed for the shambles, are selected simply for bulk and bone, and with reference solely to prospective weight. Improvements in the breed of black cattle, or introductions of foreign and superior varieties, are so limited as not to require notice. Horses are very seldom bred in the county, and are imported chiefly from Fermanagh and Connaught. Those most esteemed by the farmer are short-legged, nimble, and active, and often are preposterously worked at the age of two years; and those in request for the saddle are very generally a dwarfish, hardy, sure-footed breed, with little show of strength, but possessing great power of endurance. The native Irish 'garçon,' slender in bone, and remarkable for speed and hardiness, are bred in the mountains, and used chiefly around Newry and along the western border. The carriage and saddle-horses of the gentry are imported from the best markets, and frequently procured at very high prices.—The native sheep are very coarse and ill-shapen, light in weight and coarse in wool, and both horned and hornless; but, though capable of surprising improvement when brought down to low or rich pastures, they are an object of exceedingly limited and subordinate attention. The Connaught sheep is generally reared in large numbers within the demesnes of the man of fortune and the wealthy bleacher; and is kept in very small numbers, for a brief period, and solely for sake of the fleece, by a portion of the small farmers. Goats are numerous and wild in the mountains; and may elsewhere be seen, in extensive dispersion, one by one, browsing within a limited range of jack-cord, by the sides or on the tops of enclosures. The native hog is narrow, long-legged, long-sided, and sharp-snouted; but it has been improved by a cross with the Berkshire breed. Pigs, though not fed in herds, are so universally diffused, or enter so uniformly into the small farm economy, as to yield, throughout the county, a very great aggregate of pork. Large flocks of geese are fed in the mountains; turkeys are numerous reared on the small farms, but are generally sold when poults; and chickens may be seen around almost every cottage. Pigeons are no object of attention. Rabbits are very limitedly protected. In 1841, the total of horses and mules was 12,323; of cattle, 35,069; of sheep, 5,042; of pigs, 28,236; of poultry, 150,269; of asses, 263;—and the estimated value of the horses and mules was £79,584; of the asses, £263; of the cattle, £227,949; of the sheep, £5,546; of the pigs, £35,295; of the poultry, £3,756;—in all, £371,393. But these statements are exclusive of live stock to the value of £11,354 in the civic districts.

Woods.—Armagh is too densely peopled and too much a manufacturing county to have almost any spare ground for wood. Planting has been practised chiefly for ornament, and is in a great measure confined to demesnes; and natural wood, except in some patches among the mountains, or coppices along the margin of streams, was long ago all but totally destroyed. Yet many districts, particularly in the barony of Armagh, are highly embellished with both old and young trees; and, from a cause which we formerly named, the profusion of orchard clumps and the prevalence of quickset enclosure, the greater part of the county would, on a cursory view, be pronounced by a stranger better wooded than many an equal extent of territory which has five or even ten times its number of trees. The orchards aggregate afford so large a supply of fruit for the market as to have won for the county the designation of the Orchard of Ireland. The total extent of woods, in 1841, exclusive of detached trees, was 8,996 acres; and of these 406 acres were oak, 19 ash, 10 elm, 17 beech, 212 firs, 5,549 mixed plantations, and 2,783 orchards. The number of detached trees was 406,075; and had they been annexed into woods, they would have occupied 2,538 acres.

Manufactures.—In Armagh and the other towns, brewing, chandling, soap-boiling, tanning, and the various arts of handicraft are practised for the supply of the local market. Woollen goods are manufactured throughout the county, yet only for domestic use, and not in sufficient quantity to supply more than probably one-tenth of the demand. A fabric called 'Unions,' produced from a mixture of cotton and flax, has, of late years, been somewhat extensively woven for exportation. But at once the staple trade, a general and prime means of support, and a pursuit associated to a large extent with that of agriculture, is, and long has been, the manufacture of linen. The total value of pieces in packs and boxes, produced in the county, and marked in the Dublin Linen Hall, between the years 1792 and 1802, averaged £209,079 19s. 11½d. per annum; the total estimated value of the whole linen trade, in 1804, was £300,000; and the total value of unbleached linen sold in the county, in the years 1821–24, and exhibited in the returns of the seal-officers and inspectors of the late Linen Board, averaged £576,332 10s. per annum. Though the means of authentic information ceased with the dissolution of the Linen Board in 1824, yet the returns of the collectors of customs indicate a large increase in the quantity of linen exported from Ulster, between 1825 and 1835; and, with the exception of Antrim, no county is likely to have contributed more to the increase than Armagh. The fabrics produced are cambrics, lawns, diapers, damasks, chequers, and a great variety of plain linens. The weavers of the finest goods have both their residences and their markets in the north; and the weavers of the coarse fabrics are diffused chiefly along the western border. Hand-loom weaving still maintains predominance; and two or more looms are usually found in one cottage. Yet the introduction to Britain of machinery for spinning flax has exerted a strong influence on Armagh, and, to a certain extent, been locally copied. Spinners cannot now earn more than 1s. 6d. per week; and weavers, who formerly earned 2s. a-day with ease, or 2s. 6d. with exertion, have now average earnings of only about 1s.

Fairs.—The principal fairs at present held within the county are the following:—Acton, May 4 and Dec. 11; Armagh, 1st Tuesday of every month; Ballinglera, Jan. 5, May 8, June 8, Aug. 12, Oct. 2, Nov. 8, and Dec. 11; Blackwater town, 2d Wednesday of every month; Camlough, 3d Monday of every month; Charlemont, May 12, Aug. 16, and

Nov. 12; Clare, May 12; Jonesborough, June 4, Aug. 14, Oct. 21, and Dec. 3; Keady, 2d Friday of every month; Killyleagh, last Friday of every month; Lurgan, Aug. 5 and 6, and Nov. 22 and 23; Markethill, 3d Friday of every month, May 6, and Oct. 26; Middleton, 1st Thursday of every month, and Nov. 28; Newtown-Hamilton, last Saturday of every month, and Nov. 7; Poyntz-Pass, Jan. 4, Feb. 8, March 7, April 4, May 2, June 6, July 4, Aug. 1, Sept. 5, Oct. 3, Nov. 7, and Dec. 5; Portadown, 3d Saturday of every month, April 20, June 8, and Nov. 12; Port-Norris, 2d Monday of every month; Richhill, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, March 3 and 14, April 11, June 13, July 11 and 26, Sept. 12, and Oct. 10 and 15.

Communications.—The roads of the county are in general good and well kept; and they are so abundantly, minutely, and intricately ramified as to be describable only by means of a road map. One principal line runs parallel with the Newry canal, and forks toward Lurgan and Portadown; good roads connect all the towns and large villages; and principal roads radiate from Armagh toward Dungannon, Moy, Lurgan, Tanderagee, Acton, Newry, Dundalk, Castleblaney, Keady, and Tynan, and pass away, in most instances, to large towns or sea-ports at a distance. Water-communication is maintained with Belfast and its bay through the Bann and the Lagan navigation; with Newry town and Carlingford bay, by the Newry navigation; with Enniskillen and all the ramifications of Lough Erne, by the Ulster canal; and with part of Tyrone, and the interior shores of Londonderry and Antrim, by the far-spreading expanse of Lough Neagh.—The railway Commissioners projected a line of railway to connect Armagh and Dublin, and were anticipated by joint-stock companies or private parties in the projection and survey of other lines traversing or immediately affecting the county. A line from Belfast to Armagh was sanctioned by parliament previous to the Commissioners' appointment; and, at the close of 1841, it was open from Belfast to Lurgan. A line was surveyed to deflect from the former at Portadown, run parallel to the Newry canal, and join at Newry a coast-line thence by Dundalk to the northern terminus of the Dublin and Drogheda railway. Another line, quite independent of this, was surveyed to connect Armagh with Dublin by way of Castleblaney and Ardee, and across the Boyne nearly midway between Drogheda and Navan. A line was surveyed also to run northward from Armagh, and connect it along the western shore of Lough Neagh, and by way of Coleraine, with Portrush on the north coast of Antrim. The Commissioners' own line passes through the towns of Navan in Meath, and Carrickmacross and Castleblaney on the east border of Monaghan, and sends off, at the first of these, a branch toward Enniskillen. The Commissioners calculate that, including intermediate stages, the number of passengers daily, in one direction, on the Armagh and Dublin line, will be 7,481; and on the Armagh and Belfast line, 4,213.

Divisions and Towns.—So late as the year 1608, the only civil divisions of the county of Armagh consisted of Ballyboes, each of which comprehended about 60 English acres. In the course of the next ten years the baronial division was introduced. This division seems at first to have cut the county into only three baronies, named O'Neilland, Fews, and Orior; it soon after admitted the additional denominations of Armagh and Turanney; and now, in consequence of later subdivision, it exhibits eight baronies, called Armagh, Lower Fews, Upper Fews, East O'Neilland, West O'Neilland, Lower Orior, Upper Orior, and Turanney. On the south-east border also is a small part of the lordship of Newry. The following alterations in the extent of the baronies have been effected in consequence of the Act 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 84, s. 51:—The townland of Moneypatrick, in the parish of Lisnadill, has been transferred from Lower Fews to Armagh; the townlands of Belleek, Carriekananny, Carrickgallogly, Carrowmannan, Lower and Upper Creggan, Drumnahoney, Drumnabunshin, and Greyhill, in the parish of Loughgilly, have been transferred from Lower Fews to Upper Orior; and the townlands of Carnagat and Corrinshigo in the parish of Killevey, have been transferred from Lower Orior to Upper Orior.—In 1804, the parochial division exhibited 17 entire parishes, 2 parishes partly in Tyrone, 2 parishes partly in Down, and 18 extra-parochial denominations; and then 3 of the 21 parishes were in the dio. of Dromore, and the remaining 18 in that of Armagh. In 1831, the civil parochial division, as followed in the population books, exhibits 18 parishes wholly in Armagh, 2 partly in Tyrone, 2 partly in Down, 1 partly in Louth, and only 1 extra-parochial denomination. The present ecclesiastical parochial division differs so widely from the political, and is so much characterized by the intricacy of unions, disavermments, and mutual involvements, that we must leave it to be gradually developed in the progress of our work.—The towns and principal villages are Armagh, Blackwatertown, Keady, and Charlemont, in the barony of Armagh; Belleek, Hamilton's-Bawn, and Market-bill, in Lower Fews; Crossmaglen and Newtown-Hamilton, in Upper Fews; Lurgan, in East O'Neilland; Portadown, Richhill, and Loughgall, in West O'Neilland; Acton, Tanderagee, and part of Poyntzpass, in Lower Orior; Forkhill, Jonesborough, and part of Newry, in Upper Orior; and Middleton and Tynan in Turanney.

Statistics.—In 1824, according to Protestant returns, the number of schools in the county of Armagh was 332, of scholars 13,734, of male scholars 7,924, of female scholars 5,207, of scholars whose sex was not specified 603, of scholars connected with the Established Church 4,655, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 2,864, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 511, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 5,281, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 423; and, according to Roman Catholic returns, the number of schools was 332, of scholars 13,769, of male scholars 7,646, of female scholars 5,043, of scholars whose sex was not specified 1,080, of scholars connected with the Established Church 4,417, of scholars connected with Presbyterian bodies 3,013, of scholars connected with other bodies of Protestant dissenters 393, of scholars connected with the Roman Catholic community 5,191, and of scholars whose religious connection was not ascertained 755. The school and church statistics of 1834, so strictly follow the ecclesiastical divisions, that those which fall within the county limits cannot be accurately separated; yet the latter may very approximately be judged of by reference to the statistics which shall be given in the article on the diocese of Armagh. The statistics of the county-jail in Armagh, and the bridewells in Lurgan, Markethill, Newtown-Hamilton, and the Ballybot section of Newry, will be noticed in connection with these towns. In 1841, the criminal offences against the person were 197; against property, with violence, 21; against property, without violence, 203; against property, with malice, 6; against the currency, 14; miscellaneous, 111; total, 532. Of the offenders, 428 were males, and 124 were females; 10 were not more than 12 years old, 85 between 12 and 16, 97 between 16 and 21, 233 between 21 and 30, and 39 upwards of 50; 244 could read and write, 79 could read but not write, and 229 could neither read nor write.—The expenditure on the constabulary force, in 1841, was £7,900.—The county cess, as raised for local purposes, in 1828, was £24,761; in 1838, £28,820.—The annual amount of the valuation of the county under the 6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 84, is £242,005 0s. 7d.; and the expense of the valuation was £4,874 16s. 8d., or 2·0125 per cent.—The county itself sends two members to parliament; and, including the borough of Armagh, three representatives for a total population of 232,393. In 1835, the constituency amounted to 3,480, and consisted of 277 £50 freeholders, 268 £20 freeholders, 2,336 £10 freeholders, 109 £20 leaseholders, 484 £10 leaseholders, and 6 £20 rent-chargers; and, in 1841, it amounted to 2,578, and consisted of 269 £50 freeholders, 221 £20 freeholders, 1,821 £10 freeholders, 43 £20 leaseholders, 208 £10 leaseholders, and 16 £20 rent-chargers.—Pop., in 1790, as estimated by Dr. Beaufort, 120,000; in 1821, by census, 197,427; in 1831, 220,651; in 1841, 232,393. All the following statistics are those of 1841:—Males 113,892, females 118,501, families 43,175. Inhabited houses 41,297, uninhabited complete houses 2,186, houses in the course of erection 93, first class houses 829, second class 9,152, third class 19,648, fourth class 11,668. Families inhabiting first class houses 943, inhabiting second class 10,035, inhabiting third class 20,185, inhabiting fourth class 12,012. Families employed chiefly in agriculture 24,260, in manufactures and trade 15,966, in other pursuits 2,949. Families dependent chiefly on property and professions 919, on the directing of labour 18,463, on their own manual labour 23,467, on means not specified 326. Males at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food 37,393, to clothing 16,042, to lodging, &c. 3,936, to health 89, to charity 4, to justice 290, to education 266, to religion 166; unclassified 2,516, not having specified occupations 7,445. Females at and above 15 years of age who ministered to food 1,354, to clothing 25,441, to lodging, &c. 38, to health 40, to charity 2, to education 126, to religion 2; unclassified 5,304, not having specified occupations 41,816. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 38,803; who could read but not write, 22,727; who could neither read nor write, 37,375. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 19,319; who could read but not write, 35,180; who could neither read nor write, 49,508. Males at and above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 6,491; attending superior schools, 630. Females at and above 4 years of age attending primary schools, 5,133; attending superior schools, 299. Total of males at and above 17 years of age, 62,569; of whom 26,215 were unmarried, 33,046 married, and 3,328 widowed. Total of females at and above 17 years of age, 68,791; of whom 25,958 were unmarried, 34,433 married, and 8,300 widowed. Number of inspectors of schools, 2; of school-teachers, 225 males and 99 females; ushers and tutors, 36 males and 4 females; governesses 23, teachers of music 2, teachers of dancing 1. Number of clergymen of the Established Church 38, of Methodist ministers 10, of Presbyterian ministers 33, of Roman Catholic clergymen 38, of ministers of religion whose denominational connection was not specified 23, of Missionaries 1, of Scripture readers 5.

Antiquities.—The most noticeable pagan antiquities of the county are a cairn and a very curious cromlech, 2 miles north of Newry; a cairn surmounting an artificial cave on the top of Slieve Gullion; and the Vicar's cave, 5 miles south-east of Armagh, on a lofty hill, which is supposed to be excavated. The principal civil antiquities are various old castles, and the vestiges of the Earl of Tyrone's intrenchments, thrown up during the long-continued war with the English, and still called Tyrone's Ditches. The principal ecclesiastical antiquities are the cathedral of Armagh, two or three old churches, and traces, more historical than architectural, of about 12 or 13 monastic establishments.

ARMAGH, a barony in the county of Armagh, Ulster. It is bounded, on the north, by co. Tyrone; on the east by O'Neilland and Fews; on the south, by co. Monaghan; and on the west, by Turaney and co. Tyrone. Length, 14½ miles; breadth, 6½; area, 47,866 acres. Pop., in 1831, 39,466; in 1841, 41,607. Houses 7,166. Annual valuation, £49,452 18s. 4d. Sums levied under the grand warrants of Spring and Summer 1840, £4,460 11s. 9d., and £4,168 14s. 7d. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,047; in manufactures and trade, 2,954; in other pursuits, 812. Males at and above 5 years of age, in 1841, who could read and write, 7,813; who could read but not write, 4,123; who could neither read nor write, 5,687. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 4,171; who could read but not write, 7,057; who could neither read nor write, 7,709.—This barony comprehends no entire parish; but consists of parts of the parishes of Armagh, Cloufacle, Derrynooce, Eglis, Grange, Keedy, Lisnaddil, Loughgall, and Tynan. The rich limestone lands of this barony are in good heart, excellently enclosed with white thorn hedges, judiciously disposed in fields proportionately to the size of farms, exuberant in prime crops of wheat and other grain, and thickly sprinkled with neat and comfortable cottages. The western border, about Tynan, is warm and bosky with the plantations of the Caledon and Glasslough demesnes; and the country thence to Armagh is beautifully rolled and nodulated with undulation and hillock, and exhibits on many a small conical hill a crown of shrubs or of trees.

ARMAGH, a parish in the county of Armagh, Ulster. Some authorities, civil as well as ecclesiastical, represent it as co-extensive with the benefice or union of Armagh. Thus understood, it lies in the baronies of Armagh, Lower Fews, Upper Fews, West O'Neilland, and Turaney; and comprehends, in addition to Armagh proper, the parishes of GRANGE, EGLIS, LISNADDIL, and BALLYNOYER: which see. Length, 15½ miles; breadth, 6½; area, 47,013 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches. Pop., in 1831, 33,310; of the bar. Armagh section, 17,774; of the Lower Fews section, 4,687; of the Upper Fews section, 5,331; of the West O'Neilland section, 1,857; of the Turaney section, 3,661. As distinguished from the other parishes of the benefice, and as exhibited in the Ordnance Survey, and in the census of 1841, the parish lies partly in the barony of West O'Neilland, but chiefly in that of Armagh; and it contains within the latter section the city of ARMAGH: see next article. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4½; area, 4,006 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches. Pop., in 1831, 10,518; in 1841, 12,654. Houses 1,883. Area of the O'Neilland section, 1,051 acres. Pop. in 1841, 542. Houses 92. Area of the rural districts of the bar. Armagh section, 3,286 acres. Pop. in 1841, 1,867. Houses 298.

Most of the landscape, as well as much of that in adjacent parishes, borrows prominent features from the edifices and comparatively lofty site of the city. The surface is beautiful and finely improved. The river Callen flows past the base of the high ground crowned by the city, and proceeds northward to a tract of flat and boggy land in the neighbouring parish of Grange. Around or near the city are the neat demesnes of

New Holland, Anneville, Rosebrook, Tullamore, Nappa, and Elm Park.—Armagh parish is a rectory in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, including that of the district or parish of Grange, £500. With in each of the other four parishes which jointly with this constitute the benefice of Armagh, is a perpetual curacy of its own name; partly within one of them is the perpetual curacy of Armagh-Breague; and partly within two others is the perpetual curacy of Killyleagh. See ARMAGH-BREAGUE and KILLYLEAGH. Gross income of the benefice, £2,187 0s. 10d.; nett, £1,457 14s. 10d. Patron, the diocesan. The dean of Armagh cathedral has long, by usage, but not by statute, held the incumbency. The statistics of the union will be given separately in the notices of the respective parishes. Two stipendiary curates in the parish of Armagh have each a stipend of £75; and, in addition, the one receives £150, the other £25, from the archbishop. The parish-church is the cathedral. Sittings 750; attendance 500. St. Mark's chapel-of-ease was built in 1832, at the cost of £3,691 18s. 2d.; of which £1,900 was lent by the late Board of First Fruits, £262 given by Archbishop Beresford, and £1,529 18s. 2d. raised by parochial assessment and sale of gallery pews. Sittings 1,134; average attendance 450. One Presbyterian meeting-house, formerly in connection with the Synod of Ulster, is attended by 800; and one, formerly Secessional, is attended by from 100 to 150. An Independent meeting-house is attended by 90. Two Wesleyan Methodist chapels are not reported on. A Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 1,912; and, in common with two chapels in Grange and Eglisb, has 4 officiates. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,586 members of the Established church, 1,588 Presbyterians, 44 other Protestant dissenters, and 5,546 Roman Catholics; and, in the same year, 18 daily schools had on their books 556 boys and 567 girls. One of the schools, attended by 105 boys and 84 girls, has about £100 a-year from an endowment by the late Archbishop Stewart, and £31 10s. from the present archbishop and Mr. Stewart; and about 100 of the scholars are clothed, 15 of them by the dean. Another, the charter female school, attended by 10 or 12 girls, all of whom are clothed and boarded, was founded by the widow of the late Dean Drelincourt, and endowed by the late Archbishop Stewart. Another, the cathedral school, attended by 12 choir boys and 30 private pupils, was endowed by Archbishop Beresford for the education of choir boys, and yields the master a salary of £75. Five were private schools for general female education; and 3 were private schools for the classical education of boys. A boys' and girls' school in connection with the National Board, yet managed by a local committee, is aided with £50 a-year from the Board, and a sum not named from subscription; and it was attended, in 1833, by a large number of scholars, in consequence of a partial distribution of clothing, in 1835 by 138 boys and 272 girls, and in 1840 by 294 boys and 275 girls. Since 1835, the National Board have opened a second boys' and girls' school in the city, and salaried it with respectively £20 and £15. The royal school or college is not included among the daily schools, and will be noticed in the next article.

ARMAGH,

A post, market, and ancient town, a royal borough, the capital of a county, and the ecclesiastical metropolis of Ireland, stands in the parish, barony, and county of Armagh, 15 miles north-north-west of Newry, 31 south-west of Belfast, 47 south of Coleraine, 66 south-east by south of Londonderry, 41 east of Enniskillen, and 82 north by west of Dublin.

General Description.—Armagh—uncorruptedly, Ard-magh or Ard-magha, 'the lofty field or plain'—occupies the summit and gently sloping sides of Drumsalech, 'the hill of willows,' and is immediately environed with a rolling or softly tumulated country of beautiful contour. The environs, and even the site, were formerly patched with lake, marsh, bog, and such dense woods and thickets as were impervious to the sunbeams, and prevented the free circulation of the air. Even so late as the beginning of the 18th century, a small lake called Lappan remained in the very town, at the foot of Market-street, and abounded with eels. But the marshes have been drained, the bogs converted into meadow or corn-field, the offensive lakes annihilated, the woods and thickets cut down or thinned, and the whole surface so improved and embellished as to present an unwrinkled and unmarred face of health and beauty. Previous also to 1765, when Dr. Richard Robinson, successively Bishop of Leighlin and Kildare, and subsequently Lord Baron Rokeye of Armagh, was appointed to the primacy, the town itself was little better than a collection of mud cabins, without an archiepiscopal residence, with few and paltry or neglected public buildings, and destitute of almost every feature of either urban beauty or metropolitical importance. But that noble and patriotic prelate built in and around the city a palace, a college, an observatory, churches, bridges, hospitals, an obelisk, a military barrack, an infirmary, and shambles; he partially renovated and improved the cathedral; he prompted the reconstruction, in neat masonry, of many a dwelling-house; and, expending not less than £30,000 from his own resources, as well as exerting both his proprietorial and his official influence over the purses of others, he left the city, at his death in 1794, a well-built and ornamented town of stone and slate. Two prelates who succeeded him, various other parties of influence, and, in a large degree, the enterprising citizens themselves, have prosecuted the urban improvement which he so splendidly commenced; and, powerfully aided by the natural advantageousness of the site and the environs, they have eventually rendered Armagh the most handsome and interesting of all the inland towns of Ireland.

The Callan and the Ballinabone rivers traverse the environs each at the distance of about 3 furlongs from the city, the former on the west, and the latter on the east; they form a confluence at a point half-a-mile from the city's northern extremity; and both are spanned by bridges, carrying across the numerous lines of thoroughfare. On all sides except the south, a belt of river-course thus zones, at a fine distance, the site of the city; and this feature greatly aids the soft and constant tumulation of the ground, and the profusion of demesne, park, and wood embellishment, in flinging opulence over the scenery of the environs. The approaches from the south and the north, pass through quite a museum of luxuriance and beauty, which increases in wealth and attraction till the town is entered; that from the west, after leaving the brilliant series of close landscapes hinted at in our notice of the barony, steals into the city amidst the animation and cheerfulness of numerous rural habitations and various light and lofty mills near the winding banks of the Callan; and that from the east, after luxuriating through the opulent scenery of Richhill, and the still more opulent grounds of Castle-Dillon, suddenly reveals the deanery, the observatory, the primate's obelisk, the palace, the cathedral, and the city itself, with all the force and the thrilling effect of romance. The body of the town is an oval of about 500 yards by 330; and the entire town extends, in the direction of the greater axis, or from north to south, about 1,450 yards, and in the opposite direction, about 750. But south of these limits extends the archiepiscopal demesne, with the palace at the distance of 3 furlongs; and east of them, with the Mall or public promenade intervening, stand several of the most prominent public buildings. The cathedral crowns Drumsalech, in the midst of an open area, in the very centre of the oval and of the city. Toward the area around it climb various streets, some obliquely, and some in the converging manner of radii. Intersecting these streets, at points a brief distance down the hill, a line of edified thoroughfare terraces the declivity, and describes an irregular or curving circle. Round most of the base of the hill, and forming the line of the main oval, runs the principal series of streets, bearing over part of their extent the names of Ogle, Thomas, and Upper English streets. Diverging from the series, or sweeping down the hill and intersecting it, are the streets which lead out to the suburbs and the country, Lower English-street, College-street, Irish-street, Callan-street, and the streets toward Monaghan and Richhill. Nearly continuous with the last, and climbing the hill toward the cathedral, is the most spacious of the thoroughfares, an irregular rectangle, the site of the market-house, and the arena of the public markets. The private houses are neatly built with calcareous stone, and generally slated; new and handsome structures appear both singly and in rows; and both the dwelling-houses and the shops indicate snugness, comfort, opulence, and even a degree of gentility. The public edifices, viewed in the aggregate, are built with hewn limestone, of a very vivid colour, and finished in a chasteness of style which combines beauty and utility; they occupy such judiciously selected sites as prevent them from being concealed by contiguous dwelling-houses, or degraded by the vicinity of any incongruous objects; and they possess so fine a combination of elegance, proportion, and conspicuousness, as to be ornamental at once to the town itself and to the surrounding country.

The Cathedral.—A cathedral is alleged to have been erected, in Armagh, in the year 445 by St. Patrick; and is said, in the tripartite life of the saint, to have been an oblong edifice, 140 feet in length, and divided into nave and choir. Even an earlier structure is asserted to have occupied the site, to have been constructed of willows or wattles, and to have, in consequence, given to the hill the name of Drumsalech. An ecclesiastical structure claiming to be the cathedral of St. Patrick, or a successor to it, was pillaged and burnt in 839 and 850; partly broken down by the Danes of Dublin in 890; burnt by lightning or accidental conflagration in 995 and 1020; repaired and tile-roofed in 1125; more thoroughly restored in 1145; and reduced by fire to irretrievable ruin by Sir Phelim O'Neil in 1642. In this edifice were buried the bodies of the celebrated Brian Boromh and his son Murchard, and the heads of his nephew Conan, and his ally Methlin, prince of the Decies of Waterford. These remains of the heroes of Clontarf, after being 5 years sepulchred in the monastery of Swords, were conveyed hither by the clergy, and laid in state during twelve nights' performance of funeral obsequies. The present cathedral was built in 1675; renovated and greatly improved by Archbishop Robinson; and, a few years ago, repaired at a great cost, £10,000 of which was contributed by Archbishop Beresford. The Commissioners on Ecclesiastical Revenue and Patronage said respecting it in 1834, that it was in a dilapidated state from age; that the provincial architect employed to examine it pronounced it unworthy of any considerable expenditure towards its improvement; that various plans had been considered for realizing the means of re-edifying it either in whole or in part; and that, notwithstanding the munificent contribution of the primate, the chapter were totally incompetent to effect its suitable restoration. The pile, though not for a moment to be compared with most of the stately and richly ornate cathedrals of England, is a passable specimen of the later pointed style of architecture. It is cruciform; and measures 119 feet in the clear from end to end of the transepts, and 183½ feet from east to west, or along the choir and the nave. A square tower, whose battlement is 31 feet above the roof, and 110 above the ground, rises from the intersection of nave and transepts; and is surmounted by a spire of 40 feet in height. The proportion between the height of the roof and that of the tower seems defective to a spectator at the base of the hill, but appears quite symmetrical when the edifice is seen from a remoter distance; and the disproportionate elevation of the spire was occasioned by the obstinacy of the architect whom Archbishop Robinson employed to construct it. Among various monumental erections which adorn the interior, are a bust by Bacon of Archbishop Robinson, whose remains lie interred below; a full length figure of Archbishop Stewart; a beautiful and costly figure, by Rysbrack, of Dean Drelincourt; and monuments of William, Baron Caulfield,—of his son, William, Viscount Charlemont, who died in 1671,—and of the Rev. Dr. Jenny, rector of Armagh, who died in 1758.

The Palace.—The archiepiscopal residence, erected by Primate Robinson, is an elegant yet chaste and unostentatious structure. Its length is 90 feet; its width, 60; and its height, 40. The pile is simple, without wings or lesser parts; and has a light and pleasing appearance. Nearly ¼ of a mile south-west of it, and behind a plantation, is a suite of large and commodious offices. Beside the palace, and coeval with it in erection, is a handsome private chapel. In the demesne stands the obelisk erected by Archbishop Robinson, a nicely proportioned structure of marble, 157 feet high, raised at the cost of more than £1,000. It was dedicated by the founder to the honour and memory of his friend the Duke of Northumberland; but, having been projected and entirely constructed in order simply to give employment to operatives at a period of great public distress, it is justly regarded as a monument of his worth. A large lawn around the palace spreads on every side over the undulations and gentle hills of the surface; plantations skirt the lawn, or relieve its uniformity; a terrace in one of the skirting woods commands a most beautiful view of cultivated hill and dale, and of the rich eastern suburbs and environs of the city; and the whole demesne, tastefully laid out, well kept, and chastely luxurious, is liberally thrown open for the recreation of the citizens.

The College.—Armagh figures early and prominently in the ancient literature of Ireland. A college, alleged to have been founded here by St. Patrick, was long one of the most celebrated seminaries in Europe; and received the patronage and support of the kings of Ireland, down to Roderick O'Connor, the last of the native monarchs. Many learned men, not only of the Irish nation, but from almost every part of Christendom, issued from this college, to instruct their respective countrymen, and diffuse knowledge among barbarians; and some of them figure in the annals of hagiology as martyrs. An ecclesiastical synod convoked by Gelasius at Cleonard or Clane, decreed that none but Alumni of Armagh should be permitted to deliver prelections on theology. Florence Macarthy, as quoted by Sir James Ware in his Antiquities of Ireland, asserts, though with little probability, that the number of students at one time exceeded 7,000. The departments taught in the college were the vernacular tongue, grammar, rhetoric, logic, music, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and theology.—The present college, or grammar-school, or royal-school, was founded by Primate Robinson, and cost him upwards of £4,000. He wished to have very greatly enlarged it, and rendered it an university; and, had government co-operated with him, or afforded him the requisite facilities for the attainment of his object, he would have endowed the institution with the larger part of his great fortune. Even after being wearied with prolonged and final disappointment, he bequeathed £5,000 toward the extension of the college into an university, provided the foundation-stone were laid within 5 years of his decease; but this last and affecting effort of his generosity, like every previous one, was defeated. The institution, even on the limited Academy scale on which he was compelled to leave it, is great and influential. The building is situated at the base of a hill, nearly a furlong east of the north end of the Mall, on the road from College-street to the deanery. It is a spacious, regular, and handsome edifice; admirably contrived for its purpose; containing apartments for a master, a school-room of 56 feet by 28, a large dining-room, and spacious airy dormitories; and having appended to it every requisite accommodation, and an extensive enclosed play-ground. During the incumbency of Dr. Carpendale, who was appointed to its preceptorship by the founder, the institution was regarded as the Eton or Westminster of Ireland. An endowment, granted to it by Charles I. out of forfeited lands, yields nearly £1,400 a-year.

The Observatory.—This edifice occupies an elevated site, 250 yards north of the College. The south front displays, in great neatness of architecture, an elevation of two stories, with a large circular turret in the centre, surmounted by a dome. The reverse of a medal, struck in honour of Primate Robinson, by the ingenious William Mossop of Armagh, exhibits this front with the appropriate encircling legend, "The Heavens declare the Glory of God." The observatory contains apartments for the resident astronomer, a museum, and astronomical rooms; and is surrounded by a very elegant demesne of 20 acres. Primate Robinson, the founder of the institution, endowed it with lands and a perpetual fund, which yield to the resident astronomer about £400 a-year; and he and Primate Beresford, each expended £3,000, in supplying the building with conveniences, and furnishing it with astronomical instruments. The professorship of the institution is at present ably filled by Dr. Robinson.

The Library.—This building stands in the vicinity of the cathedral; presents a very handsome appearance; contains spacious and neat accommodation for a large collection of books, and an elegant suite of apartments for the librarian; and has attached to it a court of 10 acres. Primate Robinson not only constructed the edifice, and stored it with an accumulation of scarce and valuable works in both ancient and modern literature, but endowed it with a perpetual fund, which 40 years ago yielded £300 per annum, and is applied to the purchase of books, the salarizing of the librarian, and the repairing of the edifice. The library contains, at present, between 20,000 and 30,000 volumes; and may be used by every person who resides within 30 miles of the city, and deposits double the value of the books which he borrows. The observatory and the library are under the corporate governorship, for the public use, of the archbishop, the dean, and several members of the chapter of the cathedral.

Churches and Extinct Monasteries.—St. Mark's church, situated 350 yards south-east of the college, and half that distance east of the Mall, is a handsome modern edifice. One of the Presbyterian meeting-houses was built with part of the ruins of the monastery of St. Peter and St. Paul. One of the Methodist chapels stands near a spot on which the founder of Methodism frequently preached. The Roman Catholic chapel stands on the south side of the area around the cathedral, and is itself the cathedral and metropolitan church of the Roman Catholic diocese and primacy.—An abbey is alleged to have been founded in Armagh by St. Patrick; and a monastery, which affected to be identified with it, afterwards figured as a celebrated Augustinian friary, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. A religious establishment, founded in 610, and ascribed to St. Columba, was nearly destroyed by fire in 670 and 687, and was frequently desolated of its inmates, and plundered of its books, records, and treasures, by the Danes. A Franciscan friary of Minorites was founded in 1263 or 1264, by Patrick O'Scanlain, Archbishop of Armagh, or, according to Allemande, in 1291 by O'Donnell. A Dominican friary is said also to have existed in the city; but when, or how long, seems not recorded. Two nunneries, the one called the Church of St. Bridget, and the other called Teampull-na-feartagh or 'the Church of Miracles,' absurdly claim, like the Augustinian friary, to have been founded by St. Patrick. Pretension, in the total absence of authentic information, even soars so high as to affirm that the Church of Miracles was erected for the use of St. Lupita, the eldest sister of St. Patrick; and that the saintess was interred within its walls; and that her body was identical with one discovered about 140 years ago, inhumed erect between two crosses, deep beneath the rubbish of the nunnery's ruins. In 1612, the Augustinian friary and its possessions were granted to Sir Toby Caulfield, for the nominal rent of £5 Irish; and, in 1618, the two nunneries were given to Francis Annesley, Esq. A writer in the Dublin Penny Journal says, "In our memory, the last fragments of the Culdean buildings," the establishment of St. Columba, "were pulled down, and the habitable part of the Augustinian monastery, dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, was levelled to the earth." The remains of one of the other monasteries, situated within the primate's demesne, were very extensive about the middle of last century, but have been reduced to some tolerably preserved arches and intervening pieces of wall.

Remedial Institutions.—The Lunatic Asylum for the counties of Armagh, Monaghan, Fermanagh, and Cavan, stands on the left bank of the Ballynabone river, a furlong above its junction with the Callan, and was erected in 1824-5, at an expense of £20,000. This was the first of the district asylums in Ireland, and is not so well planned as those of later date. It was originally designed for the reception of only 106 patients; and though afterwards altered by the transmutation of one or two rooms into dormitories, it possessed quite inadequate accommodation for the cases within its extensive and populous district. The last report of it states that idiot criminals had been forced upon it since the passing of the Act 1st Vict. c. 25; that the presence of these and of previous incurables had filled the establishment, and greatly defeated the remedial treatment of the curable; but that, when idiots and harmless incurables should be removed to the Poor-law houses, there would be sufficiency of accommodation for the lunatic poor of the district. On 1st Jan., 1841, there were in the asylum 62 male and 56 female patients; and between that date and Jan. 1842, 21 male and 17 female patients were admitted, 9 males and 9 females were cured, 6 males and 3 females were relieved and given up to friends, 3 males and 4 females died, and 19 males and 1 female waited to be received. From the opening of the institution on 14th July, 1825, till 1st Jan. 1842, 649 males and 505 females were admitted, 280 males and 240 females were cured, 130 males and 90 females were relieved and given up to friends, 73 males and 40 females were unrelieved, yet harmless, and given up to friends, 92 males and 72 females died, and 10 males and 5 females were transferred to the Derry Asylum. In 1841, 50 males and 55 females were employed at different trades and other works, and 15 males and 2 females were unemployed from imbecility. The total expenditure for that year was £2,107 7s. 10d.; the total of salaries was £539 4s.; and the average cost for each patient was £17 5s. 5d.—A private Lunatic Asylum near the city appears to be well-conducted; in 1840, it had 20 patients; and, though sufficient accommodation did not exist for that number, the proprietor promised to the inspector immediately to supply it.—The Armagh County Infirmary has only 40 beds, but contains apartments for the surgeon which, if converted into wards, would afford space for at least 20 beds; and, even if these were rendered available, it might probably possess an insufficient amount of accommodation. During the year 1840, it had a total of 607 intern patients; expended £1,286 8s. 4d., and received £145 9s. from subscriptions, £683 1s. 10d. from parliamentary and county grants, and £432 4s. 9½d from other sources.—The fever hospital, situated beyond the borough boundaries, and nearly half-a-mile north-east of the cathedral, was erected and is maintained solely by Archbishop Beresford, and it contains 40 beds, and is intended for the use exclusively of the citizens. Jacob Arthur Macan, who died in India in 1819, bequeathed to the sovereign, burgesses, and inhabitants of Armagh, the greater part of a property valued at £23,000, for building and endowing in the city an asylum for the blind, on the plan of that at Liverpool, but perfectly unrestricted and unaffected by any question of religious denomination. This bequest, though retarded from taking effect, was reported, in 1835, as likely to occasion a full provision, which should be available, first for the blind in the county of Armagh, next for the blind in other districts, and next, if the state of the funds should permit, for a portion of the deaf and dumb.

Poor-law Buildings and Union.—A workhouse for Armagh Poor-law union was contracted for on Oct. 11th, 1839,—to be completed in June 1841,—to cost, for building and completion, £7,200, and for fittings and contingencies, £1,554 7s. 10d.,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, 27 perches, purchased for £1,246 12s. 2d.,—and to contain accommodation for 1,000 paupers. The Poor-law union, for which this workhouse has been provided, ranks as the 33d, and was declared on April 25th, 1839. With the exception of one electoral division, that of Caledon, which is in Tyrone, the whole union lies in co. Armagh; and it comprises an area of 154,281 acres; with a pop., in 1831, of 107,143. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Armagh, 10,343; Grange, 2,802; Oakley, 3,276; Richhill, 6,089; Kilmore, 4,501; Annaghmore, 3,767; Killyman, 1,950; Loughgall, 5,442; Charlemont, 5,210; Ballymartin, 2,508; Glenaul, 4,177; Tynan, 4,554; Middleton, 5,199; Brootally, 3,308; Ballyards, 2,585; Crossmore, 4,146; Keady, 4,906; Derrynoose, 4,323;

Armagh-Breague, 3,632; Lisnadill, 3,343; Clady, 3,554; Killeen, 2,876; Markethill, 5,495; Hamilton's Bawn, 4,586; and Caledon, 4,413. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 12 and 37; and of the latter, 4 are returned by Armagh division, 2 by each of the divisions of Richhill, Loughgall, Charlemont, Tynan, Middleton, Keady, Derrynoose, Markethill, and Caledon, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The cost of the valuation was £376 6s. 4d., exclusive of £21 for revising it. Paupers began to be admitted in Jan. 4th, 1842; the total expenses thence till Feb. 6th, 1843, amounted to £3,658 5s. 10d.; and the total amount of previous expenses was £1,125 5s. 4d. Six dispensaries within the union have their seats at Blackwatertown, Caledon, Keady, Loughgall and Richhill, Markethill, and Tynan; they serve for districts whose united area amounts to 134,589 acres, and contained, in 1831, a pop. of 95,287; and, in 1839, they unitedly received £956, expended £939 8s., and administered to 10,571 patients.

County Buildings.—The county gaol, situated opposite the south-east end of the Mall, and near the divergence of the outlets to Belfast and Newry, was pronounced 38 years ago, "a modern and complete building, standing on a plain, with every advantage of good air, and proper accommodations for the prisoners," and "admirably planned as to strength and security." But in the Prison Reports of 1840 and 1841, it is denounced as an "old and very defective building, totally unfitted for carrying into practical effect any method even approaching to a proper system of classification and separation, according to the provisions of the late Act." Yet it is defective only as seen through the medium of the judicious and benign principles of prison discipline, which unhappily had scarce an advocate at the period of its erection; it is likely to be speedily forced down by these principles to give place to a suitable successor; and, while it stands, it has the advantage of being as zealously subordinated to their scope and operation as its construction can well admit. Its accommodations are 18 dormitory cells, 19 other rooms with beds, 8 day-rooms, 4 work-rooms and sheds, 9 yards, 12 solitary cells, 2 hospitals, 3 baths, 4 stores and other appropriate conveniences. The prisoners on 23d Dec., 1841, consisted of 74 men, 25 women, 10 boys, and 6 hospital patients. Throughout 1841, the average number of prisoners was 136, the average annual cost of each £12 8s. 10½d., and the total annual expense of the gaol, £1,692 5s. 1½d. The county court-house, or sessions-house, built in 1809, and situated opposite the north-west end of the Mall, and in the line of College-street, is constructed of hewn limestone, has a handsome portico, and produces in the perspective of the street a very striking effect.

Other Public Buildings.—The barracks, situated on the Belfast or Richhill road, 200 yards east of the gaol, are a neat erection of their class, well-designed, occupying an extensive and suitably enclosed area, and standing on a fine open eminence in full view of the contiguous prison.—The shambles, constructed by Primate Robinson, are a proper erection of their kind, and adapted jointly to convenience, cleanliness, and utility. A market-house was built by Primate Bolton, but appears never to have been quite finished, and, at the commencement of the present century, was a ruin. Between it and the cathedral, and in the area of the market-place, stood an antique mutilated market-cross, curiously but rudely sculptured, and thus described in 1803 by Sir Charles Coote:—"It appears that the top of the cross has been damaged; the symbolic subject is Christ's crucifixion between the thieves, in old basso relieve; the others are so much obliterated, that I leave their solution to more expert antiquarians; they appear rather a kind of rude ornamental fret-work, than any distinct characters." The present neat market-house was designed at his own expense by Archbishop Stewart. Among the numerous erections of Archbishop Robinson was an assembly-room, which, while dedicated to fashionable dissipation, was yet designed to subserve charitable purposes, but which, as it aware of the incongruity between its objects, he left quite incomplete. The card and supper rooms are on a large scale; the ball-room is 60 feet by 30; and the kitchens and servants' apartments are suitably laid out.—The Mall, already repeatedly named, may, though no 'building,' be here formally noticed. It is about 500 yards long, and from 60 to 160 yards broad; it is enclosed with a dwarf wall, like, and iron gates; and it consists of a neat gravel walk, encompassing a lawn of about 6 acres. It was laid out under the protection of an act of parliament; and is watched over by a care-taker or public officer. The expense of completing it was defrayed by subscription, but was in a few years repaid from the profits of the lawn.

Trade.—In the 17th century, camlets, as well as linen and woollen cloths, were manufactured at Armagh; but at present linens and unions are the staple produce of both the city and its vicinity. Bleaching is conducted to a large extent in the environs, and reciprocates with a well-stocked market of yarns and cloths. A large amount of agricultural produce is disposed of in the city. A chief business is a well-conducted and spirited retail trade for the supply of the extensive and populous circumjacent country. Weekly markets are held on Tuesday and Saturday; and annual fairs on May 21st, July 10th, Aug. 12th, Tuesday before Oct. 10th, and Nov. 20th. A branch of the Provincial Bank of Ireland was established in the city in 1826; a branch of the Bank of Ireland, in 1827; branches of the Belfast Bank and the Northern Bank, in 1835; and branches of the Ulster Bank, and the Agricultural and Commercial Bank, in 1836. The town's railway communications are noticed in the article on the county. In 1838, the public conveyances were a car to Aghnacloy, 2 coaches to Belfast, a car to Caledon, 2 coaches to Dublin, 7 cars and a caravan to Dungannon, a mail car and a stage car to Enniskillen, a mail car to Monaghan, 8 cars to Moy, a caravan to Newry, a caravan to Stewartstown, and a car to Tanderagee, and the mail coach in transit between Newry and Coleraine.—In 1842, the Armagh loan fund had a capital of £1,014, circulated £3,671 in 1,357 loans.—The amount of excise revenue collected in the Armagh district, in 1828, was £84,076; in 1839, it had fallen to £60,791. We have no returns for later years; but the number of gallons of spirits taken out for home consumption, within the Armagh collection, which, in 1841, amounted to 349,594, had, in the year ending January 5, 1843, sunk to 118,008.

Municipal Affairs, &c.—The old royalty, or the district called 'the Corporation,' occupies the whole peninsula between the Callan and the Ballynahone, from an irregular line south of the city, and comprehends an area of 1,147 statute acres. The parliamentary and the new municipal boundary coincides over only about 2½ furlongs on the south-west with the old boundary; it everywhere else extends within the old or corporation limits; and it comprehends the whole city and suburbs, excepting some straggling buildings, and describes an irregular circumference of about 3½ statute miles. The earliest and principal charter was granted in 1613, the 11th year of James I. Other charters were given in the 12th year of James I., the 10th of Charles I., the 4th of James II., and the 27th of George II. The corporation, styled 'the Sovereign, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty of the Borough of Ardmagh,' consists of a sovereign, 12 free burgesses, and an unlimited number of freemen. A fee of £2 to the town-clerk, besides the stamp-duty of £3, is payable on the admission of a free burgess. The election of the inferior officers is vested by charter in the corporation, but came to be, with slight restriction, exercised solely by the primate. The corporation possesses no exclusive jurisdiction, civil or criminal. The seneschal of the manor of Armagh, who is appointed by the primate, holds his court in the city, and exercises jurisdiction, both by attachment of goods and by civil bill process, in all causes of action arising within the manor, and not exceeding £10. The city lies chiefly within this manor, and partly within that of Mountnorris. The assizes are held in the town twice a-year. At the county quarter-sessions, held also twice a-year in the city, the assistant barrister disposes of cases within his civil bill and other statutable jurisdictions for the city and division of Armagh. Petty-sessions are held every Saturday by the county justices of the peace, resident in the city and its neighbourhood. Excepting the town-sergeants, who are employed in the arresting of vagrants, the borough has no police force distinct from the county. An assessment formerly made by presentment of a corporation grand jury for police purposes, gradually increased from £854 7s. 2d. Irish, in 1821, to £1,180 19s. 3d. British, in 1832. Under the acts of 1789 for the supplying of water to corporate towns, the city was supplied from 1793 to 1800, in a bungling and inconvenient style by means of timber pipes, but afterwards by means of metal pipes, and with distribution to private houses. The cost of the supply, aggregately in 1793-7, was £1,057; in 1798-9, £450; in 1800-15, £4,551; in 1816-28, £4,506; in 1829-33, £1,816. The number of houses supplied, in 1814, was about 150; and in 1829-33, it was 272. The tolls and customs of the borough appear to have long ago become private property; and, though reduced in exaction to half of their quondam amount, continued, as exacted in 1834, to be an object of popular complaint. Excepting a waste which was granted to them in pursuance of the trusts of an act of parliament, the corporation are not now possessed of any property. Previous to the union, the borough sent two members to parliament; since the union, it sends one; and previous to the Reform act, it was a pocket borough of the primate. Constituency, in 1832, 437 householders and 11 burgesses; in 1835, 680 householders and 12 burgesses; in 1841, 880 householders and 12 burgesses. A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church has its seat in Armagh; meets on the first Tuesday of Feb., May, Aug., and Nov.; and has under its inspection 20 congregations. Area of the town, 269 acres. Pop., in 1831, 9,470; in 1841, 10,245. Houses 1,493.

History.—The early history of Armagh, both civil and ecclesiastical, is so shrouded in feature that its true lineaments cannot be seen; and its later history is such an almost uniform series of plundering and bloody incident on the part of Dunes and Irish septs, as to possess very little real interest. We shall therefore present only the briefest outline of both, and regard ourselves as exonerated from the historiographer's duty, in reference to the former, of discriminating between fable and authentic story.—A city called Eamhain or Eamania—a name corrupted from Aem-huim-ue, 'the noble city,'—is affirmed to have been built on or near the site of Armagh, by a Scottish prince, upwards of two centuries, or according to O'Connor, 353 years before the Christian era. This city claims to have been the capital of Ulster, and royal seat of the kings of the north; and is said to have been sacked and burned, in the 4th century, by a chieftain of Connaught, called Cairbre Liffechar. Colgan affirms that, in his time, the ruins of the city were standing. Camden says that the ruins of the royal palace of the city, which both he and Speed, who wrote in 1614, call Owen Maugh, were still visible near Armagh. O'Halloran, a modern author, also affirms their existence at the time when he wrote. Yet legends and traditions, which nowhere show more of the voracity of the shark than in Ireland, seem wondrous shy in gulping down a morsel so exquisitely to their taste as this pretty story of the city Emania. St. Patrick, who very generally figures in history as the founder of Armagh per excellence, and the founder of the great majority of Irish towns and villages which claim a high and ecclesiastical antiquity, is alleged to have been attracted to the spot by its metropolitical importance, and to have selected its vicinity as the site of ecclesiastical structures, and the scene of ecclesiastical ministrations, whose influence should be paramount over all Ireland. He obtained from Daire, a chief of the circumjacent country, a grant of the hill Druimsailech, changed the name of the place to Ardmagh, and planted on it, if we can believe Joeclyn, "his archbishop's see, designing it for the primacy, metropolis, and mistress of all Ireland." Yet, even after our caveat against being regarded as assenting to the truth of every part of our brief outline, we might mislead a raw or young reader did we not tell him that little of really authentic matter, such as would satisfy a scrupulous historian whether of Catholic or Protestant faith, is known respecting St. Patrick. His biographers, Archbishop Usher, and Joeclyn the Lancashire monk, are likely to be followed by Episcopalians, and by Catholics; but no writer sufficiently unconcerned in 'the primacy,' or the hagiology of St. Patrick, is yet before us whom we can follow as an altogether unbiassed guide; and original or recondit sources of information—though we have glanced at some of them—are too elaborate in management for the rapid pen of a topographer. Whoever feels curiosity to know what labours and mortifications are ascribed to St. Patrick by the Church of Rome, may consult the Romish Breviary; and whoever wishes to see a Churchman's account of his real or alleged successors, from his "resigning the primacy to St. Benignus, and living in private to see it descend to three successors, all of whom he nominated," will find it intermixed with some curious historical annals, in Ware's View of the Bishops of the See down to 1678, or in Beaton's Political Index, down to the appointment of Primate Robinson in 1763.

Previous to the conquest of Ireland by the English, and even in the various subsequent civil wars, Armagh suffered more of the horrors of fire, plunder, and sword, than probably any other Irish town of its size. "From time immemorial," to adopt the words of a periodical writer, "it has been the scene of many a deadly feud and bloody engagement,—in wars, waged at one time between the Irish chieftains themselves,—at others, between the Irish, Danes, and Ostmans,—and afterwards between the natives of the country and the invading armies of Scotland and England." In 670, 687, and 778, it was burnt; eight times in the 9th century, and thirteen times in the three following centuries, it was plundered, burnt, or otherwise laid waste by the Danes; during the conquest of Ulster by the English, it was pillaged by De Courcy, Fitz-Adelm, and De Lacy; and during the period which intervened till the accession of James I., but especially during the civil wars in the reign of Elizabeth, it was repeatedly burnt, plundered, or otherwise strewn with the desolation of warfare. No fewer than 17 burnings of the city, either partial or total, are on record. So quick is the repetition of warlike incident, so akin in character to each former instance which followed, and so slenderly relieved is the appalling and monotonous story with any other narrative than such literary matter as we incidentally noticed in our descriptive paragraphs, that readers, as well as ourselves, will gladly pass to other topics.

The Bishopric.—The see of Armagh, though claiming to have been founded and even made primordial by St. Patrick, does not fairly appear in history as an archbishopric, or even as fixedly prelatial, till the year 1152. The sees suffragan to it about 50 years later were Connor, Down, Louth, Clonard, Kells, Arlough, Raphoe, Rathlure, Duleek, and Derry. By subsequent unions, suppressions, and other changes, the suffragans came to be Down and Connor, Dromore, Derry, Raphoe, Clogher, Meath, Kilmore, and Ardagh,—the last held in commendam by the Archbishop of Tuam. By the Act of 1833, the province of Armagh was so enlarged in territory as to comprehend that of Tuam, and, at the same time, so diminished in suffragans as to include, with the Archbishop's own see, only 6 bishoprics. The present province extends over all Ulster, over by far the greater part of Connaught, and over a very considerable part of Leinster; and its 6 bishoprics are Armagh with Clogher, Meath still single, Derry with Raphoe, Down with Connor and Dromore, Kilmore with Elphin and Ardagh, and Tuam with Killalla and Achonry. A contentious struggle long maintained between Armagh and Dublin for priority, terminated some two or three centuries ago in the Archbishop of Armagh being styled 'Primate of all Ireland and Metropolitan,' and he of Dublin 'Primate of Ireland and Metropolitan.' In 1834, the province, within the limits which belonged to it prior to the Church Temporalities Act, contained 544 parish churches, 66 other places of worship connected with the Establishment, 425 meeting houses of Presbyterians, 218 meeting houses of other Protestant dissenters, and 715 Roman Catholic chapels; its pop. consisted of 517,722 Churchmen, 638,073 Presbyterians, 15,823 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,955,123 Roman Catholics; and it contained 247 daily schools, of which no lists could be obtained, and 4,235 of which full statistics were procured, the former computed to be attended by 16,055 children, and the latter having on their books 109,118 boys, 105,234 girls, and 2,089 children whose sex was not specified. Of the total number of schools, 2,396 were supported wholly by fees, 2,086 wholly or partly by subscription; and of the latter, 461 were aided by the National Board, 112 by the Association for Discourteasing Vice, 61 by Erasmus Smith's fund, 195 by the Kildare-street Society, and 460 by the London Hibernian Society.—The Roman Catholic province of Armagh includes the archdiocese of Armagh, and the 8 suffragan dioceses of Derry, Clogher, Raphoe, Down and Connor, Kilmore, Ardagh, Meath, and Dromore.

The see of Armagh is charged in the King's books at £400. In 1833, the episcopal revenue was, gross, £17,609 16s. 7d.; nett, £14,494 0s. 3d.; and was stated by the primate to be fairly capable of increase to the amount of £6,918 17s. 7d. The see lands are said to comprehend 104,000 acres.—The chapter of the cathedral consists of a dean, a precentor, a treasurer, an archdeacon, and the prebendaries of Mullaghbrack, Ballymore, Loughgall, and Tynan.

The only revenue controlled or managed by the chapter in their corporate capacity, is the economy fund, which annually amounts, according to the average of three years ending in 1831, to £180 1s. 5d. The dean holds, by precedent, yet not strictly in virtue of his office, the benefice of Armagh. The corps of the precentorship is the benefice of Killevey; of the chancellorship, that of Kilmore; of the treasurer'ship, that of Creggan; of the archdeaconship, those of Carreenteel and Aghaloo; and of the prebends, the respective benefices whence they have their designation. The subordinate officers of the cathedral are 8 vicars choral, who have each £84; 6 stipendiaries, who have each £30; 8 chorists, 4 of whom have each £10, and 4 each £5; an organist, who has £180; and a schoolmaster of choir boys, who has £75. The estate of the vicars choral, out of which all these subordinate officers are paid, yields a gross income of £875 8s. 8d.

The diocese of Armagh comprehends nearly all the county of Armagh and the county of Louth, about a moiety of the county of Tyrone, a considerable nook of the county of Londonderry, and a very small part of the county of Meath. Length, in statute measure, 75 miles; breadth, from 12½ to 32 miles; area, 809,289 acres, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 482,641. The parishes, including perpetual curacies, but excluding the chapelry of St. Mark's in Drogheda, amount to 118; the benefices which consist each of a single parish, to 74; the benefices which consist of united parishes, to 14; the total of benefices, to 88; the resident incumbents, to 72, and the chaplain of St. Mark's, Drogheda; the non-resident incumbents, to 16; the benefices without stipendiary curates, to 41; the benefices which have each one stipendiary curate, to 40; and the benefices which have each two or more stipendiary curates, to 7. Gross income of the benefices, £53,252 9s. 6½d.; nett, £44,310 14s. 1½d. Gross income of the curates, exclusive of certain advantages and extraneous allowances enjoyed by a few, £3,992 0s. 1d. Average gross amount of vestry assessments for church purposes, £3,832 4s. 9½d.; for general purposes, £2,362 19s. 7½d. Benefices with glebe houses, 73; without them, 15; with glebe lands, 78; without them, 10. Cost of glebe houses, £84,076 2s. 2½d.; extent of glebe lands, 19,200 acres, 1 rood, 1½ perch. The patronage of 3 benefices belongs to the Crown; of 44 a chapelry, to the diocesan; of 20, to incumbents; of 13, to laymen and corporations; and of 8 to alternate parties. Value of appropriate tithes, not payable to incumbents, £432 6s. 8d.; of inappropriate tithes, £2,801 13s. 0½d. In 1834, the places of worship belonging to the Establishment, were 99; to Presbyterians, 68; to other Protestant dissenters, 44; to Roman Catholics, 120: the number of members of the Established Church was 108,012; of Presbyterians, 84,837; of other Protestant dissenters, 3,340; of Roman Catholics, 309,447: the number of benefices with no member of the Established Church, was 1; with not more than 20 members, 3; with between 20 and 100 members, 11; with between 100 and 1,000 members, 34; and with between 1,000 and 5,000 members, 39. In 1834, 623 daily schools had on their books 23,601 boys, 15,318 girls, and 935 children whose sex was not specified; and 66 other schools, no lists of which could be obtained, were computed to be attended by 4,752 children. Computed total of children under daily instruction, 44,606; proportion of this total to the entire population, 8.1. Of the total number of schools, 249 were supported wholly by fees, 374 wholly or partly by endowment or subscription; and of the latter, 67 were connected with the National Board, 26 with the Association for Discountenancing Vice, 19 with the Board of Erasmus Smith, 22 with the Kildare-street Society, and 59 with the London Hibernian Society.—The Roman Catholic dio. of Armagh is distributed into 51 parishes: two of these, Armagh and Drogheda, are bishops' parishes, and are served by the primate and 6 curates; and the others are served by 49 officiates, and 60 coadjutor officiates. Efforts have recently been made for the erection of a splendid new Roman Catholic cathedral in Armagh. The Roman Catholic primate resides alternately at Armagh and Drogheda. The convents within the dio. are a Dominican with 3 friars in Armagh, a Dominican with 2 friars in Dundalk, a Franciscan with 3 friars in Armagh, an Augustinian with 3 friars in Armagh, a presentation with 12 nuns in Armagh, and a Sienna convent of St. Catherine with 22 nuns in Armagh.

ARMAGH-BREAGUE, a quoad sacra parish, on the mutual border of the baronies of Armagh and Fews, and on the south-western border of co. Armagh, Ulster. It is included, quoad civilia, in the parishes of LISNADILL and KEADY: which see. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 9,113 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,632. The surface extends among the water-sheds and nascent affluents of the streams which run respectively northward to Lough Neagh, and south-eastward to Dundalk bay; is naturally moorish, upland, and wild; and forms part of the pastoral district of the Fews mountains. Such land as is arable has nearly all been reclaimed from a moorish condition. The village or hamlet of Armagh-Breague is situated about 3½ miles south-east of Keady.—This parish is a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Armagh. Gross income, £80; nett, £55. Patron, alternately the incumbent of Lisnadill, and the incumbent of Keady. The church was built in 1830 by means of a grant of £600 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, from 100 to 120. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 800 persons; and, jointly with two chapels in Lisnadill and Kilelun, is under the care of three officiates. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 008 Churchmen, 1,410 Presbyterians, and 1,748 Roman Catholics; 485 of the Presbyterians, and 872 of the Roman Catholics, were in the Lisnadill section; and 925 of the Presbyterians, and 876 of the Roman Catholics, in the Keady section; a Protestant Sunday school was attended by 80 children, a parochial school by 80 boys and 40 girls, and a hedge-school by about 10 boys and 10 girls. The parochial school was aided with donations amounting to £5 a-year.

ARMOY, a name of FERMOY: which see.

ARMOY, or ARMOY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, and lying partly in the barony of Upper Dunluce, but chiefly on the western border of the barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 9,665 acres,—of which 1,143 are in Upper Dunluce. Pop., in 1831, 2,622; in 1841, 2,766. Houses 416. Pop. of the Dunluce section, in 1841, 470. Houses 90. Part of the surface is a portion of the romantic vale of the river Bush; and a chief part consists of the hilly ramifications which are connected with Knockade. The land is in general of but middle-rate quality. The village of Armo, situated in the glen of the Bush, about a mile from Kenbane Head, and 4 miles south by west of Ballycastle, appears to have been anciently a place of some note. Its name means 'the yellow height, or hill.' A round tower at the village is so far dilapidated as to exhibit, in tolerable preservation, a height of only about 44 feet, and so closely resembles the less damaged tower at Antrim, described in our notice of that town, that any description of it would be superfluous. Around the tower is a cemetery. About 2 miles distant, and more inland, is an old castle, enclosed in plantation, but unnoticed in history. Fairs are held in the village on Jan. 5, Feb. 25, March 29, May 25, Nov. 12, and Dec. 25. Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 129; in 1841, 315. Houses 61.—Arnoy parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £225. Gross income, £250 10s.; nett, £232 7s. 3d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built, in 1820, by means of a loan of £383 1s. 6d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, from 60 to 80. A Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 150 to 400, and a Roman Catholic chapel by from 100 to 400; and the latter shares with the chapel of Ballintoy the services of one officiate. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 576 Churchmen, 817 Presbyterians, 1 other Protestant Dissenter, and 1,359 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were attended by from 155 to 205 children; and 4 daily schools, two of which were aided respectively with £5 from the rector, and £8 from the National Board, had on their books 164 boys and 102 girls.

ARNEY (THE), a river of the co. Leitrim, Connaught, and the co. Fermanagh, Ulster. Its remotest head-stream rises $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Manor-Hamilton, and runs 7 miles eastward to Lough Cane, or Upper Lough Macnean. Another considerable head-stream rises not far from the centre of the Fermanagh barony of Magheraboy, and flows south-westward to the same lake. The river is popularly viewed, however, as issuing from the foot of Lough Nitty or Lower Lough Macnean, $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of the latter head-stream's insolation with Lough Cane; and thence it has a course of about 7 miles, in a direction south of east, to Upper Lough Erne, at a point 3 miles south of Enniskillen. The stream has almost everywhere wooded banks, and luxuriates over much of its course among the beautiful demesne grounds of Florence Court. The Arney and the chain of lakes which it connects form the line of division between the dioceses of Clogher and Kilmore.

ARRA. See OWNEY.

ARRA (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Clanwilliam, confluent with the Aberlow, co. Tipperary, Munster.

ARRAN, a sea-girt barony in co. Galway, Connaught. It consists of a group of islands, often called SOUTH ARRAN, to distinguish them from Arran or Arranmore, in the county of Donegal. The islands form a chain about 12 miles long, and nowhere more than 2 miles broad; and lie across the mouth of Galway bay, in the direction of east-south-east and west-north-west. The South Sound, which divides them from the county of Clare, is about 4 miles broad; and the North Sound, which divides them from islands and peninsula in the Galway barony of Moycullen, has a mean breadth of nearly 7 miles. Their whole area, excepting apparently about one-thirtieth, or at the utmost one-twentieth, consists of the three islands of Innishere on the east, Ennismain in the middle, and Arranmore on the west. The first and the second of these are jointly about one-half the size of the third. Foul Sound and St. Gregory's Sound, each about half-a-mile broad, divide respectively Innishere from Ennismain, and Ennismain from Arranmore. On the western skirt of Arranmore, and extending from its coast to the distance of about 12 or 14 furlongs, lies a mimic archipelago, called the Branch Islands. In the sounds which separate the three chief islands from one another and from the main island, are various islets so small as, for the most part, to draw no attention except from the watchful mariner. ARRAN-MORE, ENNISMMAIN, and INNISHERE, as they give name to three parishes which they chiefly constitute, will be separately described. The whole Arran group seems to be a continuation of the limestone country of Burrin in co. Clare. The large and splendid marine inlet which the group partially covers is traditionally asserted to have been a lake, screened or curtained from the ocean by a band of limestone country of which the Arran islands are fragmentary remains. "It is related in one of the old Irish annals," says Hardiman, the historian of Galway, "that, in the year of the world 1909, there were but three lakes of any consequence in the whole island [of Ireland], namely, Loch-Foidream, said to have been at Slievemis, near Tralee, in co. Kerry, Fin-Loch, the present Lough-Carra, in co. Mayo, and Loch-Lurgan, which is described as a spacious lake between co. Clare and West Connaught, to the south of Galway, and extending a considerable distance toward the east. This lake is supposed to have been the present bay of Galway, which was once, say the annalists, separated from the ocean by strong banks, until the Atlantic, hursting over them and uniting with the water within, formed the bay, leaving the three islands of Arran, the towering remnants of the chain or barrier, which were too high to be overflown by the billows. The position of these islands, with relation to the mainland, as it favours, seems also to have given rise to this idea. O'Flaherty says that, in his time, a lough in a neighbouring inlet of the sea, was called Lough Lurgan; but how far the entire circumstance is deserving of credit is left, without any comment, to the judgment of the reader." The surface of the islands, in a general view, commences with precipitous cliffs on the south, and terminates in a gradual descent to the water's edge on the north; yet it presents undulations and other diversities of feature; and constitutes, in grouping with the circumjacent sea, and the intricate and commanding coast-line of the mainland, a series of interesting and even brilliant landscapes. The islands contain a considerable proportion of good arable and pastoral land, and yield a rental of about £2,000 a-year. The inhabitants are partly agriculturists and partly fishermen; but they occasionally experience much distress, and have sometimes been employed in quarrying ashlers of limestone for the public works of the Government Boards in the harbours of the mainland. The fishermen catch great quantities of turbot at a less distance than 25 miles from the islands; they catch the fish called Glassing on a bank from 25 to 30 miles distant; they share with the fishermen of Galway in the cod and ling fisheries; and they have been known to prosecute their avocation at 40 miles' distance in the open Atlantic. Their boats, though good and of the same construction as those of the Claddagh fishermen, are too small to brave the perils to which they are exposed. Even the eurragh, or the boat of willow-work, sheathed with tarred linen, and of a size to carry 3 or 4 men, is said to be still occasionally in use. Both fishermen and agriculturists are a singularly unpolished, credulous, and neglected people. Their raiment is home-made, rude, and generally over-worn; their shoes or boots are a roughly formed fabric of untanned leather, called poppooties; and their whole costume indicates unacquaintance alike with modern civilization and with even the rude elements of luxury.

Arran is profuse in curious, antiquarian, traditional, mythological, and monastic associations. The largest island, often called by the peasantry of the adjacent mainland, Arran of the Saints or the Blessed, had at one time 10 small monasteries, and 10, or as some say, 13 churches; and the other islands had 5 churches and a Franciscan priory. A circular fort, called Dau-

Angus, constructed of uncemented stones, great in extent, and surmounting a cliff which overhangs the sea, appears to be a very ancient structure, yet can hardly, as the peasantry and even graver parties credulously allege, be the erection of some chieftain of the name of Angus, who flourished before the Christian era, during the reign of a pretended Mauda, queen of Connaught. Baths, druidical temples, altars, stone pillars, sacred mounts, holy wells, holy beds, holy groves, and kindred objects, are so numerous as to have rendered the islands, in the estimation of the Catholic peasantry, quite a region of thaumaturgy. It is quite astonishing with what enthusiasm these consecrated places by legend are still visited by thousands. These devotees shrink from no privation and hardship in their pilgrimage; and happy is he who carries upon his person 'a holy stone' from some of the sacred places as a talisman against evil. The inhabitants long fancied that they could see from their coasts the Hy-Brasil, or 'Enchanted Island,' the paradise of the ancient Irish; and the peasantry of the adjacent mainland still regard Arran itself as possessing some properties higher almost than paradisaic, yet so intimately connected with a profession of the Roman Catholic faith as to be forbidden subjects of our notice. The islands have for centuries had the reputation also of being inimical to the life of mice, and the putrefaction of human bodies. "There is in the west of Connaught," says Giraldus Cambrensis, "an island placed in the sea, called Aren, to which St. Brendon had often recourse. The dead bodies need not be graveled, for the ayre is so pure that the contagion of any carrion may not infect it: there may the son see his father, his grandfather, and his great-grandfather, &c., &c. This island is enemy to mice; for none is brought thither; for either it leapteth into the sea, or else being stayed it dyeth presently." St. Enna or St. Ende, as well as St. Brendon, is said to have made Arran a favourite resort. One very absurd tradition of the islands asserts that a native, called Conubhar-Mac-an-Eigh, or 'Connor the King's son,' killed beef in his own house every Christmas for 180 years, and that he died in 1580 at the age of 220 years.

The ancient sovereign lords of Arran were O'Briens, descendants of the celebrated Brian Boromh; and they held, at the same time, the territory of Tromra, in the county of Clare. The corporation of the town of Galway stated, in an address to Queen Elizabeth, that they paid the O'Briens of Arran a tribute of wine for guarding Galway bay against pirates and coast plunderers. "This address," says Mr. Hardiman, "was signed on 30th March, 1588, by John Blake, the mayor, and Walter Martin and Anthony Kirrivan, bailiffs, and countersigned by Anthony Dermot, notary, whereby they testify to Queen Elizabeth, in favour of Murrough MacTurlough O'Brien, then living, that the MacTiegies of Arran, his ancestors, were, under her Majesty and her predecessors, the temporal captains or lords of the islands of Arran, and their territories and hereditaments elsewhere, under the name of MacTiege O'Brien of Arran, time out of man's memory; and that they had seen the said Murrough MacTurlough authorized by all his sept, as chief of that name, and in possession of the premises as his own lawful inheritance, as more at large, say they, doth appear in our books of records, wherein he continued, until of late he was, by the usurping power of the O'Flaherties, expelled, from whom it is taken by some inquest found in her Majesty's favour. 'We say, moreover,' add they, 'that the sept of MacTiege O'Brien of Arran, since the foundation of this city and town, were aiding and assisting to ourselves and our predecessors against her Majesty's and her predecessors' enemies, in all times and places whereunto they were called, as true, faithful, and liege people to the crowns of England, to maintain, succour, and assist the town.' The islands are now the property of John W. Digby, Esq.—This barony contains the whole of the parishes of Arranmore or Iunismore, Innishere, and Ennismain. Area, 11,288 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,191; in 1841, 3,520. Houses 598. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 440; in manufactures and trade, 160; in other pursuits, 42. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 173; who could read but not write, 134; who could neither read nor write, 1,178. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 71; who could read but not write, 69; who could neither read nor write, 1,349. Arran gives the title of Earl, in the Irish peerage, to the noble family of Gore.

ARRANMORE, or IUNISMORE, the largest of the islands, and a parish, in the insular barony of Arran, just described, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the villages of KILLANY and KILRONAN: see these articles. Length, 61 miles; breadth, 14; area, 7,635 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,315; in 1841, 2,592. Houses 451. Pop. of the rural districts in 1841, 1,364. Houses 224. The island extends from east-south-east to west-north-west. Its south side is precipitous, grandly bold, an almost straight line of unindented mural limestone bulwark. The north side is low, fringed with a shingly beach, and deeply indented by two bays or natural harbours. The cliffs of the south are not more bold than romantic, are frequented by clouds of the sea-fowl called puffins, and are curiously perforated with holes, in which the puffins nestle, and whence the islanders supply themselves in seasons of scarcity with the eggs of the fowls for food. Other curiosities are Kilmurry fort, Great Kevin's Head, and the objects noticed in the preceding article. The highest ground in the island appears to rise less than 400 feet above sea-level. Good oats are raised; sheep are pastured; and oxen of an esteemed kind are reared. The chief residence is the seat of John W. Digby, Esq. A lighthouse in the centre of the island exhibits a revolving light of a bright colour; and, including the cost of building stores, occasioned in 1840 an expense of £880 18s. 4d. On the island are 2 villages, 8 hamlets, and a station of the coast-guard. The bay north from the village of Killany, named after it, separated by a peninsula from St. Gregory's Sound, and partly covered by an islet called Straw Island, is the principal harbour, not only in Arranmore, but in the whole Arran group. Outward-bound ships, from Liverpool to the West Indies and America, are frequently driven toward this harbour, and would find it a valuable retreat were the entrance to the sheltering part of it widened, and a pier suitable for large vessels provided. The entrance is by the west side of Straw Island; and though deep, is exceedingly narrow and somewhat dangerous; yet could it, is said, be widened for the trivial expense of £300.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Tuam; and forms part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £6 13s. 8d., and the rectorial for £20 1s. 0d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the Rev. John Digby. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 400 to 600, and has one officiate. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 2,077; and 4 day-schools, at Killany, Kilronan, Kilmurvey, and Coorrough, were attended by from 160 to 230 scholars.

ARRANMORE, or NORTH ARRAN, an island in the parish of Templecroan, barony of Boyleagh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It lies 14 mile west of Arteen Point, in the Rosses, 8 miles north by east of Daurus Head, less than a mile west of Rutland Island, and 3 miles south-west of Cruit Island. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,335 statute acres. Pop., about 1,000. The surface is rolling and hilly, and sends up a summit to the altitude of 745 feet above sea-level. Only about 650 acres are in tillage and pasture; all the remainder being rock and bog. Ironstone and manganese abound. Subdivision of land among tenants and cottiers descends to even "a cow's foot," or the quarter of a cow's grass. The northern and western shores are steep inaccessible cliffs; but the east coast has several marine indentations capable of being cheaply improved into snug little fishing harbours. The side of a ledge of rough rocks in one place might, at a small expense, be cut into a good landing-place, and would, says Mr. Nimmo, "be indestructible." An opening at Skaitaling, though shallow, is a good boat harbour in northerly swells; it is flanked on the south by a long ledge or reef; and it could be thoroughly improved at an expense of only £70. A creek at Leaburg, near the anchorage called Arran Road and to leeward, requires a small pier along a ledge of slate rock; it could be provided with one at the cost of about £450; and it would then shelter the boats of the north end of the island, and enable small vessels to discharge. A little sandy bay, called the Tent, and situated between Skaitaling and Leaburg, is nearly enclosed by rocks, could at small cost be made quiet in all winds, and, though very shallow, would be a good place for laying up boats. The inhabitants pursue the fishery with more zeal than any other persons on the Donegal coast; and they have many currachs and yawls, but no boats fit for going outside of the Sound. A lighthouse on the island exhibits a fixed bright light; and, in 1840, cost £74 13s. 8d.

ARROW, or ARVA, a lake in the barony of Tiraghbrill, co. Sligo, Connaught. It commences within a mile of the boundary with co. Roscommon, and extends north-north-westward to a point 8½ miles from Colcooney. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 5,120 acres. Its shores are jagged, sinuous, and intricate; its bosom is all over studded with islets; and its scenery, though scarcely brilliant or imposing, possesses many features of beauty. Along its west shore winds the highway from Dublin to Sligo, by way of Boyle; and this road, just after passing the watershed between the counties, and while running down the Sligo side of the descent, commands a fine view of the lake and its basin, with the Sligo and Leitrim hills in the perspective. On the road and near the lake are the village and castle of Ballinacree; between the road and the lake is Hollybrook, the charmingly situated mansion of John Ffolliott, Esq.; and on the lake's east shore are the ruins of Ballinadown Abbey, a structure founded by the McDonoughs, in 1427, for Dominican nuns.

ARROW, ARVA, or UNICION (The), a river of co. Sligo, Ulster. It issues from the lake just described, and pursues a north-north-westerly, yet in part a sinuous, course of about 10 miles, to a confluence with the Owenbeg in the vicinity of Colcooney. Over about one-half of its length it runs in Tiraghbrill; and over the remainder, it divides that barony from Corran.

ARTANE, or ARTAINE, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 954 acres. Pop., in 1831, 583; in 1841, 367. Houses 59. The land is of excellent quality. The hamlet of Artane has a pleasant appearance, and occupies an agreeable site, near the northern shore of Dublin bay, about 2½ miles from Dublin-castle. A castle which stood at the hamlet about 17 years ago, and was then in habitable repair, was long the seat of the Dorellans of Ravensdale. John Allen, or Alan, Archbishop of Dublin, having provoked the ire of the house of Kildare, by advocating the measures of Cardinal Wolsey, attempted to flee to England, and was shipwrecked near Clontarf, captured, carried before Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, then with the antagonist army at Artane, questioned respecting the object of his attempted flight, and ordered to be taken "out of his lordship's sight." His captors, misconceiving the order for his removal to be a mandate for his death, hurried him into the hall of Artane-castle, and tragically deprived him of life. At the commencement of the civil war of 1641, Luke Notterville, son to Lord Notterville, and one of the Roman Catholic leaders, at the head of a body of royalists, seized and garrisoned this fortalice. The manor of Artane was for many ages the property of the family of Holywood. In the 13th century, John Holywood, or De Sacrobosco, a member of this family, was a distinguished mathematician and philosopher, and in the reign of Edward III., R. Holywood, another member of it, was a baron of the exchequer. A tombstone of the family, erected in the cemetery in 1713, is a fragmentary and simple monument, with an escutcheon, representing a chevron engrailed between three pigeons, and a pigeon the crest.—This parish is a chapelry in the dio. of Dublin, and forms part of the benefice of Finglass, appropriated to the chancellorship of the cathedral of St. Patrick. Its ecclesiastical statistics are all mixed up with those of FINGGLASS; which see. The church was small, and has for many years been a ruin. A boys' and girls' school are salaried with respectively £13 15s. and £11 from the National Board; and, in 1840, had on their books 70 boys and 59 girls.

ARTHUR'S FERRY, a ferry on the river Shannon, between the parish of Kilquinn, co. Clare, and that of St. Patrick, co. Limerick, Munster. It occurs at the termination of the canal from Limerick, a little above the island called Illan-arone. The Commissioners for the Improvement of the river Shannon proposed to build between the ferry and Illan-arone, a weir for the purpose of keeping up the water in summer to a proper level, for the free navigation of the Limerick canal. "When this weir is erected," says the Report, "a much greater mill-power will be obtained at the city of Limerick. Estimate, £7,600."

ARTIURSTOWN, a village in the parish of St. James, barony of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on Waterford Harbour, between Duncannon Fort and Ballyhack, 3 miles below the confluence of the Barrow and the Suir. Its site and the circumjacent estate are the property of Arthur, Lord Templemore; and from him the place has its name. A pier of excellent construction was, a few years ago, completed at the village; and is likely to be very useful for export and import trade. Good roads connect it and the village with an extensive district. The cost of the pier was £1,500; and of this £810 was granted by government, and £750 contributed by Lord Templemore. A fever hospital in the village contains 27 beds, is very efficiently conducted, and has been a most valuable means of preserving life and preventing the extension of fever. In 1840, its receipts amounted to £69 14s. 3d., and its expenditure to £158 4s. 7½d.; and it had 203 intern patients, all of whom were from within a distance of 5 miles. A dispensary at the place serves for a district containing a population of about 10,000; and, in 1840, it received £100 4s., expended £119 3s. 0½d., and made 903 dispensations of medicine. Area, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 170; in 1841, 285. Houses 48.

ARTICLAVE. See ARDECLEAVE.

ARTRAMONT, or ARDRAMONT, a parish in the barony of East Shelmallee, 4 miles north of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,377 acres. Pop., in 1831, 661; in 1841, 754. Houses 135. The surface is drained southward, and much beautified by the river Sow; and declines in the direction of the stream to the vicinity of that expansion of the estuary of the Slaney, or of Wexford Harbour, at the head of which stands the village of Castlebridge. The land is of very good quality, and extensively wooded. The charmingly-situated demesne and handsome seat of Artramont, the property of George Le Hunt, Esq., adjoin Castlebridge, and are much adorned by the natural and the cultivated beauties of the Sow. The parish is traversed northward by the road from Wexford to Dublin, by way of Oulart. The Artramont estate was given by Oliver Cromwell to the ancestor of the Le Hunts, Colonel Le Hunt, whose commission as captain of the Protector's body-guard is still in the possession of the family. Under Artramont mansion, among some aged cedars of Lebanon, exists a moss-covered donjon,—the sole relic of the fortress of the Roches, formerly lords of Roche's Land. "A barrowing tale," says Mrs. Hall, "known as Roche's Revenge, is told of one of the chieftains of that line,—Wat Reoch, Walter the Rough, as he was called. He had suffered by the depredations of a neighbouring Irish leader of 'kerne,' named O'Morroo, who ruled the adjacent territory, still known as the O'Morroo's country. Wat gave him warning that the next forty should be the last; and he surprised and captured the freebooter in the act of recrossing the river with the prey. The moon was high, the tide low; and as Wat Reoch observed the long bank of slime left bare by the receding waters, a horrid idea of retribution entered his mind. It was effected on the spot, and at the instant. A strong stake was procured, and fixed upright on the margin of the stream [the Slaney] at low watermark. To this the captive was bound; one arm pinioned behind him, the other left free, and provided with a loaf of bread. In this situation he was left. For several successive tides, Wat Reoch watched his living victim from the windows of his tower, none covering him higher than the breast. At length the flood tide came! One button after another on his jerkin disappeared beneath the water, which at last reached his chin, and soon closed over his head for ever."—Artramont parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ferns; and forms part of the benefice of ARDCOLME: which see. Tithe composition, £184 11s. 7½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 74, and the Roman Catholics to 600; and a daily school, aided with £20 and important additional emoluments, was attended by 59 boys and 32 girls.

ARUNDEL-MILLS, a village in the parishes of Dysert and Templemalus, barony of Ibane and Barryroe, co. Cork, Munster. Area of the Dysert section, 4 acres. Pop., in 1841, 197. Houses 46. Area of the Templemalus section, 3 acres. Pop., in 1841, 91. Houses 17.

ARVA, co. Sligo. See ARROW.

ARVA, or ARVACH, a quoad sacra parish, and a village in the quoad civilia parish of Killeshandra, barony of Tullaghonohy, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 6,988 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,580. About 566 acres are pastoral upland; 161 acres are bog, and nearly all subservient to the supply of fuel; and the remainder of the area is a strong clayey land, for the most part wheat-bearing, and everywhere productive of excellent oats and potato crops. Around the village of Arva is a chain of small lakes, the shores of which have been planted by the proprietor, the Earl of Gosford. The village is situated on the south-west border of the county, about 2 miles north-north-west of Lough Gouna, 3 north of Scrabby, and 8 south-south-west of Killeshandra. In 1840, a dispensary here received £54 19s., expended £56 9s. 6d., and made 611 dispensations of medicine. Area of the village, 25 acres. Pop., in 1831, 422; in 1841, 615. Houses 101.—Arva parish is a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Kilmorc. Gross income, £98 2s.; nett, £92 6s. 7½d. Patron, the incumbent of Killeshandra. An assistant curate has a salary of £75. The church was built, in 1821, by means of a grant of £738 9s. 2½d., and a loan of £92 6s. 1½d. from the late Board of First Fruits; and enlarged, in 1827, by means of a loan of £400 from that Board. Sittings 400; attendance 300. The Roman Catholic chapel at Corranee, is attended by 600 persons, and served by 3 officiates who belong to the parish of Killeshandra. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,833 Churchmen, 97 Presbyterians, and 2,889 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools were attended by 334 children; and 6 daily schools, at Arva, Derna-winkle, Castlepoles, and Drumbahill, had on their books 233 boys and 272 girls. One of the daily schools was aided with £12 from subscription, and £7 from the Association for Discourteasing Vice; one with £13 from the London Hibernian Ladies' Society; one with £3 3s. from subscription; and the second and third of these, and also a fourth, with a gratuity from the London Hibernian Society proportioned to the proficiency of pupils.

ASHBOURNE, a small post-town in the parish of Killeglend, barony of Ratoath, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands on the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry, 10 miles north-north-west of Dublin, 12 south by east of Slane, and 13 south-south-west of Drogheda. The proprietor is Frederick Bourne, Esq., to whom and his brothers the public are highly indebted for improvements in roads and conveyances. The town is washed by a rivulet which falls into the sea near Swords, and it has several small retail shops, and 2 inns and posting-houses. West of the town is an old quadrangular building dignified with the name of Ashbourne Castle; and adjacent to it is an occasionally used, and sometimes crowdedly attended race-course. The town was founded so late as about the year 1823. Area, 34 acres. Pop., in 1831, 473; in 1841, 375. Houses 50.

ASHFIELD, a seat and property in the vicinity of the town of Castleblakeney, co. Galway, Connaught. The seat is encompassed with some wood about ¼ of a mile west of the town. A belt of bogs, which describes the segment of a circle from the vicinity of Ashfield-house to a point 1½ mile north-east of Clonbrock-house, contains an area of 3,280 English acres. The belt is about 4½ miles in length, extends chiefly along the margins of the nascent Ahascragh river, and, excepting a small piece at the east end, lies on the south-west side of the road from Ballinasloe to Castleblakeney. It consists of Ashfield bog on the west, Clonpee bog in the middle, and Clonbrock bog on the east. "These bogs," says Mr. Griffith, in the 4th Report of the Commissioners on Irish Bogs, published in 1814—"These bogs do not form one continued mass of red bog, but are connected together by intervening tracts of black bog. * * If the improvement of the river Ahascragh were effected, there would be no difficulty in draining, not only the whole of the red bog, but, what is much more important, the great tract of black bog near Ashfield and Kinclare, which, between Ashfield and Clonpee bridge, amounts to 680 Irish, or 1,101 English acres, the greater part of which might be irrigated with advantage." Average depth of the bogs, 23 feet; area of the red heath bog, 2,178 English acres; estimated cost of reclaiming the whole of the bogs, £3,421 16s. 7d. Irish.

ASHFIELD, a quoad sacra parish, within the quoad civilia parish of Killersherdiny, in the north of the barony of Tullaghgarvey, and in the vicinity of the town of Cootehill, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 4,535½ acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,010. About 243 acres are unprofitable; and the rest of the land is of middle-rate quality. The surface is drained westward by the Cootehill river, and traversed northward by the road from Dublin to Clones. About a mile from Cootehill is Ashfield Lodge, the seat of Col. Henry Clements. The only village is CLEMENTSTOWN: which see.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Gross income, £122 8s.; nett, £108 10s. Patron, the incumbent of Killersherdiny. The late Board of First Fruits gave, about the year 1796, £461 10s. 9d. for building the church; and lent in 1820, £230 15s. 4½d. for the erection of a spire. Sittings in the church 300; attendance 200. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600, and is served by two officiates, who belong to the parish of Killersherdiny. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,385 Churchmen, 208 Presbyterians, 16 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,315 Roman Catholics; and 5 daily schools, at Ashfield, Dooburric, Drummurry, Cortobber, and Littermore, had on their books 240 boys and 177 girls. One of the schools was connected with the Kildare-street Society, and another was aided with £10 and other advantages from subscription, and £8 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice.

ASHFORD, a seat of Lord Oranmore, in the parish of Cong, barony of Kilmalin, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands at the head of Lough Corrib, in the vicinity of the town of Cong.

ASHFORD, a hamlet in the parish of Killeedy, barony of Glenquin, co. Limerick, Munster. A Roman Catholic chapel here has an attendance of about 550. In 1840, the dispensary of Ashford and Broadford, under the Newcastle Poor-law union, received £147 6s., expended £158, had recommended to it 1,733 patients, and served for a district with about 7,000 inhabitants. Pop. returned with the parish.

ASHFORD, a hamlet and the site of a post-office, in the parish of Rathnew, barony of New-castle, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the road between Dublin and Wexford, 8 miles from Rathdrum, 4½ from Newtown-mount-Kennedy, and 22 from Dublin. It occupies a pleasant site on the Vartry, and has a good inn. In its immediate vicinity stands Rossana, the handsome seat of Daniel Tighe, Esq., and formerly the occasional retreat of the authoress of Psyche. Rossana park boasts some of the noblest oaks and Spanish chestnuts in the county. Pop. returned with the parish.

ASIGH. See ASSEY.

ASKEATON (THE), a name of the co. Limerick river DEEL: which see.

ASKEATON, a parish on the north-east border of the barony of Lower Connello, and containing the ancient town of Askeaton, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 6,521 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,699; in 1841, 4,438. Houses 671. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,184; in 1841, 2,576. Houses 387. The surface declines northward down the course of the Deel or Askeaton river to the Shannon; and, though quite destitute of the features which give force and high character to landscape, presents some softly agreeable scenes, and a few mimic groupings of romance. The Deel, above the town, leaps and tumbles in cascades and cataracts among rocks, winds among finely outlined hills, or between precipitous and overhanging cliffs, and presents, in its frolics and costume, a succession of decidedly picturesque aspects. The land of the parish, though chiefly of limestone formation, is partly rocky and in general of only middle-rate quality. The parish is traversed westward by the north road from Limerick to Tarbert; and will be traversed in the same direction by the Shannon line of railway communication with Dublin. Antiquities will be noticed in connection with the town.—Askeaton parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Limerick. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £150, and the rectorial for £300; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Thomas Leland, Esq., of Dublin. This vicarage, the rectory of Lismakeery and the chapelry of Iverus, constitute the benefice of Askeaton. See LISMAKEERY and IVERUS. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 3. Gross income, £455 14s. 5d.; nett, £390 15s. 10½d. Patron, Sir Matthew Blackiston, Bart. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church is so ancient a structure that no record exists of the date and cost of its erection. Sittings 250; attendance, about 120. The school-house of Iverus is also used as a parochial place of worship. The Askeaton Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of between 1,000 and 1,500, and jointly with a chapel in Iverus, is served by 3 officiates. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 197, and the Roman Catholics to 3,815; the Protestants of the union to 341, and the Roman Catholics to 6,967. In the same year, 7 daily schools in the union, all situated in Askeaton parish, had on their books 249 boys and 113 girls. Two of the schools were aided each with £7 16s. from Archdeacon Fitzgerald; one, a female parochial school, with £14 from subscription and £8 from the Ladies' Hibernian Society; and one, a male parochial school, with £22 from subscription. In 1839, the National Board granted £160 toward the building and fitting up of a school for boys and another for girls, each of which was expected to have an attendance of 150.

ASKEATON, a market-town, the capital of the parish just described, and formerly a parliamentary borough, stands on the river Deel, 2½ miles above its confluence with the Shannon, 5 north-north-west of Rathkeale, 14 west-south-west of Limerick, and 15 east by north of Tarbert. Though anciently a large walled town, it is now a poor lumpish village; and though advantageously situated for trade, and an object of attention in the plans of at least two great national works of improvement, it does not seem to be moving from stagnancy and inertia. Only about 20 of its houses are slated; and the rest, of course, possess the cabin or hut character so prevalent in poor Irish towns. Yet some of the older and roofless houses retain a ghastly appearance of having once been respectable. The town has shared the fate of its ancient lords, the Desmonds. Its castle, built by the seventh Earl of Desmond, is a ponderous and splendid ruin, on a considerably high rock, insulated by the Deel, and immediately above the town. Its remains are 40 feet high, contain Desmond's gaoil and banquetting-room, and evince uncommon strength in union with fine architectural taste. Besides being fortified by its pinnaced site on the rock, and its encinurement with the divided stream of the Deel, it was surrounded by a lofty wall, and accessible only by a drawbridge. During the last Earl of Desmond's rebellion in 1580, when the King's forces, under Sir George Carew, were approaching Askeaton, the garrison of the castle, being unprovided to sustain a siege, placed a train of gunpowder within the walls, evacuated the place, fired the train, and blew up a considerable part of the building. The Earl, after three years of ceaseless warfare and various success, was driven from his castles, spoiled of his army, chased to the fastnesses of Kerry, and compelled to lie perdu in mean apparel, much distress, and almost total unattendance. Kelly of Moriarta eventually tracked the footsteps of a few kerns who had ventured to seize some cattle for the Earl's subsistence; he found the hunted and fallen noble lying languidly before a fire in a ruined house; he assailed him, wounded him, and drew from him the faint cry, "Spare me, I am the Earl of Desmond;" and, heedless of the appeal, he struck off the Earl's head, and carried it to the Earl of Ormonde, to be sent to Queen Elizabeth, and impaled on London bridge. Thus perished a family who, for four centuries, had shined with splendour and magnificence around them, and frequently measured swords with the supreme civil power of the country. The Earl's forfeited lands amounted to 574,028 Irish acres.—About 30 yards from the castle, the Deel is spanned by an old bridge of 9 arches. About $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile from the town, and on the east brink of the river, stand the ruins of Askeaton abbey. This pile was founded in 1420, by James, the seventh Earl of Desmond, for friars minorites; and, long after its dilapidation, it ranked as one of the finest ecclesiastical ruins in Ireland. The cloisters, which are the chief part now remaining, form a square arcade of about 160 feet; they are entirely composed of black marble; and they exhibit some beautiful and richly ornate chisellings.

Askeaton was constituted a borough by charter of 11 James I. The limits included only a small space round the edified area. The charter directed that the corporation should consist of a provost and 12 free burgesses; that the free burgesses should hold their office for life, and annually elect from among their own number the provost; that vacancies in the free burgess-ship should be filled up by the corporation from among "the better and more honest of the inhabitants;" that the provost might hold every Monday a court of record for the trial of all actions personal to the amount of 5 marks; and that the corporation, in prosecution of the chief object of their being constituted, should return two members to parliament. The borough, owing to the principle of self-election in its constitution, became at once a close borough; it continued to act as such till it was disfranchised at the Union; and it was then under "the patronage" of Lords Carrick and Massey. Of the sum of £15,000, which was awarded as compensation for the loss of its franchise, £6,580 was given to the Earl of Carrick, £6,580 to the trustees of the will of Hugh, Lord Massey, £1,100 to Sir Vere Hunt, Bart., and £200 to Sir Joseph Hoare, Bart. So extinct did the corporation become after the borough's disfranchisement, that the Commissioners on Municipal Corporations, when making inquiry a few years ago on the spot, could with difficulty obtain any evidence of its former existence. Power was given by James I. to Sir Francis Berkeley to hold in Askeaton weekly markets on Wednesday and Saturday, and a fair on 20th and 21st July. Fairs are now held on 30th July and 9th Oct. Some tolls which are collected are private property. A seneschal's court, whose officer was appointed by Sir Matthew Blackiston, lord of the manor of Askeaton, was held in the town till 12 or 14 years ago, and exercised jurisdiction to the amount of £10 Irish. A court of petty sessions superseded the seneschal's court, is held once a fortnight by two, three, or four county magistrates, and tries claims for labourers' wages, and cases of petty assault. When higher jurisdiction is required, recourse is had to the court of quarter sessions at Rathkeale. A party of the county constabulary are stationed in the town. A quay exists immediately below the bridge, on the right bank of the Deel, directly opposite the main body of the town; and a good landing-place, used by vessels, occurs on the left bank, half-a-mile below the town. The river is at present navigable for small vessels at high water up to the quay; but owing to the interruption of a ledge of rock, which crosses the river's channel a short distance below the quay, the Commissioners for the Improvement of the Shannon Navigation recommended the construction of a wharf at Corthasoothera, the landing-place just noticed, and the site of a quondam, but ruinous pier, on the left bank. The wharf, say the Commissioners, will cost £900, and will need to be connected with the town by means of a branch road. See DEEL. The Shannon line of railway, as projected by the Railway Commissioners, touches Askeaton, and while passing the town, as well as over a distance of 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles between Ballyroque and Fannamore, has a gradient of 1 in 660. The town, at present 13 hours and 33 minutes distance from Dublin, will be brought by railway time, within 5 hours and 35 minutes. Its only public conveyances, in 1838, were a caravan and a car in transit from Limerick, the former to Shangolden, and the latter to Tralee. In 1840, a dispensary in Askeaton received £113 4s., expended £110 3s., and administered to 1,500 patients. Area of the town, 56 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,515; in 1841, 1,862. Houses 284.

ASSEY, ASIGH, or ATHSY, a parish in the barony of Lower Dece, and in the valley of the Boyne, 4 miles south of Navan, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 1,218 acres. Pop., in 1831, 108; in 1841, 138. Houses 17. The land is in general good. On the banks of the Boyne stand the ruins of the old castle of Assey. Much embellishment is borrowed from Bective demesne, which lies along the opposite side of the river.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £62 15s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Assey and Balsoon rectories [see BALS00N] constitute the benefice of Assey. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$. Gross income, £137 12s. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; nett, £115 14s. 2 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Patron, the Crown. The churches of both parishes are ruins in the midst of cemeteries. The union has at present neither glebe-house, church, chapel, nor school. The incumbent of Kilmessan, whose church is only $\frac{1}{4}$ mile distant, and to whose benefice Assey and Balsoon were formerly united, performs occasional duties, and receives, in compensation, the annual sum of £10. In 1834, the Protestants of Assey parish amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 107; the Protestants of the union to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 420.

ATHASSEL, or RELICKMURRY, a parish, 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles west of Cashel, and partly in the barony of Middlethird, but chiefly in that of Clanwilliam, co. Tipperary, Munster. The Clanwilliam section contains the villages of GOLDEN and THOMASTOWN; which see. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{4}$; area, 12,770 acres,—of which 562 acres are in Middlethird. Pop., in 1831, 6,801; in 1841, 5,431. Houses 784. Pop. of the Middlethird section, in 1841, 200.

Houses 28. Pop. of the rural districts of the Clanwilliam section, in 1841, 4,490. Houses 650. The land is in general good, and in some places prime. The surface lies along the bottom of the luxuriant valley of the Suir, and is traversed westward by the road from Cashel to Tipperary. About the year 1200, a priory was founded at the hamlet of Athassel by William Fitz Adelm de Burke, for canons regular of the order of St. Augustine, and dedicated to Edmund the Martyr. The founder was steward to Henry II.; after the king's return from Ireland, he was intrusted with the management of Irish affairs; and dying about the year 1204, he was buried at Athassel. The De Burgos, who were his lineal descendants, bestowed ample possessions upon his favourite priory, and contributed to it many decorations. Richard the Red, Earl of Ulster, after entertaining the assembly of nobility at Kilkenny in 1326, retired to this priory, and shortly afterwards died within its walls. The ruins of the edifice are still extensive, and indicate its former magnitude and splendour. The choir measured 44 feet by 26; the nave, of the same breadth as the choir, and supported by lateral aisles, was externally 117 feet in length; the tower was square and lofty; and the cloisters were extensive. A tolerable view of the ruins from the north-west, and exhibiting the dilapidated tower, the roofless nave, the cloisters, and a roofless chapel in the south-west corner, is given by Dr. Ledwich, in his Antiquities of Ireland. "We cannot," says that antiquary, "behold the numerous arches, walls, windows, and heaps of masonry promiscuously mixed in one common ruin, without saying with Ovid—

Et subito casu, quo valeat, ruunt.'*

Athassel village was twice burned by an armed force. The parish of Athassel and the parish of Relickmurry, or Religmurry, were at one time distinct. At present, however, they are so united, or rather blended, that two of our highest or final authorities designate them 'the parish of Athassel and Relickmurry,' another 'the parish of Athassel, or Relickmurry,' and another 'the parish of Religmurry.'—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £550. Yet the tithes of three townlands, the value of which is not reported, are inappropriate, and held under lease from the vicars choral of St. Patrick's, Cashel. Athassel rectory, jointly with the rectories of BALLYGRIFFIN and DANGANDANGAN [which see] constitute the benefice of Athassel. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2½. Gross income, £886 8s. 7d.; nett, £684 9s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1808, by parochial assessment, at a cost not known; and a tower was added in 1815 by means of a loan of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 180; attendance 80. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,450, and shares with the chapel of Kilfeacle the care of two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 209, and the Roman Catholics to 5,567; the Protestants of the union to 215, and the Roman Catholics to 7,375; and the daily schools of the union to 7; attended by 296 boys, and 184 girls. Six of the schools were in Athassel parish; and one of these was aided with free school-house, dwelling-house, 2 acres of land, and £10 a-year from Lady Elizabeth Matthews.

ATHBOY (THE), a rivulet of the co. Meath, Leinster. It rises near Crosskeys in the barony of Demifore, and runs an easterly and south-easterly course of 13 miles past the town of Athboy to the Boyne, at a point 2½ miles above Trim.

ATHBOY, a parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Lunc, co. Meath, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 11,884 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,317; in 1841, 5,365. Houses 912. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,358; in 1841, 3,539. Houses 005. The surface is drained by the Athboy rivulet, and consists for the most part of excellent land. Athboy Lodge, the seat of Sir Francis Hopkins, Bart., and also Danson's Court, adjoin the town.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £200, and the rectorial for £360; and the latter are appropriated to the primary, and held under lease from the primate. The parishes of GIRLEY, KILDALKEY, MOYAGHER, and RATHMORE [see these articles], are united to this vicarage to form the benefice of Athboy. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 11. Gross income, £509 8s. 1d.; nett, £432 8s. Patron, rotatively the Crown, the primate, and the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £80, and resides with the incumbent. The church is so old that the cost and date of its erection are unknown, and so inconvenient, that many of the parishioners are excluded. Sittings 300; attendance 350. The Athboy Roman Catholic chapel has two officiates, and an attendance of 3,000. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Girley and Kildalkey. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 333, and the Roman Catholics to 5,158; the Protestants of the union to 500, and the Roman Catholics to 11,214. In the same year, 6 daily schools in the parish had on their books 260 boys and 142 girls; and these, with 4 other schools in the union, had 502 boys and 294 girls. One of the Athboy schools was a girls' free-school, supported with £3 3s. a-year, and the proceeds of the sale of gloves, for making which the girls were paid; another was a free-school for both sexes, supported by £40 Irish from Lord Darnley; and another was aided with £12 a-year from the National Board. In 1840, five schools were aided by the National Board; a boys' school and a girls' school in the town, each with £15; a school at Fraime with £12; and schools at Rathcarne and Balrath, each with £1 6s. 2d.

ATHBOY, a market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, stands in the parish just described, and on the Athboy river, 6 miles north-west of Trim, and 28½ north-west by west of Dublin. It consists principally of one long street; and has only about 30 houses of the annual value of £10 and upwards. It is a poor place, and does not seem to be improving. An extensive flour-mill in the town obtains its supplies of corn from the surrounding farmers and from Navan. Though a weekly market and annual cattle fairs are well attended, there is no market for grain. The weekly market is held on Thursday, and the fairs on May 4th, Aug. 6th, and Nov. 7th. A number of resident dealers in corn and pigs make their sales in Navan. In 1828, a caravan travelled between the town and Dublin. The Earl of Darnley, on whose estate the town is situated, supports a small widows' almshouse. In 1839–40, a dispensary here received £114 7s., expended £127 16s., administered to 1,692 patients, and served for a district of 23,844 acres, with a pop. of 8,530. In 1842, the Athboy Loan Fund had a capital of £404; circulated £483 in 178 loans; and cleared a nett profit of 19s. 5d.—Athboy appears to have been a borough by prescription; and it had charters or kindred documents of 9 Henry IV., 24 Henry VI., 2 Edward IV., 7 and 9 James I., and 5 James II. The charter of 9 James I., which appears to have been the governing one, describes the borough limits as extending "one mile beyond the town in every direction;" vested the right of electing the portreeve in the majority of the burgesses and freemen, and that of electing the burgesses and all inferior officers in the corporation.

at large; appointed the portreeve to be the sole justice-of-peace within the borough; and gave power to hold a court of record, with jurisdiction to £10. The corporation seems to have been kept up, not with the object of exercising any municipal rights, but solely for the purpose of returning two members to parliament; and the Earls of Darnley were their "patrons," and received for their private use the whole of the sum of £15,000 which was granted at the Union as compensation for disfranchisement. The corporation has for years been extinct. A court of petty-sessions, presided over by the county magistrates, is held every Thursday. A manor court, erected by patent of 6 William and Mary, has not been held since 1800. A chief constable, and a posse of the county police, are stationed in the town. The nearest prison is the county gaol at Trim. Tolls and customs, claimed as the private property of the Darnley family, were collected till 1823, but were then resisted and abandoned.—In 1317, a Carmelite friary was built or refounded in Athboy; in 1325 and 1467, it was the meeting-place of chapters of the Carmelite order; and in the 31st year of Henry VIII., it was dissolved. Area of the town, 80 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,959; in 1841, 1,826. Houses 307.

ATHBURY. See BLACKWATERTOWN.

ATHCARNE, or ARDCARNE CASTLE, an interesting old mansion on the Nanny Water, co. Meath, Leinster. It stands about 5 miles from Drogheda, on the new road from that town to Dublin, by way of Duleek and Ashbourne. The structure is one of the best Irish specimens of the Elizabethan style of architecture, and, till lately, preserved unchanged its original character and form. It consists, not only of an extensive dwelling-house, numerous in parts, and various in breadth, height, and position, but of a lofty, massive, very broad, battlemented, and turreted tower; and presents, from every point of view, a picturesque variety of outline rarely if ever to be found in modern domestic architecture. On one of the walls are remains of armorial bearings, and the initials and date, "W. B. J. D., 1590;" the latter indicating that the structure was erected, in 1590, for William Bathe and Janet Dowdal. William Bathe was a descendant of the Knightstown family, a person of much distinction, and the ancestor of the De Bathe, Barons, who, for some time, figured prominently in Meath. Athcarne-castle is now the residence of G. J. Gernon, Esq.

ATHEA, or ATTEA, a Highland village in the parish of Rathronan, barony of Shanid, co. Limerick, Munster. It is washed by the nascent Galy river, and stands on the direct or mountain road between Rathkeale and Listowel, about 7 miles west of Newcastle. It has a branch of the Abbeyfeale dispensary. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1841, 215. Houses 34.

ATHEA, a Roman catholic parish, including the above village, in the dio of Limerick. Post town, Newcastle. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

ATHENEASY. See ATHNASSEY.

ATHENRY—pronounced Athénry—a barony, in co. Galway, Connaught. It is bounded on the north-west by Clare; on the north by Tyaquin and Kilconnel; on the north-east by Clonmacnoo; on the south-east by Leitrim; on the south by Leitrim, Loughrea, and Dunkellin; and on the west by Dunkellin and Clare. Its length, from east to west, is 20 miles; its extreme breadth, not far from the west end, is 8; but its breadth, over the eastern half of its length, averages only about 1½. It contains no entire parish, but consists of parts of the parishes of Athenry, Kilconneran, Kilconickney, Killymore-Daly, Kiltullagh, and Lickerrig. By act of 6 and 7 William IV., the whole of the parish of Kilrickill, seven townlands in the parish of Abbeygormagh, and two townlands in the parish of Killoeran, were transferred from the barony of Athenry to that of Leitrim, and one townland in the parish of Kilconickney was transferred to the barony of Loughrea. Area of the barony of Athenry as now constituted, 25,782 acres. Pop., in 1831, 9,444; in 1841, 8,179. Houses 1,385. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,062; in manufactures and trade, 253; in other pursuits, 143. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 805; who could read but not write, 340; who could neither read nor write, 2,409. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 435; who could read but not write, 393; who could neither read nor write, 2,826.

ATHENRY, a parish in the baronies of Athenry, Clare, and Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. The Athenry section contains the town of ATHENRY; see next article. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 6; area, 24,852 acres. Pop., in 1841, 5,988. Houses 1,094. Area of the Athenry section, 13,198 acres; of the Clare section, 8,797 acres; of the Dunkellin section, 2,955 acres. Pop. in 1841, of the Clare section, 1,277; of the Dunkellin section, 520; of the rural districts of the Athenry section, 2,596. Houses in these three respectively, 222, 86, and 494. The pop. returns of 1831 mix up with the parish of Athenry the whole of the parish of Monivae, lying in the baronies of Clare, Kilconnel, and Tyaquin, and exhibit the pop. of Athenry at 12,580; and the documents of subsequent years, which give the statistics of the ecclesiastical parish, exhibit its area at 30,000 acres, and its pop., in 1831, at 7,068. See MONIVAE. The land in general is of indifferent quality, and averages in value about 15s. per plantation acre. The surface, though varied, is partly bleak, and nowhere very marked in feature. Near the town are the mansions of Castle-Lambert, Castle-Ellen, and Rockfield.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Tuam. The composition and gross income, £1,067 10s.; nett, £902 15s. 9d. Patron, alternately the Crown and the diocesan. The incumbent is non-resident. A curate has a salary of £69 4s. 7d., and the use of a small walled garden. The church was built, in 1828, by means of a loan of £1,384 12s. 3d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 80 to 90. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by about 2,000 persons, and has an officiate for itself. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 170, and the Roman Catholics to 7,454; and 5 daily schools, one of which received £3 3s. from the rector, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, had on their books 180 boys and 117 girls.

ATHENRY, one of the most ancient towns in Connaught, a market town, the capital of the cognominal parish and barony, and formerly a parliamentary borough, stands on the road between Galway and Ballinasloe, by way of Kilconnel, 11 miles east of Galway, and 18½ west of Ballinasloe. Though relics of its former importance still exist, and the business of its markets and fairs has lately increased, it wears a very desolate aspect, and affords small promise of any material improvement. Only about 20 houses pay from £10 to £20 of rent. A gateway and some portions of a wall which was built round the town, are still in existence. Portions also of the castle of the Lords De Bermingham remain. A splendid Dominican friary was founded in the 13th century, and was destroyed by accidental fire in the 15th. The great east window and some other relics of the pile, still standing, show it to have been a fine specimen of architecture. A military barrack encloses in its yard the site of the cloisters, and was principally constructed with materials from the monastic buildings.

Ptolemy, after having described the northern coasts of Ireland, and proceeded to notice the western, mentions a people called Auterii, and calls their chief town Nagmata αὐτῶν πόλις, "Nagmata, an illustrious city." Ware, whose opinions on Irish antiquities are entitled to respect, thinks that the Auterii inhabited the territory which now constitutes the counties of Galway and Roscommon, and argues, with much probability, that the town of Athenry, commonly called in Irish Ath-an-righ or Aitanri, was Nagmata, the capital of the Auterii. In the 13th century, the town, if not commenced, was in a sense refounded, or was principally built, and received the proud accession of a strong castle, by a colony of English under the family of De Bermingham. In the 4th year of Edward II., a murage charter, or royal grant of power to collect money towards walling and fortifying the town, was given "to the bailiffs and honest men of Athenry;" and on the roll which contains it appears a mandate, to prevent war between Richard de Burgo and O'Brien of Thomond. In 1315, Richard de Bermingham, the fourth baron of Athenry, along with Sir William Leigh de Burgh, led an army against Fedhlim O'Connor, then the chief of his name, the ally of Edward Bruce of Scotland, the pretender to independent sovereignty, and the invader, in connexion with Bruce, of the province of Connaught. Fedhlim was encountered near the town of Athenry, slain on the field, and so utterly destroyed that 8,000 of his men are said to have lain hors de combat beside him, while his power and his great ancestral name perished. Athenry is recorded to have acquired strength and prosperity from the event and spoils of the battle; Richard de Bermingham, its master, and the victor in the field, was the fourth baron in descent from William de Bermingham, who accompanied Strongbow to Ireland; and in consequence of his conquering the kings of Connaught and Manaoch, slaying many of the Connaught and Munster chieftains, and achieving victory in the fields of Athenry, Finle, and Tagher, and in other engagements with the natives, he was called by the Irish Risdeard-nagmata, "Richard of the battles." In 1575, the Mac-an-Earlas, or sons of the Earl of Clanricarde, at the head of a party of insurgent Irish, marched upon Athenry, captured and sacked it, destroyed some houses and public works in it which had been recently erected by government, set its new gates on fire, dispersed the masons and labourers who were at work in enlarging it, and broke down and defaced the queen's arms and other armorial bearings which were in readiness to be erected; and they remained three days in possession of the town, till induced to flee to the mountains by the arrival of intelligence that the lord-deputy was approaching against them at the head of a special force from Dublin. During nine years the town was almost a deserted heap of ruins; but, in 1584, several of the former inhabitants petitioned the queen's council for such encouragement as would enable them to bring over English artisans to rebuild and improve it, and also to support sufficient force for its subsequent protection; and, as the result of their petition, several buildings were erected, and many other improvements made. In January, 1596, the northern Irish, under Hugh Ruidh O'Donnell, aided by the followers of Tibbot M'Walter Kittagh Bourke, in the course of their invading Connaught, and desolating nearly the whole of co. Galway, invested Athenry, burned the gates, and entered the town; but, repelled from the castle, and unable to scale the battlements, they took possession of the wall-towers, made prisoners of such of the inhabitants as defended them, and then, with the exception of the castle and the Dominican abbey and church to which they had not access, reduced the whole town to ashes. Since that period, the town has been so much neglected, as never once to have risen above the character of a large, poor, haggard village.

The borough of Athenry is very ancient, and probably existed by prescription. Writs of 1, 4, 8, and 18 Richard II., are extant, showing that it then returned members to parliament. Charters or kindred documents were granted to it in 4 Edward II., 16 Elizabeth, 13 Charles II., and 4 James II. The liberties of the borough extend about 3½ miles toward Orammore, and about 1 mile in other directions; but are not accurately defined. The corporation consisted of a portreeve or provost, and an indefinite number of burgesses and freemen. They returned two members to parliament, till the borough was disfranchised at the Union; but were merely the tools of the Blakeney family; and the sum of £15,000, awarded as compensation for the loss of their franchise, was all paid to the trustees of the marriage settlement of Theophilus Blakeney, Esq. Only 3 freemen existed in 1833, the date of the Municipal Corporation inquiry; and even they had never attended any corporate meeting. The commissioners, after fully detailing the condition in which they found the borough, remark, "It is difficult to say what advantage such a corporation as described in this Report, however reformed, could be to so small a community, nor does its continuance seem to be desired by the inhabitants, as far as municipal government is concerned. The present body is of no public utility, and decidedly unpopular. The corporate property, instead of being, as it now is, applied to the private use of an individual, might be advantageously employed in objects of local improvement, which would be further advanced by the total abolition of the tolls." The property, once very extensive, was reduced to the tollhouse, said to be worth about £15 a-year, two plots of ground, capable of producing about £50 a-year, the tolls of the town, worth about £40, and the borough pound,—all of which, excepting the pound, were demised by Mr. Blakeney to the then portreeve at 1s. a-year during his own life and 7 years. A town or portreeve's court, for all pleas real and personal, to any amount, continued in 1833 to be held as often as business required—which latterly was very seldom,—and was held generally on Monday, not in any fixed courthouse or place, but in different parts of the town. Petty-sessions, generally presided over by three of the county magistrates, are held every Friday. Excepting a serjeant-at-mace, the town has no borough police: it is a station, however, of the county constabulary. The streets are not lighted; and they are kept in repair only by county presentment. A gaol formerly existed in the town; but now the nearest available one is the county gaol at Galway. A market is held weekly; and fairs are held on May 5, July 2, and Oct. 28. In 1838, and previous years, there does not seem to have been any public conveyance either from the town or in transit. In 1840-41, a dispensary in the town received £105 10s., expended £100 6s., relieved 611 extern patients, and had a district of 21,205 acres, with a pop. of 9,049. Area of the town, 42 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,319; in 1841, 1,236. Houses 242.

ATHGLASSON, a village in the parish of Kilskeer, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop. in 1831, 114.

ATHIRDEE. See ARDEE.

ATHLACCA, a parish on the west side of the barony of Coshma, 2½ miles south-west of Bruff, co.

Limerick, Munster. Area, 5,511 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,381; in 1841, 1,372. Houses 175. The surface declines to the north, lies in the basin of the Maig, and is traversed by the beautiful affluent of that river called the Morning-Star.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Limerick; and forms part of the benefice of DROMIN: see see. Tithe composition, £306 12s. 7½d. The church of the benefice is situated in Athlaca; and was built in 1813, by means of a loan of £516 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 80; average attendance 8. Two Roman Catholic chapels in the union are attended by 800; and have two officiates. In 1834 the Protestants of Athlaca amounted to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 1,297; and a hedge-school had on its books 58 boys and 17 girls.

ATHLEAGUE, a parish partly in the barony of Killian, co. Galway, but chiefly in that of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. The Roscommon section contains the villages of ATHLEAGUE, CLOONKENEG, and DROMAN: see these articles. Length, 6½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 13,012 acres,—of which 4,976 acres are in Killian. Pop., in 1831, 5,361; in 1841, 5,087. Houses 903. Pop. of the Galway section, in 1831, 1,625; in 1841, 1,437. Houses 247. Pop. of the rural districts of the Roscommon section, in 1841, 2,580. Houses 470. The river Suck, partly making a long and tortuous detour into Roscommon, and partly dividing that county from Galway, passes southward through the parish, mazy in its sinuosities, almost doubling on itself in a great sweep at the village, low in its banks and basin, and swampy, sluggish, and almost stagnant in its progress. Yet, though the parochial surface is flat, tame, and occasionally boggy, it experiences relief, especially in the district immediately around the village, from a comparative profusion of wood. The land averages in value about 28s. per plantation acre. The mansion of Fortwilliam stands near the village, and that of Rookwood 2 miles to the west.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £135 13s. 10d., and the rectorial for £90 9s. 3d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the Incorporated Society. The vicarages of Athleague, FUERTY, and KILNEGNET, [see these articles,] constitute the benefice of Athleague. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 8. Gross income, £363 7s. 6d.; nett, £314 7s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £95, and the use of Fuerty glebe land. Athleague church is so old a building that the date and cost of its erection are not known. Sittings 100; average attendance 30. There is a church also in Fuerty. The Athleague Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000, and is served by two officiates. A Roman Catholic chapel exists also in each of the other two parishes. In 1834, the Protestants of Athleague parish amounted to 146, and the Roman Catholics to 5,098; the Protestants of the union to 333, and the Roman Catholics to 15,903. In the same year, 7 hedge-schools in the parish had on their books 288 boys and 130 girls; and 22 daily schools in the union, including the former, had 897 boys and 477 girls.

ATHLEAGUE, a village, the capital of the above parish, stands at the eastern point of a long salient angle of the river Suck, in the barony of Athlone, 4 miles south of Roscommon town, co. Roscommon, Connaught. The passage across the river at the village consists of a chain of low bridges, carried from island to island, and connected by raised causeways; is long in proportion to the actual breadth of the water; and winds obliquely from the left bank down to the right. "Passing from the left bank," says Mr. Weld, "there is first a long causeway, with one arch sufficient for the water passing into the mill-race; then a bridge of six arches with starlings between; then more causeway, then one small arch; then more causeway; and, finally, two small arches; in all ten." The village commences at the end of the long winding causeway; extends down the flat along the right bank of the river; and sends off a transverse street or road up a somewhat rapidly ascending hill. Only 15 houses are of a class superior to cabins; and only 3 of even these are slated. Some large insulated mills, worked with undershot wheels on the Suck, have a decayed appearance; and some malt-houses, once worked in connexion with them, are abandoned to other uses. "The appearance of the place," says Mr. Weld, speaking of the village in 1832, "was quite dead; no shops, no movement. A small inn, bearing a rather neuter aspect than what is commonly seen in such places, tempted me to stop; but the whole place did not afford a feed of oats for my horse. The woman of the house, of unusually good address, said she had come hither from the town of Roscommon; and regretted the change, since there was no business stirring on the road. Several neat small houses, surrounded with trees, stand on the banks of the Suck, near Athleague." Fairs are held on June 11 and Sept. 4. Area of the village, 32 acres. Pop., in 1831, 468; in 1841, 631. Houses 112.

ATHLONE, a barony in the county of Roscommon, Connaught. It is bounded on the north by the half barony of Ballymoe and the barony of Ballintober; on the east, by co. Longford and co. Westmeath; on the south-east, by King's co.; on the south, by the barony of Moycarmon; and on the west, by co. Galway. Length, 16 miles; breadth, 10; area, 146,185 acres. Pop., in 1831, 56,865; in 1841, 51,927. Houses 9,135. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 7,192; in manufactures and trade, 1,533; in other pursuits, 818. Males of 5 years of age and upwards who could read and write, 638; who could read but not write, 3,154; who could neither read nor write, 13,455. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,608; who could read but not write, 3,113; who could neither read nor write, 17,190.—This barony comprehends part of the parishes of Athleague and Taughboy, and the whole of the parishes of Camma, Drum, Dysart, Fuerty, Killenvoy, Kilmain, Kiltoun, Rahara, St. John, St. Peter, Taughmacconnell, and Taughlara. The eastern boundary is Lough Ree and the river Shannon; and the western, over much the greater part of its length, is the river Suck. The surface, according to the estimate of Mr. Weld, consists of 107,918 acres of tillage and pasture land, 26,463 acres of bog, and 1,461 acres of water. Limestone and limestone gravel are almost the only rocks; they frequently rise into hills of considerable elevation, the gravel forming the tumulation, and the stone sometimes cropping out; but they nowhere shoot up in mural cliffs, or intricately featured masses, and seldom, if anywhere, constitute picturesque landscape. The hills are, for the most part, irregularly dispersed, and are, in many instances, separated by bogs and flat alluvial plains; yet they occasionally prolong themselves in ridges of one or two miles, extending, for the most part, from north-west to south-east, and, in a few instances, in the opposite direction. A mass or series of hills tumulates the whole northern border from east to west; it forks at a point a short way south of the parallel of Mount Talbot; and thence it is prolonged in two lines, or series of clusters, which flank respectively the Shannon and the Suck, and which are separated from these rivers, as well as internally broken down and fragmented, by bogs and low alluvial grounds. The elongated group on the side of the Suck contains the highest ground, occasionally displays the bare limestone rock in such continuous masses as to appear grey rather than green, is highest and wildest somewhat south of Mount Talbot; yet, though prevailingly rough and stony, produces such fine herbage as to be aggregately a series of excellent sheep-walk. The largest bogs occur in the vicinity of Athlone and along the Suck; and turbaries, sufficient for the supply of fuel, are so generally dispersed as to be, in only a few instances, at an inconvenient distance from any habitation. Though the barony is in no place distant more than 5 miles from either Lough Ree, the Shannon, or the Suck, and though it is not destitute, in the interior, of rivers, loughs, and turloughs, it is in general more arid than any other district of the county, and in a few places is all but parched from a deficiency of water. The GRANOUGH [which see] is, with the exception of the Suck, the largest interior stream. Some of the loughs and turloughs lie at a higher elevation among the hills than is usual in the county; and though all at present comparatively unattractive, they in some instances possess pleasing natural features, and might be improved by planting. The largest is BALLAGH: which see. The black cattle pastures are inferior in celebrity to those in the plains of Boyle and the districts of Tulsk and Kilcorkey; yet they owe their inferiority only to the limitedness of their range or continuous extent. The sheep-walks, as was remarked long ago by the celebrated agriculturist Arthur Young, are of a very superior description. Improvements in tillage and cropping have not yet expelled the rudest practices from numerous farms; yet they have walked freely athwart the barony, and—what would surprise most English and Scottish theorists—they have proportionally made stronger and more numerous lodgments on the smaller, the positively Lilliputian holdings, than on farms of any tolerable size. But "amongst the hills on the side towards the Suck," says Mr. Weld, "I saw the harvest of considerable fields borne home on the backs of men, women, and children, in lundies proportioned to their respective strength; the carriers barefooted." "Farms of one, two, and three hundred acres," says the same writer, "are not rare; but very minute divisions of land, more especially near towns and villages, are also common. In proportion to the minuteness of the subdivisions the condition of the people appears to become worse. In the vicinity of Athlone, hovels are to be seen of as wretched a description as could be found in any part of the country; though, upon the whole, improvement is afloat, and the generality of the new cabins, in every part of the barony, are decidedly superior to those built by the last generation."

ATHLONE,

A market, post, and corporate town, a parliamentary borough, and a strong and important military station, stands on the river Shannon, partly in the barony of Brawney, co. Westmeath, partly in the barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, and very nearly in the centre of Ireland. It is cut by the Shannon into almost equal parts, commands the grand thoroughfare between Dublin and more than one-half of Connaught, and is 12½ miles north-east of Ballinasloe, 45 east-north-east of Galway, 20½ south-south-west of Longford, 30 west by south of Kinnegad, and 60 west by north of Dublin. As two parishes not only take part of their designation from it, but, with the exception of a very small portion in the parish of Kiltoom, contain the whole of its area and population, these, the one on the Leinster and the other on the Connaught side of the river, require to be noticed previously to our describing the town. See KILTOM.

Parish of St. Mary.—This parish, called also Athlone, and St. Mary's of Athlone, extends along the left bank of the Shannon, in the barony of Brawney, co. Westmeath. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3; area, 11,456 acres,—of which 1,386 acres are water, and 248 acres are in the town of Athlone. Pop., in 1831, 7,396; in 1841, 7,264. Houses 1,216. Pop. in the town of Athlone, in 1831, 5,099; in 1841, 3,320. Houses 552. The land, except immediately around the town, is for the most part bad, and extensively improvable bog. The surface is prevailingly low; nowhere rises much above the level of the Shannon; expands over a considerable space into fens and marshes which lachrymously flank the river, and aggregately possesses little landscape, or even artificial embellishment.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £304 12s. 3½d. Gross income, £497 12s. 3½d.; nett, £398 2s. 0½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church was built about the year 1827, at the cost of £2,307 12s., lent by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 1,000; attendance, from 500 to 600. A Baptist meeting-house is attended by about 40; a Wesleyan by 100; and a Primitive Wesleyan by 100. The parish Roman Catholic chapel is attended by about 1,400, and has two officiates; and a Friary Roman Catholic chapel is attended by about 600, and has as officiates the friars of a Franciscan convent. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,116 Churchmen, 2 Protestant dissenters, and 6,479 Roman Catholics; the greater part of the Wesleyan and Baptist congregations being in communion with the Established church. In the same year, 14 daily schools had on their books 225 boys and 140 girls; and of these, the parish-school was aided with £28, books and premiums, and a free house, from three societies, the rector, and subscription,—the Abbey school, with £12 from subscription,—and a school of the Baptist Irish Society, with £12 from that society; while one was a boarding and day school for young ladies, and the rest were all pay-schools. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school at Anchors-bower were aided with respectively £12 and £10 from the National Board.

Parish of St. Peter.—This parish, extending along the right bank of the Shannon, and containing most of the western or Connaught section of the town, is in the barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon. It contains the villages of BELLACUGH and BOGGANFIN: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 7,617 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,317; in 1841, 3,460. Houses 1,025. Pop. in the town, in 1831, 5,273; in 1841, 3,073. Houses 422. About one-third of the parish is tillage and pasture land, not very fertile; and the remainder consists of bog and unprofitable moor. The soil of the arable grounds is mostly argillaceous, in some places very productive, and in many containing brick and coarse pottery clay. Moorish flats on the verges of the bogs have a mixture of calcareous gravel; and the western bogs cover, at a depth of 15 feet and upwards, a profusion of oak, yew, and other timber. Iron ore and chalybeate springs occur on every townland; limestone is the prevailing rock; and shell-marl is, in numerous places, abundant.—The tithes of this parish, compounded for £46 15s. 5d., are wholly inappropriate, and belong to the Incorporated Society. A perpetual curacy, erected within the parish, and co-extensive with it, is a separate benefice in the dio. of Elphin. Gross income, £131 1s. 7½d.; nett, £130 18s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church was built in 1804, at the cost of £738 9s. 2½d., partly gifted, and partly lent by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 400; average attendance 130. Three Roman Catholic chapels are attended by respectively 1,500, 630, and 400, and have 4 officiates, who officiate also in the chapel of Drum. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 592 Churchmen, 7 Protestant dissenters, and 6,127 Roman Catholics; and 9 daily schools had on their books 221 boys and 173 girls. One of the schools was aided with £12 from subscription, £6 from two societies, and a house from the curate; and another with £12 from subscription, and £8 from the London Ladies' Hibernian Society.

Relative Position of the Town.—Athlone singularly combines prime facilities for commerce, military strength, and almost metropolitan command. Situated within about 2 miles of the centre of the island, and surrounded by a low and practicable country, it sends off in all directions lines of ramifying roads; standing on the great road between Dublin bay and the west, at the only point where the Shannon can be forded within a stretch of 30 miles, it entirely controls the intercourse between most of Connaught and Leinster; and overlooking a navigable communication, both up and down the Shannon, as well as eastward and westward at an easy distance by the Grand canal, and eastward at not much greater distance by the Royal canal, it may traffic through all the numerous ramifications of both river and canals, and outward to the Irish sea and the Atlantic ocean. Yet, except in ancient times, for its commanding the passage of the Shannon, and, in modern times, for its being a central depot for arms and ammunition, its position has been turned to surprisingly little practical account.

General Description.—The town, especially when viewed in connection with its size and importance, not only disappoints all travellers, but disgusts some, and astonishes others. To describe it with fidelity, yet without apparent invidiousness or prejudice, is so nearly impossible, that we gladly allow the chief part of the task to be performed by Mr. Weld. "Dr. Streean," says he, "enumerates in the Connaught part of Athlone ten streets and fifteen lanes; but these are so irregular, and so blended into each other, that it is difficult to pronounce, in many instances, where they begin or end. On passing into the Connaught town from the bridge, and advancing straight forward, a considerable flat space, nearly on a level, first appears, on one side of which alone to the south there are houses, whilst the other is occupied by the lofty walls which sustain the castle mound. In this open space a weekly market is held, and it is rarely destitute of stalls during any of the intervening days; but the principal meat-market, which is well provided with shambles, is situated within an enclosure on the banks of the river, in the lower part of the town. A passage opens from it to the water, a circumstance highly conducive to neatness and cleanliness, and which can leave no valid grounds of excuse for their non-observance. The houses which front to the open space below the castle walls contain the principal shops on that side of the river." "On the low ground behind this place, the streets are obscure, and bounded in great part by the lofty walls of the distilleries, tanneries," &c. The whole of the Connaught division of the town "may be considered as consisting of two parts, the one extending along the flats, nearly on a level with the bridge, the other covering the hill above the castle, and these are connected by various winding irregular streets along the slope. The two leading ways run one on each side of the castle, which stands perfectly insulated. Along that nearest the river, there are houses on one side alone, the fronts facing the castle, the rears extending down to the water; these are intersected by some short lanes or passages, the veriest sinks of abomination that can be imagined. The principal entrance into the barracks from the town, is from this latter street. Facing the esplanade of the castle on the upper side, a row of houses connects the two leading ways up to the hill. All these houses are laid out with shops below. The buildings along the slope next the river are old, and generally of small size, those on the esplanade better; but the largest and firmest built houses, which appear also to be amongst the oldest, are situated on the flats in the vicinity of the church. Throughout the town, a total absence of symmetry is observable, whether in reference to the style of the houses, or the alignment of the streets; and the mixture of poor and indifferent houses with those of a better description, is utterly destructive of neatness. The streets are badly paved, and the ways ill maintained. The best private houses of Athlone, and the only street having pretension to cleanliness, are situated in the Leinster division of the town; on the same side stand the only two houses which deserve the name of inns, and these are very indifferent, although the business is considerable." "The following is my enumeration of the houses in the Connaught division of the town: 67 houses of 3 stories; 2 houses of 3 stories, of superior quality; 157 houses of 2 stories, some of these thatched; 7 houses of 2 stories, of superior quality; 211 cabins of a single story, mostly thatched. But several rows of cabins, which had been latterly built, were all slated. New houses, of 2 and 3 stories, were in progress, principally along the line of the main street, on the top of the hill leading out to the Ballinasloe road. These were all fitted with shops in the lower part. Narrow lanes and closes abound, in which cabins of the meanest description are huddled together, inhabited by people whose appearance gave indication of the lowest state of civilization. The looks of the men and women were sallow and unhealthy; their only covering rags; the crying and wailing, scolding and beating, at once betrayed suffering and ill temper; whilst the violent expressions of passion were interrupted, at intervals, by wild songs and merriment of the coarsest description. The dirt and filth of these places are disgusting in the highest degree, and can scarcely fail of being injurious to the general salubrity of the town. After walking for a while through the crowded and narrow streets, it is quite a relief to enter into the squares of the barracks; to behold one place at least, where neatness, order, and cleanliness prevail, and to find pure, uncontaminated air to breathe."

But notwithstanding the general hideousness of the picture which truth compels Mr. Weld to sketch, he remarks: "In no part of Ireland, as far as my own observation extends, have I seen more urbanity, or more civility and attention to customers, than in the shops of Athlone: perhaps this may be in some measure attributable to the frequent intercourse with the officers of a numerous garrison; but I pretend not to pronounce that it is so." Owing to the limits of his work, too, he, throughout his description, speaks almost exclusively of the Connaught section of the town. Such redeeming features as Athlone possesses exist chiefly on the Leinster side, and, when viewed in connection with some improvements now in progress, and with others made since Mr. Weld wrote, they save the town from unqualifiedness or keen acerbity of denunciation. The principal street commences at the spacious area of the market-place, about 60 yards from the Old bridge; extends 500 yards east-south-eastward in nearly a straight line; and, though not uniform in either width or edifying, has many good houses, an airy aspect, and proximately an urban character. A slightly curving or sinuous continuation of it about a mile along the road to Dublin, while edified chiefly with thatched cabins, presents little, and in some places none, of the extremely squalid appearance which characterizes so many of the short, tortuous, narrow, and horribly repulsive streets and lanes of the Connaught section. The market-place is overlooked by a tolerably fair tower and spire; it is chiefly, though not altogether, screened with slated houses of two or three stories; it sends off no fewer than five divergent thoroughfares, and it affords what a person emerging from the lanes, if not one entering from the country, would pronounce "pure, uncontaminated air." Two or three short streets immediately north of this area, contain good private residences, and are comparatively clean and neat. The Leinster division of the town is nowhere broader than about 280 yards; and while upwards of 14 mile long, it consists, over nearly four-fifths of that extent, of only one street, which sends off two or three very brief ramifications, and subsides into an incompact or straggling line of cottages. The Connaught division, exclusive of the exterior fortifications and the straggling lines of houses beyond the borough boundaries, or measured between the river and the canal, has an extreme length of 800 yards, and an extreme breadth of 530. A new line of approach from the west was designed in connection with improvements afterwards to be noticed, and will pass beneath the south-west side of the fortifications of the battery, in front of Shamrock Lodge, and across the canal by an elegant swivel bridge to the head of Connaught-street.—Excepting over a brief space above the bridge, on the Leinster side, where a few diminutive terrace gardens lie at the rear of the houses, the Shannon, while passing through the town, is pressed along its edges by continuous masses of masonry, heaped and huddled and flung together in such utter confusion as utterly to destroy all picturesqueness of effect. The vast volume of the majestic stream is, in consequence, entirely lost for the purposes at once of scenic interest, of cooling breeze, of wharfage, and of terraced street-line.

Fortifications.—A strong castle, to command the passage of the Shannon, was built at Athlone, as early as the reign of King John. Walls round the land sides of each of the two divisions of the town probably were soon afterwards constructed; and they appear to have been either increased, or at least repaired and strengthened, in the reign of Elizabeth. On the Connaught side, scarcely any traces now exist of either walls or gates; but on the Leinster side, a considerable extent of wall still survives amidst a pressure of obscuring houses, and a gateway, perforating one of the old square towers, and exhibiting marks of the cannonade upon the town in the war of the Revolution, still affords egress near the river to a principal thoroughfare toward the north. The castle, consisting in small part of the original structure, and chiefly of subsequent additions and re-erectments, stands on a spur or offset of the hill whose shoulders and summit are occupied by the upper part of the Connaught town; and while overlooked from behind by the houses in the vicinity, in front, or towards the flat along the river, looks sheer down over a stupendous artificial wall. Insulated in the castle's court or area, stands a decagonal tower, the oldest or only original part of the fortress, supposed to have been constructed for the keep, and still suitable for a retreat in the event of an attack or a surprise, but ordinarily used as a mere barrack for the lodgment of troops. Though very massive in its walls, striking in its position, and peculiar in its form, this tower has suffered so much from the shocks of military attack, and undergone so many repairs, and been at last so dowdily coated with pebble dashing and whitening, as to have lost its aspect of antiquity. The platform of the castle is occupied, on the verge of the side next the lower town, with the dwellings of the officers, the walls of which rise imposingly above the stupendous ones which encase the perpendicular descent of the hill; and, on the other sides, with modern works surmounted by cannon, calculated both to sweep the bridge across the Shannon, and to command the approaches from the west. The castle thus constitutes an important ête de pont. The entrance to it is off the ascent of the street which winds from the end of the bridge up the hill to the upper town; and the passage to its platform is protected by various barricades with loop-holes, and by a recently constructed drawbridge and fosse. The tout-ensemble of the castle's masonry, with its perpendicular position over a deep mural descent, its array of strong circular cannon-mounted towers at irregular intervals in the outer walls, and its massive ten-sided surmounting keep, presents an impressive and formidable aspect.—The military defences additional to the castle are all, like itself, on the Connaught side, and consist of advanced forts and redoubts outside of the town, to defend the main approaches along the great road from Ballinasloe. Considerable strength is derived, between the town and the outworks, from the canal, which extends 13 mile between the bends of the Shannon, and whose bridges are defended by palisade barricades; and strength, sufficient to render artificial works unnecessary, is obtained on the south from bogs which extend along the river.

Barracks.—These occupy an elevated site between the outworks on the west, and the castle and the Shannon on the east; along most of the latter side, they overhang the bank of the river; and on the south side, or that next the town, they have their main entrance at a distance scarcely exceeding the breadth of the street from the castle. Including the squares or open areas for exercise, they cover at least 15 English acres of ground. The two outer squares measure 180 yards by respectively about 100 and 110; the inner and larger square measures about 200 yards by 160; and beyond the latter lie the artillery quarters. The buildings do not extend entirely round the squares; and, in addition to both infantry and cavalry barracks for troops, they include, within the enclosure, detached houses for armoury, stores, ordnance, hospital, officers' apartments, and other purposes. The armoury is maintained in the most exact order, fancifully arranged, usually stored with arms for about 15,000 men, and so capacious that when the muskets belonging to eight regiments of militia of the central counties were ranged by themselves in one compartment, the space which they occupied appeared quite small compared with the whole.

Bridges.—A bridge of some kind appears to have been very early thrown across the Shannon at Athlone; for in 1279, Edward I. granted to St. Peter's abbey "the tolls of the bridge;" but of what style or duration the structure was, is not known. A bridge built in the reign of Elizabeth, and only at the present moment in the course of being supplanted by a more suitable erection, is, in spite of the crowdedness of the thoroughfare and the great importance of the military station, the very worst, for both passage and water-way, upon the whole river. It has 9 arches, all narrow in the span, with huge massive intervening piers, and practically operates, during freshets, as a dam; it is about 300 feet long, and not more than 12 feet broad, so that carriages or cars can pass one another only at recesses on the piers, and when fairly on the carriage-way are unable to retreat; and, to render its inconveniences complete, it has one flour mill at its west end, another at its east end, and a third over part of its arches, so as to be to some extent a business-street. The mere daily thoroughfare between the two divisions of the town is an overmatch for the bridge's capacities; and on market and fair days, but especially on the week of the great cattle fair of Ballinasloe, cars, carriages, cattle and crowds of men and women choke it up to suffocation, form vast accumulations at its ends, and occasionally alternate in streams of 5 or 15 minutes run, now to the west and now to the east. A stage-coach arrives for the west from Dublin; the passengers are told to make the best of their own way along the bridge, and to rendezvous at an appointed spot on the Connaught side; all spend 10 or 15 minutes in pushing and shouldering among cars, cattle, pigs, and people, before they reach the bridge; a current at length sets in toward the west, and one passenger flings himself upon an already crowded car, another fixes himself to or upon a donkey, another is squeezed between the hams or forced along upon the rear of oxen, and a fourth is wedged among the shoulders of some grey-coated peasantry, and carried forward on tiptoe; and a full half hour after the whole have effected their passage, they observe from their place of rendezvous, the empty stage-coach bobbing along the bridge at the rate of two yards in the minute. We have figured in such a scene—as who has not who has had frequent occasion to pass between Dublin and the west?—and, from recollection of the humiliations, the sufferings, and the positive perils which we saw endured, we congratulate both Athlone and all Connaught on the provision of a new and spacious bridge. On the southern or lower side of the old bridge, stands a curious monument illustrative of the history of the erection. This consists of a wall, about 9 feet broad, filled with sculptured tablets, and surmounted by a pediment with ornamental mouldings. The tablets are of various sizes, and inserted with some regard to symmetry; they are in some instances decorated with richly chiselled mouldings; and they contain figures in relief of persons who were engaged in the construction of the bridge, the arms of Elizabeth, various devices and mottoes, and one very long and prominent inscription, in large Roman capital letters in relief, stating the date of the bridge and some circumstances of its erection. —Improvements at Athlone, designed under the Commissioners for the Improvement of the Shannon, published in their Second Report, or that of the year 1837, and estimated to cost £60,000, include the removal of the bridge just described, and of two small bridges across the canal, the construction of a new bridge across the Shannon 220 feet below the site of the old one, the construction 250 feet farther down of a semicircular weir for keeping up the water to a summer level higher than the present, the widening of the canal, the construction upon the latter of a new deep lock and an elegant swivel bridge, and the opening of an approach road or new street from the west between this bridge and that across the Shannon. The new bridge on the river has 5 elliptical arches, each 50 feet in span; its roadway is 24 feet with a footpath of 6 feet on each side, making a total breadth of 36 feet between the parapets; its piers rest upon piles, and were constructed with coffer dams; its arches and piers are built with ashlar, the outside spandril walls with hammer-dressed masonry, and the interior with rubble; its parapet walls, wing-courses, and coping are formed of good ashlar; and its footpaths are laid with slate flags, and its roadway macadamized.

Ecclesiastical Buildings.—An abbey, founded, according to Sir James Ware, in 1214, stood near the west margin of the river, was dedicated to St. Peter, and has bequeathed its name to the parish containing most of the Connaught division of the town. "This abbey," says Sir James Ware, "is called 'The Monastery of Innocentia,' in the table of procurations of the church of Elphin, and was of the order of Benedictines or Cistercians." Scarcely a vestige of the structure now remains.—A monastery for Conventual Franciscans was founded on the east side of the river, by Cathal, or Charles Croibh Deary O'Connor, Prince of Connaught; and, being incomplete at his death, it was finished by Sir Henry Dillon. A community or fraternity of Franciscan friars still have a convent and a chapel in the town.—The parish-church of St. Peter, on the site of the old abbey, is a plain structure; and that of St. Mary, though in no way remarkable, is a pleasant edifice. The Roman Catholic chapel in the Connaught town is noticeable chiefly for its great size.

Other Public Buildings.—The market-house or Tholsel, on the Leinster side, is a poor edifice, claimed by Lord Castlemain as private property, and occupied by the garrison as a guard-house. A prison attached to the town-office is a place of the most unwholesome description, and utterly unfit for the reception of prisoners. The vice-sovereign stated, in 1833, that, on account of the loathsomeness of this dungeon, he had never made a commitment to it for a longer period than 24 hours. A bridewell, on the Connaught side, contains 2 day-rooms, 4 cells, and 2 yards; and is kept in tolerable order by the keeper, on a very small salary. "The Sessions-house, on the same side," says Mr. Weld, "is a wretched place, discreditable to the town, not merely on account of the poor accommodation, but its filthy state. It was used when I saw it as a potato store; the dock was filled with vegetables, and the court strewn with putrid leaves." The workhouse, for the Athlone Poor-law union, was contracted for on Nov. 1, 1839,—to be completed in March 1841,—to cost £7,500 for building and completion, and £1,801 10s. for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy an area of 7 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches, purchased for £798 10s.,—and to contain accommodation for 900 paupers. In 1840-41, a dispensary on the Leinster side received £46 2s., expended £16 8s. 8d., administered to 842 patients, and had a district of 11,455 acres, with 7,396 inhabitants; and a dispensary on the Connaught side received and expended £108 4s., made 4,756 dispensations of medicine, and had a district of 34,481 acres, with a pop. of 15,405.

Poor-Law Union.—The Athlone Poor-law union ranks as the 30th, and was declared on April 3, 1839. It comprehends about one-sixth of co. Westmeath, and one-fourth of co. Rosecommon, jointly amounting to 109,109 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 73,052. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Westmeath, St. Mary's, 7,599; Killeagh, 3,355; Moate, 4,800; Kilcunnreagh, 1,898; Ballymore, 3,494; Drumrancy, 3,494; Noughaval, 2,314; Bunowen, 2,352; Kilkenny West, 2,900; and Ballyloughloe, 3,306;—and in co. Rosecommon, Athlone, 12,274; Kiltoom, 4,948; St. John's, 2,136; Rahara, 1,630; Tisrara, 3,492; Taughboy, 2,564; Cam, 4,114; Dysert, 1,661; and Tanghmaconnel, 3,631. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 9 and 27; and of the latter, 5 are returned by the division of Athlone, 3 by that of St. Mary, 2 by that of Moate, 2 by that of Kiltoom, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued is 11,914; and of these, 6,552 were valued under £5, 713 under £6, 659 under £7, 421 under £8, 503 under £9, 261 under £10, 502 under £12, 377 under £14, 129 under £15, 128 under £16, 196 under £18, 139 under £20, 318 under £25, 180 under £30, 240 under £40, 151 under £50, and 385 at and above £50. The total nett annual value of property rated is £110,043 10s. The workhouse was opened for the admission of paupers on Nov. 22, 1841; the total previous expenses amounted to £1,652 11s. 10d.; and the total expenses from the opening of the workhouse till Feb. 6, 1843, amounted to £3,040 15s. 0½d. The dispensary districts of the union are the two in and around the town, and those of Brideswell, Glassan, and Moate; and they aggregate comprise an area of 156,459 acres, with a pop. of 55,849. There is no infirmary or fever-hospital.

Trade.—Felt hats were long an extensive and celebrated manufacture in Athlone, and are still somewhat numerously made. Fricases and some linen are, on a small scale, manufactured. Artificers in various departments are numerous; yet in no other instances than these named do they produce, in the mercantile sense of the phrase, an article of manufacture. Distillation is at once the most prominent and the most lucrative employment, and makes a figure as conspicuous as its influence is baneful. A steam-engine of 20 horse power, set up in one of the distilleries, was found to be best worked with turf. The quantity of turf brought to the town and sold in it strikes a stranger with wonder; fleets of little boats being seen laden with it in the canal, and heaps of it elsewhere, larger than several three-story houses. So abundantly are the markets supplied with provisions, that the town is considered as aggregately one of the cheapest places of residence within an extensive tract of circumjacent country. The ‘Sportsman in Ireland’ says, respecting the supply of river fish, “The first thing that aroused my surprise at Athlone was the continued exposure for sale of trout of 8, 10, or 15 pounds each, which seemed to excite no admiration among the people. I was almost angry at the sight of such splendid creatures sold for the merest trifle; and apparently regarded with less respect than the eels which satiated the town.” Though profits are now smaller than formerly, business in general has for years been decidedly on the increase. The shops are numerous rather than large, and are almost wholly furnished with British goods, imported by way of Dublin and the canals. Weekly markets are held on Thursday and Saturday; and annual fairs on 1st Monday after Jan. 6, on March 21, on Wednesday before Ascension, and on 1st Monday in Sept. On the Leinster side are branch offices of the National and Provincial banks, the former established in 1836, and the latter in 1827. A steam-vessel of about 100 tons plies between Athlone and Shannon-harbour; connecting the town with the track and luggage boat conveyance to Dublin along the Grand canal, and with steam-boat conveyance to Limerick down the Shannon. In 1834, the boats which navigated the Shannon from the town were 171 in number, and aggregately of 4,684 tons burden. In 1838, the land conveyances from the town were a car to Ballinasloe, a caravan to Kibbegan, a mail car to Mullingar, a car to meet the Royal canal boats at Toome bridge, and mail and other coaches in transit between Dublin and towns in the west.

Municipal Affairs, &c.—The limits of the borough, as described by the governing charter, extend to “all that whole circuit and extent of land and water, lying within the compass of one mile and a-half from the middle of the bridge over the Shannon, commonly called the Bridge of Athlone, directly forth in a right line every way round, except the castle of Athlone and the precinct thereof.” The boundaries, under the new arrangement, are greatly more limited, and include, on the Connaught side, only the area between the canal and the Shannon, and on the Leinster side an irregularly heptagonal area of about 7 furlongs by less than half-a-mile. The borough was first incorporated by charter of 4 James I.; and it afterwards received charters of 16 and 17 James I., 17 and 25 Charles II., and 5 James II. The corporation, as constituted by charter, is called “The Sovereign, Bailiffs, Burgesses, and Freemen, of the town of Athlone,” and consists of a sovereign, 2 bailiffs, 13 burgesses, one of whom is the constable of the castle, a recorder, a town-clerk, a sergeant-at-mace, and a billet-master. The circumstance of the town lying in two baronies, counties, and provinces, gives rise to several jurisdictions within the borough, and occasions inconvenience and confusion in judicial administration. Quarter-sessions for the division of Moate, which includes the Leinster town, are held four times a-year at Moate; and for the division of Roscommon, which includes the Connaught town, are held twice a-year at Roscommon, and twice a-year at Athlone. Petty-sessions, presided over by county magistrates, are held within both divisions of the borough; but do not in general take cognizance of offences committed within the jurisdiction of the corporation. Courts leet and baron are authorized by charter of 27 Charles II., granted to Richard, Lord Ranelagh and his heirs, to be held within the half quarter of land of Athlone, alias Beallagh; but they have long been extinct, and even cannot be proved to have ever existed. The senechal of the manor of Trevford, appointed by Lord Castlemain, and holding his court at Moate, claims jurisdiction over part of the Leinster town, and entertains cases to the amount of £2 Irish. The sovereign of the borough, or his deputy, sits at his office, in his magisterial capacity, three times a-week; he there decides upon questions of trespass, servants’ wages, and nuisances; and he sends the more serious offences to the assizes, and minor delinquencies to the quarter-sessions. A borough court, which was presided over by the sovereign, and entertained claims to the amount of £5 Irish, ceased to be held about the year 1821. The sergeant-at-mace is the sole police force of the corporation. Borough constables were formerly appointed by the sovereign, but have been discontinued. Parties of the county constabulary are stationed in the town, and obey the sovereign as a justice-of-the-peace. The corporation possesses no landed property. The average annual amount of their receipts from tolls, customs, pontage, murage, and all other sources, during 29 years, ending in 1832, was £300 19s. 7½d.; and their annual average expenditure £303 3s. 1½d. In 1841–2, their receipts were £401; expenditure, £261. The borough, previous to the union, sent two members to parliament; and since then, it has sent one. Constituency, before the passing of the Reform act, 71; in 1835, 27 freemen, and 310 £10 householders; in 1841, 15 freemen, and 327 £10 householders. Area of the town, 491 acres,—of which 73 acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 11,406; in 1841, 6,393. Houses 974.

Name and History.—The name Athlone seems to be a corruption of Ath-Luain, ‘the ford of the moon.’ The town’s current name among the Erse population is Blahluin; and this is supposed to be a corruption of Baile-Ath-Luain, 'the town of the ford of the moon.' An opinion is entertained that the word Luan became associated with these names in consequence of the place having, in the ages of Paganism, been either dedicated to the moon, or intimately connected with its worship; and this opinion is somewhat countenanced by the discovery, not very many years ago, in a bog near the town, of several antique lunettes and crescents of gold.

Such passages in the history of the town as possess interest, though few in number, have, for the most part, prominent connection with the general history of the island. In the reign of Elizabeth, Athlone-castle was the frequent retreat of the Earl of Essex during his sojourn in Ireland, and the place where he wrote several of his letters to the queen. In the civil war of 1641, the insurgents besieged the Lord-president, Jones Lord Ranelagh, in Athlone; but abandoned their enterprise on the approach of the Earl of Ormond. In 1690, after the battle of the Boyne, Colonel Richard Grace, who had long been in James II.'s service, and was now at the head of 3 regiments of infantry, 9 troops of cavalry, and 2 troops of horse, fortified Athlone in the cause of his fallen master; he set fire to the Leinster division of the town as indefensible, destroyed the central arches of the bridge, raised breastworks, redoubts, and other strengths in the bridge's vicinity, repaired the old fortifications of the Connaught town, and both enlarged and augmented the batteries of the castle; and when General Douglas, one of the ablest of King William's officers, appeared at the head of 4 regiments of horse, 2 of dragoons, and 10 of foot, and summoned Grace to surrender, the latter, firing a pistol at the messenger, said, "These are my terms; these only will I give or receive; and after my provisions are consumed, I will defend it till I eat my old boots." Douglas commenced and plied a siege with great vigour and bravery; but he eventually discovered his train of artillery to be insufficient for the enterprise,—he saw his best gunners killed, his most skilful engineers desponding, his whole army crest-fallen and sickly,—and, says Leland, "he decamped at midnight unmolested, and, in his terror of the enemy, marched by devious and painful routes to join the royal army, leaving the Protestant inhabitants, who had enjoyed the benefit of Irish protection till forced to join the besiegers, exposed to the danger of experiencing the utmost severities." In his despatch to the Earl of Portland, just when about to abandon the siege, Douglas says, "I have done my best endeavours at Athlone. All my powder is shot off except three barrels, and it has become absolutely necessary to retire to Mullingar. This place [Athlone], I do assure your Lordship, is of the greatest consequence of any in Ireland." The Irish, after Douglas's retreat, resumed possession of the Leinster town, repaired such of its fortifications as had not been destroyed, placed the bridge in a condition practicable for themselves but unavailable for an enemy, and adopted various measures to render their entire position in Athlone, as far as they could, impregnable. On the 18th June, 1691, the main division of William's army, under General De Ginkle, marched within sight of the town; on the two following days, they battered the walls of the Leinster town, and drove the Irish within their fortifications; and, on the 21st, they rushed in a victorious torrent through breaches which they had made, and swept the besieged so impetuously before them that numbers were crushed to death in mutual pressure on the bridge, and numbers fell headlong from the battlements, and perished in the river. But the arch of the bridge next the Connaught town was now promptly broken; the ford between the two towns was not only dangerous from its depth and roughness, but so narrow as hardly to admit 20 men abreast; the Irish, who fired furiously from the Connaught side, were posted in great force behind intrenchments and fortresses; a place, considerably up the river, where a passage might be attempted by a bridge of pontons, was strongly and vigilantly guarded; and the assailing and hitherto victorious army seemed in consequence to be arrested from attempting further progress. De Ginkle, concluding the bridge to be the only practicable passage, raised a wooden work for the purpose of throwing planks over the broken arch; batteries played from the east side to cover the workmen, and from the west to destroy them; a sergeant and ten privates in armour rushed from among the Irish to demolish the work, and were all slain; another Irish party followed, and flung the beams and planks into the river; the English reconstructed the work, and completed a close gallery over the broken arch; they now resolved to pass in three simultaneous bodies, the principal one here, and subordinate ones at two other places; and, just when they were about to start, they saw the gallery burnt by the fire of the Irish grenades, and were once more flung helplessly back on their inventive resources. On the 30th, the day after the last repulse, while the Irish were insolent in a sense of security, and after De Ginkle and his officers had held an inspiring council of war, a party of about 2,000 of the English, headed by the most distinguished leaders, rushed, at an appointed signal, into the ford of the river, intrepidly advanced across the water amid a tremendous fire from the enemy's works, gained the opposite bank, were speedily joined by parties along the bridge and by pontons, mounted breaches which had previously been battered open on the side of the fortifications next the river, and struck such astonishment and panic into the Irish, that the latter either fell or fled, while the English were masters of the town within half-an-hour of their commencing the passage of the stream. About 1,200 of the Irish were slain in the siege; the garrison of the castle, consisting of 500 men, surrendered as prisoners; and the body of the discomfited and expelled army instantly decamping, retreated the same night beyond the river Suick, there to sustain in a few days their signal and nearly final defeat. See AUGHRIM. The siege of Athlone cost the assailants 12,000 cannon balls, numerous tons of stones thrown from mortars, 600 bombs, and nearly 50 tons of gunpowder.

On the morning of the 27th October, 1697, a tremendous and memorable storm almost desolated Athlone. "First a dreadful shower of rain, as if a whole cloud had fallen in the street; which, being forced by a violent wind, made a prodigious noise as it fell; after the rain, a dreadful and terrible clap of thunder; next ensued a thick darkness that continued for the space of half a quarter of an hour; then broke out continued lightning, without ceasing, so that heaven and earth seemed to be united by the flames, which was more terrible to the guards than all that had happened before; and ended with three claps of thunder in a fiery cloud from the north, and, running violently through the air, stopped just above the castle, and at the last three claps, in the twinkling of an eye, fell a wonderful great body of fire or lightning out of the said cloud, in figure round, directly upon the castle; and in a moment after, the magazine took fire, and blew up 260 barrels of powder, 1,000 charged hand-grenades, with 810 skains of match which were piled over them, 220 barrels of mu-ket and pistol balls, great quantities of pick-axes, spades, shovels, horse-shoes, and nails, all which blew up into the air, and covered the whole town and neighbouring fields, by the violence of which the town-gates were all thrown open: the poor inhabitants, who were generally asleep when this tragical scene began, awakened with the different surprising misfortunes that befel them, some finding themselves buried in the ruins of their own houses, others finding their houses in a flame over their heads, others blown from their beds into the streets, others having their brains knocked out with the fall of great stones, and breaking of hand-grenades in their houses. These stupifying disasters within doors made most of these poor amazed mortals fly to the streets for shelter!"

—Athlone gives the title of Earl in the Irish peerage to the Dutch family of De Ginckle, the descendants of William's heroic general. Barons De Reede and Ginckle, in the Netherlands. Godard De Ginckle, the general, was created Earl of Athlone and Baron of Aughrim in 1691-2; and he received in 1693 a grant of the forfeited estates of William Dongan, Earl of Limerick, comprising about 26,480 acres. The grant being reversed by parliament in 1695, the family retired to Holland, and no Earl of them sat in the Irish House of Peers till 1795. George, the ninth Earl, was born in 1820, and when 3 years old, succeeded his father Reinhardt-Diederick-Jacob, the eighth Earl. The family-seat is Amerongen-castle, Utrecht.—A presbytery of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland has its seat in Athlone, inspects 8 congregations, and meets on the first Wednesday of Feb., May, Aug., and Nov.

ATHLUMNEY, a parish on the western border of the barony of Screen, co. Meath, Leinster. It contains the villages of FACTORY and LITTLEFURZE, and a small part of the town of NAVAN: see these articles. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 2,434 acres,—of which 35½ acres are water in the Boyne. Pop., in 1831, 1,148; in 1841, 1,269. Houses 232. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 761. Houses 139. The river Boyne, flowing northward, separates the western border from the parish of Navan, and is here crossed by two stone bridges. The land is all profitable and of good quality. Athlumney-house, the seat of P. P. Metge, Esq., sends down a sheet of plantation to the verdant margin of the Boyne. Athlumney-castle, on the border of the river, is an extensive ruin of a spacious mansion in the style which prevailed in the 17th century, combined with vestiges of the harsher features of a fortalice. The chief residences, additional to Athlumney, are Blackcastle, Boyneview, Petersville, Mooretown, and Fergantown.—This parish is a vicarage and a separate benefice in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £90, and the rectorial for £180; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to P. P. Metge, Esq. Gross income of the benefice, £90; nett, £54 13s. 4d. Patron, P. P. Metge, Esq. The church is in ruins; but evening service is performed in a private house, and attended by from 8 to 20. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 400 to 450, and shares with Walterstown chapel in Monkstown the care of one officiate. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 28, and the Roman Catholics to 1,148; and 2 daily schools—the one of which in Mr. Blunell's factory, received about £18 a-year from the proprietor, and the other £15 from subscription, and £10 from the National Board—had on their books 79 boys and 50 girls. In 1840, the factory school was salaried by the National Board with £4.

ATHNASSEY, ATENASSY, ATHANEASY, or ATHENEASY, a parish in the baronies of Coshlea and Small County, co. Limerick, Munster. It lies about 4 miles respectively south-east of Bruff, and north-east of Kilmallock; and is traversed north-eastward by the road from Charleville to Tipperary and Cashel. The surface forms part of the basin of the Maig. Area of the Coshlea section, 1,836 acres; of the Small County section, 1,001 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the Coshlea section, 974; of the Small County section, 529. Houses in the two sections, respectively, 158 and 70. The Ecclesiastical authorities state the pop., in 1831, at 547; and appear to restrict the parish to the Small County section.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Limerick; and forms part of the union of Kilmallock, appropriated to the dean and chapter of Limerick cathedral. See KILMALLOCK. Tithe composition, £225 4s. 7½d. Land, lying within the parish belonging to the economy estate of the dean and chapter, and amounting to 47 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches, is let to 6 tenants on leases of 21 years, at aggregate £73 2s. 1d., exclusive of 1 acre, 2 roods, 38 perches, held free by the schoolmaster. There does not appear to be either church, glebe-house, or chapel. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 2, and the Roman Catholics to 570; and a hedge-school had on its books 15 boys and 12 girls.

ATHNOWEN, OWEN, OVENS, or ST. MARY, a parish in the barony of East Muskerry, 6½ miles west-south-west of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 4,838 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,953; in 1841, 1,925. Houses 287. The townlands of Carrigane, Classes, Graige, and Lisheens, formerly belonged to the barony of Barretts; but were transferred, by authority of 6 and 7 William IV., c. 84, s. 51, to the barony of East Muskerry. The northern boundary of the parish is traced by the river Lee, and the southern and eastern boundaries by the Bride. About two-thirds of the land are good and arable; and the other third is of indifferent quality. A ramified, stalactitic, and in many respects wonderful, cave, in the parish, is thus described by Dr. Smith:—"In it is a most remarkable cave, beneath a stupendous limestone arch, 12 feet high at the entrance, but declines to less than 6. In some places it is higher, and in others so low that one is obliged to creep in advancing through it. The passage is on the west side; but, in about 20 yards, the cave winds towards the south and south-east. Another way leads on due south, to a well about fourscore yards from its entrance. There are many other branches, some running in a serpentine manner, others like so many alleys crossing each other, mostly so broad that 6 or 8 persons may walk abreast, the whole forming a perfect labyrinth under-ground. In order to visit these passages, it would be necessary to take the same precaution as Ariadne made Theseus use, when he was obliged to fight the Minotaur in the Cretan labyrinth."—"This grotto is all lined with a natural gypsum, or stalactical matter, which pervades through the rocks, and is a stronger cement than human industry has yet invented. By my computation, I went a quarter of an English mile under ground in this place; and the country people say that it runs to Gill-Abbey, near Cork. There is also another entrance near the church to this cave." The labyrinthine series of caverns, at least those most accessible, have been despoiled of their spars and stalactites, and have otherwise undergone some changes; but they still excite the astonishment of strangers, and form a favourite topic of popular story among the natives. The small village of Owens or Owen, stands on the river Bride; and Grange, the principal mansion in the parish, stands in the vicinity of the village. Colonel Phaire, the proprietor of Grange at the period of the Commonwealth, was made governor of Cork by Cromwell; he was one of the persons to whom the warrant for the execution of Charles I. was directed; and he was concerned in the plot of 1666, for seizing the castle of Dublin and other garrisons in Ireland. The parish is bisected by the road from Cork to Inchegeelagh, and will derive prime facilities of communication from the Berehaven and Blarney railway.—Athenowen is a rectory in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £425. This rectory and that of KILNAGLODY [which see] constitute the benefice of Athenowen. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Gross income, £771; nett, £665 2s. 10d., exclusive of £3 5s. 6d. arising from rent of houses demised for a term of years as prebendary of Kilmaglor. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a stipend of £75. When the church was built, or at what cost, is not known. Sittings 100; attendance 70. The Athenowen Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000, and shares with the chapel of Aghish the care of two officiates. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also in Kilmaglor. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 55, and the Roman Catholics to 1,970; the Protestants of the union to 92, and the Roman Catholics to 3,084. In the same year, 4 daily schools in the union, 3 of which were in Athenowen, had on their books 219 boys and 96 girls; and one of the Athenowen schools had £14 a-year from the National Board, while another had £8 2s. from the rector, and local contributions. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school at Ovens had respectively £15 and £8 from the National Board. The dispensary district of Ovens is partly within the Poor-law union of Macroom, but chiefly within that of Cork. In 1839-40, the dispensary received £108 16s., expended £107, and had recommended to it 1,538 patients.

ATHY. See ARSEL.

ATHUR, one of the most towering and boldly-featured summits of the Dunkerrin mountains, in the barony of Dunkerrin, co. Kerry, Munster. Mr. Fraser, speaking of the Blackstones river, which runs northward from the Dunkerrin mountains to the head of Upper Lough Carragh, says that it "leads into the midst of the most interesting mountain scenery in Kerry," and adds: "The mountains rise around on every side; their countless tops most generally fantastically wreathed in mist, and stretching away as far as the eye can reach, summit over summit, until terminated in the distance by the lofty peak Athur, towering over all,—the lonely sentinel of the scene."

ATHY,

Pronounced Athy'—an incorporated and market town, the joint capital with Naas, of the county of Kildare, and formerly a parliamentary borough, stands in the parishes of Athy St. John, Athy St. Michael, and Churchtown, barony of West Narragh and Rheban, co. Kildare, Leinster. Its site is on both sides of the river Barrow, amidst a pleasant agricultural country, 15½ miles north-east of Abbey-leix, 18 south-west by south of Naas, and 33½ south-west of Dublin.

General Description.—The principal street runs nearly half-a-mile south-westward, on a line with the Dublin road, to the river Barrow, but, over the first 400 yards, is only partially edified; it recommences at the end of the bridge across the river, and runs 500 yards farther on a straight line to a point a little beyond the Grand canal; and it then deflects, runs 370 yards south-south-westward, and subsides into the open road leading to Kilkenny. The street which leads in from Carlow on the south-east, and leads out to Monasterevan on the north-west, regularly crosses the principal street, at a point about 60 yards north-east of the bridge; runs in a straight line along the left bank of the river, and for some distance closely skirts its margin; has an entire length of between three and four furlongs; and, though containing the new gaol, the church, and other objects of pretension, is not fully edified. Barrack-street, going rectangularly off from the main street, and running north-westward between the river and the canal, and nearly parallel with both, has a length of about 600 yards, and, though spacious at the commencement, is irregular in both width and alignment. The other streets and thoroughfares are individually of small consideration. Excepting, on the unwinged or single lines of the two chief cross streets, the breadth of the town does not average more than 200 yards. A decided improvement has been made, within the last 12 or 15 years, in the town's appearance. New houses have been built, several old ones have been renovated and raised, many inferior ones have been erased and supplanted by neat erections; and a narrow and bad street has been widened and much improved. The streets are well paved, and kept in good order; and, for a number of years past, they have, during the dark nights of winter, been lighted.

Public Buildings.—The places of worship and the schools in the town will be noticed in the articles on the three parishes in which it stands. Some small vestiges exist, on the south-west side of the river, of the church of a monastic building. This structure was founded in the 13th century, by Richard de St. Michael, Lord of Rheban, for crouched friars. The precincts of the monastery impinged on the river at the end of the bridge, and included all that part of the town's area now called St. John and St. John's Lane; and the domain consisted of the island in the river, and of the adjacent fields as far as the present barracks. The property of the friary was, in 1575, granted to Anthony Power; and, reverting to the crown, it was, by act of parliament 17 and 18 Charles II., granted to Dame Mary Meredith.—Another monastery, a Dominican one, was, in 1253, founded, on the north-east side of the river, by the families of the Boisels and Hogans. Its precincts extended from the river along the north side of the present church, to the corner of the street leading to Preston's-gate; and thence they extended to that gate, and to the rear of the gardens of the house called the Abbey; and its domain consisted of 6 messuages on and around the present site of the town, 12½ acres of islands in the river, 1 acre of heath in Ardree, a water-mill at Tulloghnorre, and 2 fishing weirs on the Barrow. The whole property was, in 1544, granted to Martin Polles, in capite for ever, at the annual rent of 2s. 8d. Irish. Preston's-gate, incidentally alluded to, was the postern gate of the monastery, and the only surviving vestige of it long after all the other buildings had perished.—Woodstock-castle, situated on the south-west margin of the river, 3 furlongs above the bridge, is an imposing ruin of a structure, hoary with antiquity, and somewhat impressive in historical association. See WOODSTOCK. White's Castle, situated at the end of the bridge, and now consisting of only a single square tower, is the remnant of a fortress built about the year 1506, by Gerald, eighth Earl of Kildare, for the purpose of securing, jointly with other fortresses, the frontier of the pale. The castle was repaired and enlarged, in 1575, by a person called William White, and thence derived its present name; and the remaining tower of it was, till a few years ago, used as a county gaol jointly with the prison of Naas.—The new gaol, situated on the outskirts of the town and on the road to Carlow, is on the semicircular plan, and contains 32 cells, 3 solitary cells, 6 day-rooms, 2 work-rooms, 6 yards, 2 hospital-rooms, a chapel, and a kitchen. "This small second gaol in the county," says the inspector in 1841, "I found on my inspection in very good order, and every exertion made by the Board of Superintendence and the Officers to conduct the internal discipline on reformatory principles. The small size of the cells, having been erected with a view only to separation at night, prevents at present the possibility of making a trial of the separate system by day also; and till that mode of moral discipline is found in practice to be the best, I will not urge on the Grand Jury to go to any further expense. But, in other respects, this prison is conducted on sound principles; and the small number of criminals confined, viz., an average of 26 daily in the last year, are employed at profitable or useful work, such as weaving, shoe-making, and tailors, picking oakum, and stone-breaking for the roads."—The court-house and the barracks require no remark.—A workhouse for the Athy Poor-law union, is built on a site given free of charge by the Duke of Leinster; it occupies an area of 6 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches; it cost £5,600 for building and completion, besides a large sum for fittings and contingencies, charged against the union; and it contains accommodation for 500 persons. An excellent district fever hospital in the town was originated by the gift of £116 as the nucleus of a subscription, by a benevolent gentleman who had received that sum as relief or compensation for an accidental burning; and, in the Report published in 1841, the hospital is stated to have been in receipt of £758 12s. 5d. from subscription, to have at that time received no aid in the form of a county grant, and to have just commenced the giving of relief. The pop. within its district was 50,457. In 1839-40, a dispensary in the town received £166 8s. 3d., expended £184 4s. 11d., administered to 2,628 patients, and served for a district of 39,089 acres, with a pop. of 13,057.

Poor-Law Union.—The Athy Poor-law union ranks as the 125th, and was declared on Jan. 10, 1841. It comprises parts of co. Kildare and Queen's co., amounting to 161,878 acres, and containing, in 1831, a pop. of 50,907. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Kildare, Athy, 7,709; Killybry, 1,732; Monastereven, 6,636; Ballybrackan, 3,728; Davidstown, 3,651; Narraghmore, 2,609; Moone, 1,826; and Castle-Dermot, 5,334;—and, in Queen's co., Moyanna, 1,659; Dysertown, 2,793; Stradbally, 3,263; Ballyadams, 3,160; Tullamoy, 1,827; and Killabin, 4,720. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 8 and 24; and of the latter, 4 are returned by the Athy division; 2 by each of the divisions of Monastereven, Ballybrackan, Davidstown, Castle-Dermot, Stradbally, Ballyadams, and Killabin, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The union came into operation on Jan. 23, 1841; but its workhouse was not opened at the date of our latest report, Feb. 6, 1843. The dispensary districts within the union are 4 in number, and have their seats at Athy, Castle-Dermot, Monastereven, and Stradbally; they unitedly comprise an area of 151,879 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 42,761; and in 1839-40, they received £575 19s. 4d., expended £509 8s., and administered to 10,418 patients.

Trade.—Athy is, as an inland town, very advantageously situated for trade. A branch of the Grand canal was cut from Monastereven to the western side of the town in 1790; and forms a junction with the river Barrow, at a point 500 yards below the bridge.

The Barrow navigation, all below the town, is available for barges; and connects Athy with all the places which intervene during the long run to the ocean, and with the port of Waterford on the river Suir. Yet the local trade, either in the department of manufacture or in that of commerce, is very much less than might be expected. While the great south road lay through the town, as it did from a very early period till some time after the commencement of the last century, trade was strong and lively; but after it was deflected through Castle-Dermot, business sickened to utter enfeeblement; and, even in spite of the opening of the canal and the improvement of the Barrow navigation, it did not till a very few years ago begin very visibly to revive. Though some stuffs, cloths, and coarse hats are made, and though various classes of artificers work for the supply of the local market, the aggregate amount of produce from all sources can hardly be called a manufacture. Corn purchased in the weekly markets, and exported by both the Barrow and the canal, constitutes the great article of trade; and, owing to the advantage of ready shipment, and the freedom of the markets from tolls and customs, it brings a better price than in the neighbouring towns. Owing to judicious encouragements by the Duke of Leinster and the corporation, this trade and its kindred branches have of late years considerably increased. In 1833, the quantity of grain sold was 57,720 barrels of wheat, 19,472 of oats, and 8,075 of barley. Weekly markets are held on Tuesday and Saturday; and annual fairs, on March 17, April 25, June 9, July 25, Oct. 10, and Dec. 11. The public conveyances, in 1838, were a car to Carlow, 2 coaches in transit between Dublin and Kilkenny, and the mail-coach in transit between Dublin and Cork.

Municipal Affairs.—Athy was created a borough by charter of 11 James I.; and had additional charters or letters-patent of 4 James II., 22 Charles II., and 30 George II. The limits of the old borough describe a circle with a radius of half-a-mile around White's Castle; but, according to the new arrangement, they are more contracted, are all included in the old, and, though comprehending less than half of the area, yet contain the whole of the town. According to charter, the corporation is entitled "The Sovereign, Bailiffs, Free Burgesses, and Commonalty, of the Borough of Athy;" its officers are a sovereign, 2 bailiffs, 12 burgesses, a recorder, 3 sergeants-at-mace, a town-clerk and billet-master, a treasurer, a bellman, a weighmaster, and an inspector of coats and culm; and its governing body are the sovereign, bailiffs, and burgesses, with power of self-election. The constituency became, of course, completely exclusive; and the members of the governing body were the mere tools, or, in softer phrase, the immediate friends and adherents of the proprietor of the town, the Duke of Leinster. The corporation derives not from the charters any power of holding a court; and has no exclusive jurisdiction, criminal or civil. A court held on the first Monday of every month, and entertaining civil causes to the amount of £2 Irish, is presided over by the sovereign, and called the sovereign's court. Another court, presided over by the sovereign, called the borough court, and entertaining civil causes to an unlimited amount, ceased, in 1827, to be held. Athy is alternately with Naas the assize town of the county; and is always the seat of the summer assizes. Quarter-sessions are held in January and June. Petty-sessions, presided over by the sovereign and by county magistrates, are held every Tuesday. A court called a Presenting court is annually held in October; it consists of a grand jury of 23, selected from about 50, of the most respectable inhabitants, summoned by the town-clerk; it sits only a few hours, and presents for the repairs of the bye-ways, sewers, and public pumps. The amount raised under its authority was, in 1832, £34 17s. 6d.; in 1831, £27 15s. 6d.; in 1827-30, £23 2s. The only borough police are the sergeants-at-mace. A chief constable and 11 of the county constabulary are stationed in the town, and act under the sovereign as a justice-of-peace. The corporation have no landed property, and are alleged to have never had any revenue except from tolls and crange. In 1833, the receipts, from these two sources, amounted to £144 9s. 1d.; and the disbursements, in expenses of collection and in salaries to officers, amounted to £131 5s. 5d. The borough, previous to the Union, sent two members to parliament; and when it lost its franchise, £1,200 of its compensation money was paid to Lord Ennismore, and £13,800 to the trustees of William, Duke of Leinster, upon the trusts of his marriage settlement. Area of the town, 211 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,494; in 1841, 4,698. Houses 790. Area of the Churchtown section, 52 acres. Pop., in 1831, 706; in 1841, 823. Houses 142. Area of the St. John's section, 66 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,603; in 1841, 1,387. Houses 230. Area of the St. Michael section, 93 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,185; in 1841, 2,485. Houses 418.

History.—A battle is said by Keating to have been fought in the 2d or 3d century, on the site of Athy, between the people of Munster and those of Leix, under Lavaghseagh Cean Mordha; and a ford at the place was anciently a practicable and frequented passage between the principality of Leix or Lavaghseagh in Queen's co., and that of Cellaugh or Caellan in co. Kildare. These two circumstances may account for two ancient names of the place,—Ath-Trodain, 'the ford of conflict,' and Ath-Bhiedhbha, 'the ford of the adversary.' The latter of these names, as pronounced in the Erse fashion, though looking in Roman letters as if unpronounceable, is very nearly the short modern Athy. But, a name by which—in the corrupted form of Bla-Theag, pronounced Blabai, the town continues to be known—is Bally-da-Dhne, 'the town of the two houses;' and seems evidently to refer to the two monasteries built in the 13th century. The founding of these establishments is asserted to have been the origin of the town; and as they were founded by English settlers, not only the monks, but the inhabitants of the town, were principally of that nation. In 1308, the town was burnt by the Irish. In the following year, Lord John de Bonnerille, slain near the town of Ardskill, was interred in the church of the Athy abbey of crouched friars. In 1315, the town was plundered by the Scots under Bruce; and Haymond le Grace and Sir William Pendergrist on the English side, and Sir Fergus Andriam and Sir Walter Murray on the Scots side, were slain at the battle of Ardskill, and all interred in the Athy abbey of Dominican friars. See ARDSKILL: see also ARDREE. About the year 1424, Thomas, seventh Earl of Kildare, then Lord Offaly, obtained, by marriage with Dorothea, daughter of Anthony O'More of Leix, the manors of Woodstock and Rheban, including the town of Athy, and established within them a court-baron and court-leet. Various historical passages are connected with the castle of WOODSTOCK: which see. Athy, from the gradual contraction of the English pale, became a frontier and garrison town, commanding an important passage over the Barrow, and, in this connection, it received the accession of the fortalice, the remaining tower of which is called White's Castle. In 1642, the Earl of Ormond arrived at the town with 3,000 foot and 500 horse; and sent out from it parties to relieve the garrisons of Carlow, Ballinakill, Berte, Cloghgreennan, and Ballylinen. In 1648, Owen Roe O'Neil, at the head of his Irish force, took possession of the town; but, being harried pressed by Jones, the parliamentary general, he offered to surrender Athy, Rheban, and Maryborough, and to lay down his arms, on condition of his confederates and himself enjoying the same privileges as in the time of King James. In 1650, the town and castle were captured by Cols. Hewson and Reynolds.

ATHY, or NICHOLASTOWN, an ecclesiastical union of parishes, and a benefice, partly in Queen's co., but chiefly in co. Kildare, Leinster. It consists of the parishes of ATHY ST. JOHN, ATHY ST. MICHAEL, CHURCHTOWN, TANKARDSTOWN, and ARDREE: see these articles. Excepting part of Tankardstown, and a pendicle of Athy St. John, which are in Queen's co., all the union is on the south-west border of co. Kildare. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 5. Pop., in 1831, 8,628.—This benefice is in the dio. of Dublin. Gross income, £554 2s. 6d.; nett, £472 19s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates are employed at salaries of respectively £75 and £35. The church, situated in the parish of Athy St. Michael, and not far from the east end of the bridge in the town of Athy, is so old a building that the date and cost of its erection are unascertainable. Sittings 600; average attendance, from 280 to 300. The chapel in the gaol is served every Sabbath by both a Protestant and a Roman Catholic officiate. Roman Catholic parochial chapels exist in Athy St. Michael and in Tankardstown, and will be noticed in the articles on these parishes. The chapel of a friary in the town has an attendance of from 50 to 60, and is served by two friars. A Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by from 50 to 200; a chapel of Protestant dissenters, following the doctrines of Mr. Kelly, by from 30 to 40; and a private house, used as a separatist place of worship, by from 12 to 20. In 1834, the inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,164 Churchmen, 33 Protestant dissenters, and 7,815 Roman Catholics; and 7 daily schools had on their books 322 boys and 186 girls.

ATHY ST. JOHN, a parish, partly in the barony of Ballyadams, Queen's co., but chiefly in that of West Narragh, and Rheban, co. Kildare, Leinster. Its main body lies on the right bank of the Barrow; four small pendicles of it lie detached and isolated in Athy St. Michael's; and its Kildare section contains part of the town of ARTHY. Near its south border is Tonlegee-house. Length, 1 mile; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,123 acres,—of which 102 acres are in the Queen's co. section, and 66 acres in the town of Athy. Pop., in 1831, 1,955; in 1841, 1,781. Houses 295. Pop., in 1841, of Queen's co. section, 10; of the rural districts of co. Kildare section, 384. Houses in these respectively, 3 and 62.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Dublin, and forms part of the benefice of Athy. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £42 10s., and the rectorial for £85; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the representatives of William Richardson. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 420 Churchmen, 18 Protestant dissenters, and 1,641 Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, Roman Catholic chapel, nor daily school.

ATHY ST. MICHAEL, a parish, partly in the barony of Kilkea and Moone, but chiefly in that of West Narragh and Rheban, co. Kildare, Leinster. It lies on the left bank of the Barrow; and its Narragh and Rheban section, contains part of the town of ARTHY. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,881 acres,—of which 567 acres are in Kilkea and Moone, and 93 acres are in the town of Athy. Pop., in 1831, 2,388; in 1841, 2,849. Houses 473. Pop. of the Kilkea and Moone section, in 1841, 94.

Houses 16. Pop. of the rural districts of the Narragh and Rheban section, in 1841, 270. Houses 39.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Dublin, and forms the seat of the benefice of Athy. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £37 13s. 2d., and the rectorial for £75 6s. 4d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the representatives of Michael Graig. The church is noticed in the article on the benefice. The Roman Catholic chapel has 3 services on each Sabbath and holiday, is attended by 2,000 at each service, and shares with the chapel of Tankarilstown the care of 3 officiates. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 360 Churchmen, 2 Protestant dissenters, and 2,174 Roman Catholics; and 3 daily schools had on their books 252 boys, 136 girls, besides an attendance of from 10 to 12 children whose sex is not specified. One of the schools was a parochial school, in two departments, attended by 84 boys and 60 girls, and salaried with £50 to master and mistress; and another was a National school, attended by 108 boys and 76 girls, and aided by the Board with £22—but, in 1840, with £27.

ATTANAGH, a parish, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-east of Castle-Dunrow, and partly in the barony of Clarmalagh, Queen's co., but chiefly in that of Fassadinning, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1. Area of the Queen's co. section, 631 acres; of the co. Kilkenny section, 1,930 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 750; in 1841, 919. Houses 133. Pop. of the Queen's co. section, in 1831, 122; in 1841, 136. Houses 18. Pop. of the Kilkenny section, in 1831, 628; in 1841, 783. Houses 115.—The parish is touched on the west by the Nore, and traversed south-westward by one of that river's affluents. The land is well cultivated and tolerably fertile.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £46 3s. 1d.; and the rectorial tithes, the value of which is not stated, are appropriate. The vicarages of Attanagh and AHARNET, and the rectories of KILMENAN and ROSCONNEL [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Attanagh. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2½. Gross income, £541 6s. 3d.; nett, £453 8s. 7½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church, situated in Attanagh, was built in 1821, by means of a loan of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance, from 40 to 80. The Roman Catholic chapel at Ballyouket is attended by from 730 to 750, and shares with Ballyragget chapel the care of two officiates. There is a Roman Catholic chapel also at Lisdowney. In 1834, the Protestants of Attanagh parish amounted to 68, and the Roman Catholics to 721; the Protestants of the union to 115, and the Roman Catholics to 3,967; the daily schools of the parish to 2, with from 45 to 105 boys, and from 30 to 38 girls; and the daily schools of the union to 7, with 200 boys and 100 girls.

ATTENASSY. See ATTHASSETY.

ATTYMASS, or ALTMASS, a parish in the barony of Gallen, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north of Foxford, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2; area, 11,154 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,276; in 1841, 3,435. Houses 644. The surface has a northern exposure; is bounded on the west by the river Moy; on the east by the Ox mountains; and exhibits a chilling predominance of bog, marsh, moor, and unprofitable upland. One of the Ox mountains on the east has an altitude of 1,005 feet; and three lakes in the west have aggregately an area of 468 acres.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Killalla, and forms part of the benefice of ARDACH: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £93 3s. 2½d.; the rectorial tithes, jointly with those of Kilgarvin, for £231 2s. 7½d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Sir William Palmer. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 727, and is served by one officiate. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 34, and the Roman Catholics to 3,478; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 153 boys and 100 girls. In 1840, the National Board granted £74 3s. 4d. toward the building and fitting up of a school at Triencrae.

AUBURN, LISHOY, or LISSOY, a hamlet or decayed village, in the parish and barony of Kilkenny-West, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands in a picturesque tract of country, not far from the beautiful arm of Lough Ree, called Killymore Lough, about 6 miles north-east of Athlone, and 3 south-west of Ballymahon, on the direct road between these towns. Lishoy is the proper name of the place; and Auburn a name, first imposed by Goldsmith, and now generally adopted from admiration of his poetry. Both the village, and various places in its vicinity, are celebrated in connection with the family, nativity, history, and writings of the poet. See ARDACH, BALLYMAHON, and KILKENNY-WEST. Topographers, tourists, and critics seem all to agree with the belief of the local populace, that Lissoy is Goldsmith's Auburn. "I do not," says Mr. Inglis in 1834, whom we quote in preference to other writers, on account of his being more pleasingly minute, "I do not entertain the least doubt that the village of Lishoy is the Auburn of Goldsmith, though it is equally certain that he has grafted upon its scenery English pictures of rural things and country life. Here are still the remains of 'the busy mill;' there the decent church still tops the neighbouring hill; here is the village preacher's 'modest mansion;' and there the arch of stones within which stood the 'hawthorn bush.' Lishoy was Goldsmith's favourite village; he mentions it often, and always with enthusiasm, in his letters; he passed his early years in it, or in its immediate neighbourhood, and could therefore say, 'Scenes of my youth.' All the scenery of the poem connects it with this village; for although the perishable has perished, yet all is remembered to have been as Goldsmith painted it. The preacher's mansion, now a roofless and windowless tenement, is known to have been the minister's house; and that minister is known to have been the poet's brother, and to have been, not the rector, but the curate,* on a small salary—perhaps £40 a-year, and, moreover, to have been loved and respected. The church—not in the village, or its immediate neighbourhood, where a church generally is—but topping 'the neighbouring hill,' is still seen as it is described. It is only a few years since the hawthorn bush was in its place; and opposite, 'near yonder thorn,' stands the alehouse, though not the identical house with the 'nicely sanded floor' of which Goldsmith speaks. At some little distance from the village rises a mansion which belonged to a General Naper, who, some time after 1730, [1738?] is known to have enclosed a domain, and to have ejected the tenantry. I had nearly omitted to observe, that in the name of the house where 'news much older than the ale went round,' there is strong evidence in favour of the claim of Lishoy. The alehouse is, and always has been, called the 'Three Pigeons.' Now, Goldsmith has shown on more than one occasion, great fondness for this name. There is no doubt, however, that Goldsmith has grafted English life upon Irish scenery, and that rural life in an English village,

* Mr. Inglis seems here oblivious of the fact that Goldsmith's father was rector of Kilkenny-West, and resided at Lissoy, until his death in 1747, and that it was of his much-loved paternal home the poet vaticinated only too truly in the well-known lines commencing, "Near yonder copse," &c.

and some pictures exclusively English, have been transplanted to Lishoy. The 'nicely sanded floor,' and 'varnished clock,' and 'hearth' with 'flowers and fennel gay,' little resemble the Irish village ale-house with its mud floor and turf fire. Indeed, an alehouse has no existence in Ireland, because ale is not the beverage of the people. But, notwithstanding these discrepancies which are easily accounted for, Lishoy is unquestionably 'Sweet Auburn,' and Goldsmith took all his pictures of still life, and some others besides, from his favourite village, of which he says in one of his letters: 'If I go to the opera, I sit and sigh for Lishoy fireside, and Johnny Armstrong's 'Last good night' from Peggy Golden; or if I climb up Hampstead hill, I confess it is fine; but then, I had rather be placed on the little mount before Lishoy gate, and there take in, to me, the most pleasing horizon in nature.' Several years ago, an effort was made to raise funds for erecting in or near Auburn a monument to the poet; but, like many a more important attempt connected with Irish literature, it proved abortive. In the vicinity of the village stands Auburn-house, the seat of John Hogan, Esq., sending down a sheet of plantation to the margin of Lough Ree.

AUDEON (Sr.). See DUBLIN.

AUDLEY, a locality on the west coast of Lough Strangford, a little above the town of Strangford, co. Down, Ulster. Audley road, in the Lough, is one of the few places in that marine sheet of water, which afford safe anchorage. Audley-castle, boldly situated near Lord Bangor's demesne, on a projecting eminence which commands a view of the whole lake, is the ruin of an edifice variously stated to have been one of 27 fortalices built round Lough Strangford by De Courcy, and a fortified mansion erected by a follower of De Courcy of the name of Audley, and the ancestor of a family long known in the district, but now extinct.

AUDLEY, co. Cork. See CAPPAGH-HILL.

AUGHA, or AGUA, a parish in the barony of Idrone-East, containing part of the town of Leighlin-Bridge, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 4,184 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,739; in 1841, 2,027. Houses 347. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 794; in 1841, 1,197. Houses 188. The surface extends along the east side of the river Barrow, and consists of the best description of arable land. A religious establishment is said to have been founded here by St. Finian, who died in the 6th century, and to have been pillaged by the Danes in 864. See LEIGHLIN-BRIDGE.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Leighlin, and forms part of the benefice of DUNLECKNEY: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £138 9s. 2½d., and the rectorial for £276 18s. 5½d.; and the latter are inappropriate in Colonel Weldon. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,800; and, in common with some other chapels, is served by 4 officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 250, and the Roman Catholics to 1,540; and 3 schools of the National Board, and a private school, had on their books 133 boys and 248 girls.

AUGHABEHY, a rich section, probably the most important one, of the interesting coal district on the northern border of co. Roscommon, Connaught. See ARIGNA. This section belongs to Colonel Tenison, and lies in the vicinity of Castle-Tenison, the Colonel's seat. It commences at the Arigna river, and extends, with a considerable breadth, toward the crest of the ridgy hill or mountain which contains three other sections of the mineral field. The quantity of coal probably contained in Aughabehy, is estimated by Mr. Twigg at 2,550, and by Mr. Griffith at 4,840 tons per English acre; and as the coal-bed is computed to comprise 160 acres, the total produce, according to the two estimates, would be respectively 408,000, and 774,400 tons. A large fault runs across the mountain, and throws down the strata several yards perpendicular into the west. In a small tract which has been worked on the north-east side of the fault, the seam of coal is nowhere quite two feet thick, and, in most places considerably thinner; but at two shafts which have been sunk on the leap down side of the fault, the seam averages 2 feet, 7½ inches in thickness, and excepting about half-an-inch, is coal that will produce strong coke. "The bed of coal," says Mr. Twigg, "here dips at a very gradual declination towards the centre of the mountain; and I am certain it is the same bed as breaks out at the surface of the land, on the south-west side of the mountain, in the direction from Aughabehy colliery towards Castle-Tenison. This bed is what, in several mining districts, would be called a trough or dish coal, viz., dipping or declining from the surface of the land very gradually, in a certain direction for a long space, and then rising in the same direction until the same bed made its way out on the contrary side of the mountain, at the surface." A railway of 5,500 yards in length connects the Aughabehy colliery with the Arigna iron-works.

AUGHACREW. See AGHACREW.

AUGHADERRY, a hamlet in the barony of Trough, and on the north border of co. Monaghan, a little south of Aughnacloy, Ulster. In 1842, a Loan Fund here had a capital of £564, circulated £1,818 in 491 loans, cleared a nett profit of £5 5s., and expended for charitable purposes £15.

AUGHADOWN. See AGHADOWN.

AUGHADRESBAN, one of a cluster of bogs, on the north border of the westerly projection of co. Roscommon, but partly also within co. Mayo, Connaught. The cluster comprehends the bogs of Aughadresban, Aughalusta, Aughahurriin, Ballaghadreen, Crenne, Drumalissan, Roosky, and some minor penicles of morass. It lies on each side of the new road between the towns of Ballaghadreen and Loughglyn, and it is bisected by the Lung, and subdivided by several of that river's little affluents. Area, 3,406 acres, 2 roods, 2 perches. Estimated expense of reclamation, £6,223 17s. Limestone and manuring gravel occur all round the bogs, and in patches of land which intersect them; and may be obtained within 80 perches of almost any part of the interior. "In a part of these bogs," says Mr. Longfield, "and on the road-side from Loughglyn to Crenne bridge, there may be seen a very curious example of the effects of natural irrigation on red bog. This irrigation is occasioned by the springs at the north end of Aughadresban, which forms a small deep lough on the road-side at a point which commands the whole fall of that part of the bog for about 100 perches to the river Lung, and through which the overflows of the lake constantly make their way to the said river; creating, in their progress over the red bog, which is from 20 to 30 feet deep, a natural stripe of fine vegetable pasture, which is generally the greenest spot in the country, and eagerly sought after by the cattle in summer time; so much so, that I have seen heifers in imminent danger of being bogged at every step they made through this soft pasture."

AUGHAGOUR, AGHAGOWER, or AYLE, a parish in the baronies of Burrischoole and Murrisk, 4 miles south-east of Westport, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 25 miles; breadth, 6. Area of the Burrischoole section, 12,931 acres; of the Murrisk section, 42,117 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 11,963; in 1841, 12,235. Houses 2,252. Pop. of the Burrischoole section, in 1831, 6,009; in 1841, 5,459. Houses 999. Pop. of the Murrisk section, in 1831, 5,864; in 1841, 6,776. Houses 1,253. The village of Aughagour stands in the Burrischoole section. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 176. Houses 33. The southern division of the parish is chiefly wild, bleak, impracticable mountain; and the northern division is, to a large extent, bog and moor, interspersed with lakes and turloughs. Only a small part is arable; and not many spots have attractions for either the agriculturist or the lover of rich landscape. Much of the surface is drained south-westward to Killery Harbour by the river; and a considerable part lies within the basin of the Ayle. The extent of water in the Burrischoole section is 153 acres; and in the Murrisk section, 403 acres. Lough Glenarragh, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles north-east of the head of Killery Harbour, lies at an elevation of 777 feet above sea-level. This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Tuam, and forms part of the benefice of WESTPORT: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £355, and the rectorial for £95; and the latter are appropriate to the archdeacon of Tuam and the prebendary of Killybegs. The original church is said to have belonged to the monastery of Achad-Fobhair, which, like multitudes of other ecclesiastical structures in Ireland, affects to have been built by St. Patrick; and it had in its vicinity one of the ancient round towers which figure so uniquely, and with such prominence, among the antiquities of the country. The present church was built in 1827, by means of a gift of £766 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 58. A school-house at Ardygounmon is also used as a parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 44. One Roman Catholic chapel at Aughagour is attended by 1,500, one at Errive by 500, a private house used as one at Carrakinnedy by from 400 to 500; and the three places are served by two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 578, and the Roman Catholics to 12,258; and a free-school at Ayle or Aughagour, aided with £18 from the Tuam Diocesan Education Society, and a sum from subscription; a free-school at Ardygounmon, aided with £15 from the same society, and a sum from subscription; 3 daily schools at Aughagour, Cashinkee, and Lammore, aided with respectively £12, £10, and £8, from the National Board; and two pay-schools at Carranmore and Triangle, had aggregate on their books 484 boys and 240 girls, besides 60 children whose sex is not specified. In 1840, the National schools seem to have disappeared.

AUGHALOO, AGHALOO, or AUGHLOR, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the town of CALEDON: which see. Length, 6 miles; breadth, $\frac{4}{5}$; area, 19,583 acres,—of which 140 acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 10,144; in 1841, 9,867. Houses 1,676. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 9,065; in 1841, 8,821. Houses 1,505. The river Blackwater, flowing north-eastward, divides the parish from the county of Armagh. The land is nearly all profitable, and over about three-fourths of the area forms good or prime tillage and pasture-ground. The surface is beautifully undulated, well cultivated, and, in some places, profusely wooded; and it forms a series of interesting close landscapes. Caledon-hill, the seat of the Earl of Caledon, in the vicinity of the town of Caledon, is an elegant mansion in the midst of a well-wooded and brilliant demesne; and other noticeable residences are Crilly House, Linepark Lodge, Annaghroe, and Hermitage.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ar-magh, and forms part of the benefice of Carrenteel, and corps of the archdeaconry of Armagh. See CARRENTEEL. Tithe composition, £609. A perpetual curacy, called indifferently Aughaloo and Caledon, is co-extensive with the parish. Gross income, £118 2s.; nett, £96 5s. 4d. Patron, the archdeacon of Armagh. The church was built about the year 1770, by means of private subscription and parochial assessment, and enlarged about 1827 by means of an assessment of £200. Sittings 750; attendance 350. One Presbyterian meeting-house at Minterburn is attended by 300, one at Crillig by 150, and one at Caledon by 150. The Roman Catholic chapel is attended by 684, and shares with two chapels in Carrenteel the care of three officiates. There is also an Independent chapel. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 2,831 Churchmen, 4,265 Presbyterians, 58 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,491 Roman Catholics; 14 Sunday schools at Caledon, Lisnulladown, Winterburne, Derrylappen, Tullybleaty, Tanaghblane, Dion, Bohard, Cullough, Ramatrit, Relaghey, and Drummond, were attended by 522 boys, 411 girls, and 100 other children, whose sex is not specified; and 13 daily schools at Drungarn, Crumbrin, Caledon, Bamuket, Mullaghmore, Winterburne, Dynan, Rahaby, Calock, Tullybleaty, and Mullinahone, had on their books 680 boys and 505 girls. One of the schools, a school for females, was supported wholly by the Countess of Caledon; 4 were aided, each with £5 from the Earl of Caledon, and £1 10s. from the curate; one was aided with subscriptions from the curate and one of the Presbyterian ministers; one had £10 from the rector, £8 from the Earl of Caledon, and a house and 4 acres of land demised by Lord Cork; one had £8 from the National Board; and the rest were all pay-schools. In 1840, the National Board had schools at Caledon, Knockaroy, Showerood, Rahaby, and Mulnahorn; and gave one of them £4, one £3, and each of the others £12.

AUGHANAGH, or AGHANAGH, a parish in the south-west corner of the barony of Tiraghroll, co. Sligo, and 5 miles north-west of Boyle, Connaught. It contains the village of BALLINAFAD: which see. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 8,839 acres; of which 1,091 acres are under water. Pop., in 1831, 2,393; in 1841, 2,714. Houses 464. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,559. Houses 432. Along the east extends the beautiful islet sheet of water, called Lough Arrow. See ARROW. Along the south extend the Curlew mountains, and along the west the mountains of Kishkorran. The vale between the Lough and the higher upland range is the seat of the parochial population. Near its head stands the village of Ballinafad; and further down is the mansion of Hollybrook. The Curlew hills are crossed, and the vale along Lough Arrow traversed, by the railroad from Dublin to Sligo.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Elphin, and forms part of the benefice of BOYLE: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £48 9s. 2d., and the rectorial, jointly with those of Boyle and Kilmarallan, for £313, and the latter are inappropriate and belong to Viscount Lorton. The Roman Catholic chapel has an officiate for itself, and an attendance of 550. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 110, and the Roman Catholics to 2,404; and one daily and pay school had on its books 60 boys and 30 girls. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school at Gurtelough were attended by respectively 103 and 91, and had, the former £12, and the latter £8, from the National Board.

AUGHANLOO. See AGHANLOO.

AUGHANUNCON, or AUGHANUNSHON, a parish about half-way between Letterkenney and Rathmelton, in the barony of Kilmacrenan, co. Donegal, Ulster. Length and breadth, each 2½ miles; area, 4,012 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,848; in 1841, 1,649. Houses 292. The surface declines eastward to the margin of the upper part of Lough Swilly, and is traversed northward by the road from Letterkenney to Rathmelton. The land is in general good.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio of Raphoe. Tithe composition, £147. Gross income, £443; nett, £361 17s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is a very old building. Sitings 150; attendance 40. There is no other place of worship. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 288 Churchmen, 771 Presbyterians, and 898 Roman Catholics: 3 Sunday schools were attended by 94 children; and 3 daily schools, one of which was aided with a gratuity from the London Hibernian Society, and each of the other two with £5 10s. 9d. from Robinson's Benefaction, had on their books 181 boys and 147 girls.

AUGHARA. See ANARA.

AUGHAVALL, or OGUEVAL, a parish on the northern border of the barony of Murrisk, co. Mayo, Connaught. It contains the towns of WESTPORT and WESTPORT-QUAY: which see. Length, 12 miles; breadth, 4; area, 33,695 acres. Pop., in 1831, 15,315; in 1841, 13,441. Houses 2,255. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 8,529. Houses 1,568. In the north-east corner are the rich vale, the beautiful town, the charming demesne, and the brilliant bay of Westport; near the north-west corner rises the magnificent and panoramic-viewing CROAGHPATRICK [which see]; and respectively on the west-border, and 4 miles to the west of it, rise Knockaskiheez and Oughty, the former lifting its summit 1,288 feet, and the latter 1,104 feet above sea-level. The sea-bord westward from Westport-Quay extends 7 miles along Clew bay, and is almost everywhere a perfect gallery of landscape; and the corner of the parish around Westport, Westport-Quay, and Belclare, is highly ornate, and occasionally luscious; but the great inland district south from Croaghpatrick to within 2 miles of the head of Killery harbour, is almost a wilderness of coarse moors and uplands,—a rough and tumultuous intermixture of mountain, bog, pool, pasture, and defile. The Owenwee river flows in the north, the Owenmore in the centre, and the Owenduff on part of the southern boundary. Two lakes, respectively in the south, and near the centre, have an altitude, the former of 791 feet, and the latter of 592, above sea-level. The road from Westport to Louisburgh passes along the coast.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of WESTPORT [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Vicarial tithe composition, £225; glebe, £25. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £75, and are appropriated to the archdeaconry of Tuam and the prebend of Killybegs. The church was built in 1797 by means of a gift of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 600; attendance 300. The Westport Roman Catholic chapel is attended by from 3,000 to 4,000; the Lickany one by 1,100, and the Drummin one by from 600 to 700; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, these chapels are mutually united, and have 4 officiates. The Presbyterian and the Methodist meeting-houses in Westport have an attendance, the former of from 36 to 40, and the latter of from 80 to 100. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 483 Churchmen, 58 Presbyterians, 53 other Protestant dissenters, and 14,538 Roman Catholics; 5 daily schools, which returned no precise lists, were attended by about 150 children; and 16 other daily schools had on their books 750 boys and 396 girls. Two of the schools were aided with each £7 from subscription, and respectively £12 and £10 from the National Board; two with £20 each from the Tuam Diocesan Society and from subscription; one with £16 from the Tuam Diocesan Society; and one with £23 from subscription. In 1840, the National Board granted £111 5s. toward the erection of a boys school and a girls' school at Murrisk.

AUGHAVASS, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio of Ardagh. Post-town, Carrigallen. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

AUGHAVEA, or AGHAVEA, a parish in the barony of Magherastephana, 1½ mile east of Maguire's Bridge, co. Fermanagh. It contains the village of BROOKBOROUGH: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth 4; area, 17,142 acres. Pop., in 1831, 6,279; in 1841, 6,730. Houses 1,188. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 5,799; in 1841, 6,239. Houses 1,109. A pendicle of 45½ acres lies detached, 3 furlongs to the east, in Aghalurcher. About one-seventh of the parochial area is mountainous; 17½ acres are water; and the remainder consists, in the aggregate, of middle-rate land. The Colebrook river washes the centre; and the Tempo rivulet washes the western wing. The demesnes are Nutfield, Abbey-Lodge, Gola, Draper-Hill, and Green-Hill. The road from Lisnaskea to Clogher passes north-eastward through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £300; glebe, £68 12s. 6d. Gross income, £368 12s. 6d.; nett, £300 6s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church cost £705 11s. 2½.; and, in 1810, a tower was added to it, by means of a loan of £276 18s. 5½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 400; attendance 250. The Roman Catholic chapel has two officiates, and an attendance of 750. The Wesleyan chapel has an attendance of 150. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 3,543 Churchmen, 223 Presbyterians, and 2,515 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school at Gola was attended by 80 children; and 12 daily schools at Brookborough, Tattenbar, Skeagh, Tatnamore, Aughavea, Coarsefield, Ardnuncheon, Cleffaney, Littlemount, and Ardmore, had on their books 407 boys and 277 girls. Two of the daily schools were connected with the London Hibernian Society, one with the Kildare Place Society, and one with the National Board; and another was aided with £14 from subscription, and a house, garden, and allowances.

AUGHAVILLER, or AGHAVILLER, a parish in the barony of Knocktopher, 2½ miles south-west of the town of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It contains the villages of HUGGINSTOWN and BOOLYGLASS: which see. Area, 5,671 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,887; in 1841, 1,997. Houses 317. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,494; in 1841, 1,508. Houses 227. The surface is decorated with the beautiful mansion and demesne of CASTLEMORRES [see that article]; and is traversed by the road from Kilkenny to Carrick-on-Suir, and by the new road from Newmarket to Piltown. Much of it is hilly and wooded; part is low and flat; and part is a mixture of bog, marsh, moor, and upland tillage. The road to Piltown commences in the parish, proceeds by the demesne of Castlemorres, ascends with a gradient varying between one foot in twenty and one in forty, and traverses the high mixed tract of spongy, moorish, and arable ground. At its commencement, and within Castlemorres demesne, stand the ruins of a castle, an abbey, and a round tower. The castle now consists principally of the keep or body of the original building; it appears to have been of great magnitude; and, along with an extensive circumjacent estate, it was for a long period the seat of a junior branch of the Ballylinch family of Grace, and was eventually seized by the authorities of the Commonwealth as the property of a royalist. The ruin contains the sepulchral vault of the Castlemorres family. "In connection with this place of funeral deposit," says the author of the Beauties of Ireland, "we are enabled to present an anecdote strongly illustrative of the tenacity with which the Irish 'chiefs' of ancient families are prone to maintain their rights and hereditary privileges. The first Viscount Mountmorres having become possessed by the gift of Sir Redmond Morres, Bart., of the Knockagh estates, in the county of Tipperary, proposed to transfer the place of sepulture of his immediate line to that county. On the death of his lady, he accordingly despatched a party of workmen from his own seat to Lateragh, (a distance of between 30 and 40 miles,) with orders to open the family-vault, and make the necessary preparations for the reception of the corpse. The hearse, bearing her ladyship's remains, proceeded towards Lateragh on the following day. His lordship was possibly not aware that the proprietorship of the ancient sepulchral church of Lateragh was not vested in him, but in Mr. Morres of Rathnalin (late Ballyricard-Morres), 'chief of the name' in Ireland; and as he omitted to demand permission of that gentleman, with whom he was then at variance, the workmen were not suffered to fulfil their mission. Of all the extensive domain of Lateragh, once possessed by his ancestors, but dissipated by an unguarded member of the family, the tomb of his forefathers alone remained to the eldest representative of the name. But the privileges of that dreary spot were still maintained by the dignified senior of the family. The followers of the chief assembled from the neighbouring mountains; and, on a show of resistance being made by the servants of the peer, some of them were severely beaten, and the whole compelled to take refuge in a neighbouring mansion, the owner of which, at the head of his servants and tenants, conducted the procession in safety for several miles on its return to Aghavillar, where the remains of Lady Mountmorres were finally interred."—Aughavillar is a rectory in the dio. of Ossory, and forms part of the benefice of KNOCKTOPHER: which see. Tithe composition, £200. Two Roman Catholic chapels in Higginstown and Newmarket share with 3 other chapels the services of 3 officiates, and are attended by respectively 1,200 and 450. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 61, and the Roman Catholics to 1,892; and 2 daily and pay schools were attended by 180 scholars. In 1839, the National Board granted £48 10s. toward the building and fitting up of a school-house at Ballyglass.

AUGHAVOE. See AGHABOE.

AUGHELOGUN, a village in the parish of Annaghdown, barony of Clare, 8½ miles north-north-east of Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop. about 200.

AUGHER, or AGER, a small market-town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish and barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the Blackwater, 2 miles north-east by east of Clogher, and 8 north-west of Emyvale. In its vicinity is Augher-castle, the seat of Sir James Richardson Bunbury, Bart. The town presents a poor, though clean and pleasant appearance; it has, for a series of years, been somewhat improving; yet, except during the bustle of its markets, it looks inert and still, and is practically a sequestered village. A weekly market is held on Monday; and annual fairs are held on March 28th, May 12th, Aug. 14th, and

Nov. 12th. Several years ago the proprietors of the manor, with the view of benefitting the town, relinquished their claim upon market tolls and customs. In 1834, one school was attended by an average of 30 boys, and another by an average of 30 girls; the former occupied a free site on part of the Commons Hill or Fair Green, and was built from funds provided by the "Lord-lieutenant's School Fund;" and both were supported by private subscription and small weekly fees.—Augher was constituted a borough by charter of 11 James I.; and is stated to have acquired the dignity upon the petition of the inhabitants, and for the better plantation of Ulster. Its chartered title was "the town of Agber and the precincts of Spurola Castle;" and that of its corporation, "the Burgomaster, free burgesses, and commonalty of the borough of Agber." It sent two members to parliament, but, with the exception of electing its own officers, seems never to have exercised any other privilege; and, immediately after its disfranchisement at the Union, its corporation virtually ceased to exist. The borough was perfectly close, the officers of the corporation being uniformly appointed by "the patron;" and the inhabitants deriving no advantage whatever from the charter. The families of Moutray and Bunbury long, jointly, possessed its "patronage;" but the Marquis of Abercorn purchased it about 10 years before the Union; and he received for his own use the whole of the sum of £15,000, awarded as compensation for the borough's disfranchisement. A court of record was authorized by the charter, but does not seem to have been held. A manor court is held every three weeks by the seneschal of the manor, and exercises jurisdiction to the amount of £2 Irish. A court-leet for the manor is held once a year. Though no property appears to have been at any time held by the corporation, some confused traditions are afloat respecting borough commons which have been enclosed for upwards of a century by the lords of the manor; and some land which lies in the vicinity of the town, and has been private property time out of mind, is said to have been allotted in an acre to each burgess, and still bears the name of "Burgess Acres." "The name alone" of this land, say the Municipal Corporation Commissioners, "seems to have given rise to the tradition." Area of the town, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 832; of whom 500 were Protestants, and 332 Roman Catholics. Pop., in 1841, 733. Houses 139. See CLOGHER.

AUGHERTON. See AGHERTON.

AUGHINISH. See AGGHINISH, co. Clare.

AUGHMACART, AUGHAMACART, or AGHAMACART, a parish in the barony of Clarmallagh, Queen's co., 4½ miles south-west of Castle-Durrow, Leinster. Area, 9,601 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,373; in 1841, 3,967. Houses 585. A portion of the surface is mountainous and waste; but the greater part is fertile land in tolerable cultivation. The highest ground is a summit in the south, whose altitude above sea-level is 914 feet. The Eriking, a considerable affluent of the Nore, drains the surface in a north-easterly direction. The principal residences are Philipborough, Lodgefield, Belmont, Ohlfeld, Prospect, Brooklawn, Aghmacart, and Edmundsbury. Belmont, though a small, is a very handsome demesne; and the house, which is well planned and extremely neat, commands a pleasing view of minute objects on the foreground, and a range of mountains in the perspective. A religious establishment is said to have been founded in the parish, about the middle of the 6th century, by St. Tighearnae; and a priory for Augustinian canons, the ruins of which still exist, was afterwards built upon its site. Near Belmont and the village of Cullohill, at the base of a height, and on the side of a wood-girt lake, stand the ruins of an old castle. Some fairs are held at CULLOHILL: which see.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ossory; and, jointly with the vicarages of CAHIR and KILLEN [which see], constitutes the benefice of Aghmacart. Length of the united parishes, 6 miles; breadth, 5. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £166 13s. 4d., and the rectorial for £300; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Ladies Anne and Gertrude Fitzpatrick. Gross income, £246 13s. 4d.; nett, £210 15s. 4jd. Patrons, the Ladies Fitzpatrick. The church is so old a building that nothing is known of the date or cost of its erection. Sittings 150; attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,604; and, jointly with Durrrow chapel, is under the care of two officiates. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 107, and the Roman Catholics to 2,171; the Protestants of the union to 108, and the Roman Catholics to 3,289. In the same year, a Sunday school was attended by 14 boys and 8 girls, and 3 daily schools, by 100 boys and 86 girls; and all the latter were situated in Aghmacart parish, and supported wholly by fees.

AUGHNACLOY, a market-town in the parish of Carrenteel, barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the left bank of the Blackwater, 2½ miles below the point where that river begins to divide co. Tyrone from co. Monaghan; and on the mail-road from Dublin to Londonderry, 15½ miles south-east by south of Omagh, 10½ north of Monaghan, 24½ east by north of Enniskillen, and 71 north-north-west of Dublin. It consists of one long street, and several transverse and subordinate streets and lanes; and, though not opulent in appearance, is clean, pleasant, and comparatively neat. It contains the parish-church, a Roman Catholic chapel, a Presbyterian meeting-house, two Wesleyan Methodist chapels, and several public and private schools. See CARRENTEEL. In 1839–40, a dispensary in the town, under the Clogher Poor-law union, received £108 14s., expended £94 15s. 11½d., made 3,526 dispensations of medicine, and had a district of 23,221 acres, with a pop. of 10,019. The dispensary was of recent establishment; and, on account of many proprietors within its district not being subscribers, it was much repressed in its efficiency. In 1842, the Aughnacloy Loan Fund had a capital of £919, circulated £4,744 in 1,572 loans, cleared a nett profit of £60 14s. 7d., and expended for charitable purposes £64 17s. 7d.; but this fund was officially reported at the close of the previous year to be very irregularly managed, and has been superseded by the Loan Fund Board. A weekly market is held on Wednesday. In 1838, a public car ran between Aughnacloy and Armagh; and a car was in transit between Clogher and Armagh, a coach between Omagh and Dublin, and the mail-coach between Londonderry and Dublin. The erection of the town was commenced by Acheson Moore, Esq. Two miles west of it, on the road to Clogher, are the ruins of Garvey-house and Lisnora Fort,—the latter erected in 1619 by Sir Thomas Ridgeway. Area, 70 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,742; in 1841, 1,841. Houses 334. Aughnacloy is the seat of a Roman Catholic parish in the diocese of Armagh. For statistics, see CARRENTEEL.

AUGHNAGURGAN, a lake on the west border of the co. Armagh, 2½ miles south-west of Keady, and within half-a-mile of co. Monaghan, Ulster. Its superfluous waters form one of the head-streams of the river Callen.

AUGHNAMULLEN or AGHNAMULLEN, a parish on the western border of the barony of Cremorne and of the county of Monaghan, and 2½ miles south of Ballybay, Ulster. It contains the village of BALLYTRAIN: which see. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 6; area, 30,710 acres,—of which 1,644 acres are under water. Pop., in 1831, 18,032; in 1841, 18,219. Houses 3,180. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 17,812; in 1841, 18,022. Houses 3,151. The land averages in value about 25s. per plantation acre. Extensive bogs occur along the western border. Crieve or Bunnaninna mountain, though rising to less than 900 feet of altitude above sea-level, is the highest ground, not only in the parish, but in the county, and forms part of the central water-shed of the island. Its form is lumpy and spreading; its circumference round the base is about 6 miles; its rock is metalliferous, and has been mined near the parish-church, for lead ore; its summit is hollowed by a lake which has been rendered highly subservient to economical purposes; and its declivities, once an unreclaimed waste, are now sheeted with cultivation or thickly dotted with mills and other establishments of industry. See CRIEVE and EAGISH. Within the parish are part of the lakes and streams which environ Ballybay, Lough Avenan, the Lough of Chantinee, and 8 lesser lakes; on the border is the lake of Shircock; and at intervals are the demesnes of Rochfield, Bushford, Millford, Prospect, Mountain Lodge, Chantinee, Crieve, and Sallyville. Lieut. Col. Ker, somewhere about half a century ago, greatly improved the Mountain Lodge demesne, made some fine plantations, and reclaimed a great tract of bog. Bleachfields exist at Crieve, Cremorne, Drumfaldra, and Chantinee; and flax-mills at Crieve and Laragh. The parish is traversed southward by the road from Monaghan to Dublin.—Aughnamullen is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £900. Gross income, £969; nett, £839 2s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. One curate, for the parish-church, has a stipend of £150; and another, for a chapel-of-ease at Crossduff, has a stipend of £75. The parish-church is old, and was repaired in 1830, by means of parochial assessment, and of a loan of £150 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; average attendance 300. The chapel-of-ease at Crossduff, 4½ miles from the parish-church, was built in 1828, at the cost of £900, gifted by the late Board of First Fruits. Attendance 100. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses, in connection with the General Assembly, the one formerly Secessional, and the other of the Synod of Ulster, are attended, the former by 120, the latter by 100. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Lochagish and Aghakiet, are under the care of two officiates, and attended by 1,120 and 600. Two other Roman Catholic chapels at Latin and Drumconnor, are under the care of two other officiates, and attended by 1,700 and 1,000. A Roman Catholic friary chapel in Ballytrain is under the care of a friar, and attended by 430. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,833 Churchmen, 2,519 Presbyterians, and 13,828 Roman Catholics; 5 Sunday schools had an average attendance of 635 children; and 20 daily schools had on their books 958 boys and 599 girls. Two of the daily schools were aided with respectively £10 and £8 from the National Board; one, with £10, a house, and 2½ acres from the National Board; one, with £9 from the London Hibernian Society; and one, with £2 from subscription and £7 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice.—Aughnamullen, in the Roman Catholic parochial division, is cut into the two parishes of Aughamullen-East and Aughamullen-West, the former of which has Ballyhay for its post town, and the latter Coochill.

AUGHNISH, AGHNISH, or AUGHNISH, a peninsula and a village in the parish of Oughtmanna, barony of Burren, and on the south side of Galway bay, co. Galway, Connought. The peninsula flanks the north-east side of the long narrow creek which commences the separation of co. Galway from co. Clare, and runs out into a narrow headland south by west of the town of Galway, and distant from it 6½ miles. A conspicuous martello tower stands on Aughnish Point; and another stands on Finavara Point, on the opposite side of the creek, and on the north-east side of Blackhead bay.—Aughnish village is situated on the peninsula; and, in a small way, is a summer sea-bathing resort. Area, 19 acres. Pop., in 1831, 304; in 1841, 312. Houses 45.

AUGHNISH, or AGHNISH, a parish in the barony of Kilmacrenan, and containing the greater part of the town of Ramelton, co. Donegal, Ulster. See RAMELTON. Length of the parish, 4½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 9,195 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,938; in 1841, 4,974. Houses 851. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,490; in 1841, 3,540. Houses 606. The surface consists of two sections, which are mutually 2½ miles asunder; it flanks the south side of Ramelton bay, and extends along a part of the west side of Lough Swilly; and is agreeably varied in contour, and considerably improved in georgy. Fort Stewart, the seat of Sir James Stewart, Bart., stands on the shore of Lough Swilly, near a ferry across the lough, about 2 miles east of Ramelton; and Shellfield, the only other residence of note, stands in its vicinity. Within Fort Stewart demesne are the ruins of Killydonnell abbey. The small island of Aughnish, situated in Ramelton bay, belongs to the parish. A considerable quantity of linen is manufactured, not only in the town, but in the country; and there are extensive bleaching-works, and several flour mills.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Raphoe, and constitutes the seat of the benefice of TULLYAGHNISH: which see. Tithe composition, £509 7s. 4d. The church was built, in 1825, at the cost of £2,146 3s. 0½d.; and, excepting £563 16s. 1½d., this cost was defrayed by donations from Trinity college, Dublin, the late Archbishop of Dublin, the late Sir James Stewart, the late Thomas Brooke, and the Rev. C. H. Ussher, the incumbent. Sittings 500; attendance 238. Three Presbyterian meeting-houses of the General Assembly, two of which were formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and the other of the Secession Synod, are attended by respectively 750, 365, and 300. Two Covenanting meeting-houses are attended each by 250, a Wesleyan meeting-house by 75, and a Roman Catholic chapel, which has an officiate for itself, by 600. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 524 Churchmen, 1,898 Presbyterians, and 2,769 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school at Glenlary was attended by 79 boys and 63 girls; and 10 daily schools, 3 of which were in connexion with the London Hibernian Society, and one was aided with £11 1s. 6d. from Robinson's Benefaction, had on their books 718 boys and 497 girls. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school in Ramelton were salaried each with £4 from the National Board.

AUGHNISH (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Ulster. It consists of a union of mountain torrents which rise among the Nephin Bog mountains; it soon forms a confluence with the Goolamore; and, measured from the influx of that rivulet into Tullochban bay to the source of its own highest head-stream, it has not a course of more than 8 miles. The Aughnish and the Goolamore are remarkable chiefly for the fact, as stated by the author of 'Wild Sports in the West,' that the salmon which frequent them "vary with regard to season as much as if they inhabited waters a thousand miles apart. In Goolamore, throughout the whole year, salmon are found in high condition; in Aughnish, from October till April, the fish are red, spent, and worthless. Goolamore flows from an extensive lake, and affords an outlet to the waters of Carrunore. Judging from the constant supply of white fish which Goolamore yields all through the year, one would conclude that the lake offers better food and winterage to the salmon than the shallower and colder waters of Aughnish."

AUGHORE. See AGHORE.

AUGHRIM, or AGRIM (THE), the most southerly of the three great head-streams of the splendid river Ovoca, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It rises on the skirts of LUGNAQUILLA [which see]; flows 8½ miles south-eastward to a confluence with Derry Water; and proceeds 4½ miles east-south-eastward, and past the village of Aughrim, to a junction with the Ovoca, or the second "meeting of the waters," 3½ miles above Arklow. Though inferior in scenic power to the AVONBEG and AVONMORE [which see], it is not altogether unworthy of the high fame for landscape which has been acquired by the whole ramified basin of the Ovoca.

AUGHRIM, or AGRIM, a village in the barony of Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the Aughrim river, and on the road from Rathdrum to Newtownbarry, 6½ miles south-south-west of Rathdrum, 8 west-north-west of Arklow, and 35 south by west of Dublin. Fairs are held here on June 22, Nov. 22, and 4th Tuesday of Dec. In 1839-40, a dispensary in the village, under the Rathdrum Poor-law union, received £90 15s., expended £101 13s., administered to 2,724 patients, and served for a district containing a pop. of 8,829. A mile distant from the village, but in opposite directions, are the mansions of Clone and Ballymanus; the latter an ancient seat of a branch of the Byrne family.

AUGHRIM, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Roscommon, co. Roscommon, and 3½ miles south of Carrick-on-Shannon, Connought. It contains part of the village of HILL-STREET: which see. Length, 5½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 8,255 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,597; in 1841, 4,469. Houses 775. The north-east boundary is formed by the Shannon, and by one of that river's secondary lacustrine expansions. Some lakes and turloughs occur on the southern and eastern border. Much of the surface is bog and marsh; and nearly the whole presents a flat, monotonous, and at best meadowy aspect. Though numerous improvements have been made in agriculture and domiciliary comfort, penury, raggedness, desolation of dwelling, and barbarousness of georgical art, still characterize a large portion of the peasantry or small farmers. The mansions are Rookville, Cloonfad, Breechabey, Rushill, and Lisadrum.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £95, and the latter are appropriated to the prebend of Tirvbrine in Elphin cathedral. The vicarages of Aughrim and Killumod, and the rectory of Cloonaff, constitute the benefice of Aughrim. See CLOONAFF and KILLUMOD. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 5. Gross income, £257; nett, £227 19s. 8½d. A curate has a stipend of £69 4s. 7½d. The church, situated in Aughrim, was built, in 1753, chiefly by private subscription. Sittings 200; attendance 50. Four Roman Catholic chapels in the union have 4 officiates, and are attended by respectively 1,000, 450, 300, and 280. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 114, and the Roman Catholics to 4,714; the Protestants of the union to 148, and the Roman Catholics to 9,452. In the same year, 11 daily schools in the union, 9 of which were in Aughrim, had on their books 508 boys and 241 girls. One of the Aughrim schools was aided with £8 from the National Board; one, with £2 from the curate, and £8 from the Elphin Diocesan Society; and one, with £3 from the rector and £8 from the Society for Discourteaching Vice. In 1840, the National school at Rosleen was aided with £15, and had on its books 115 boys and 61 girls.

AUGHRIM, a parish partly in the barony of Clonmacnoo, but chiefly in that of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaght. The Kilconnel section contains the village of Aughrim. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3. Area of the Clonmacnoo section, 2,021 acres; of the Kilconnel section, 5,231 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,205; in 1841, 2,127. Houses 371. Pop. of the Clonmacnoo section, in 1831, 560; in 1841, 498. Houses 83. Pop. of the rural districts of the Kilconnel section, in 1831, 1,058; in 1841, 1,171. Houses 199. The village of Aughrim stands on the mail-road between Dublin and Galway, 29 miles east of Galway, and 3 south-west of Ballinasloe. Area, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 587; in 1841, 458. Houses 89. In the village are a post-office, a dispensary, the parochial places of worship, and two or three of the parish schools. In 1839-40, the dispensary received £115 1s. 6d., expended £115 15s. 2½d., and administered to 1,701 patients. A priory is said to have been founded here, in the 13th century, for Augustinian canons, by Theobald, the first Butler of Ireland. A fair is held on Oct. 14; and in March, Sept., and Dec. The village has a clean and comparatively snug appearance; consists of various short streets, chiefly of cottages or cabins; and borrows much ornament from the neat parish-church, and the embowered glebe house on its flank. Most of the land of the parish consists of light and indifferent meadow and field pasture; and part of this is reclaimed morass, low, flat, monotonous, and moist. Aughrim Bog, a little north-east of the village, is 1½ mile long, and comprises 685 English acres. "This bog," says Mr. Griffith, "is amongst the wettest I have ever met with, and the centre is nearly occupied with lakes; but there is ample fall for the discharge of the water, both to the north and south;" and he estimates the expense of reclaiming it at £709 11s. 9d.—This parish in a rectory in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £106 3s. 0½d. The rectories of Aughrim, KILLAGHTON, and KILGERRIL, and the vicarage of KILLIMORE-DALY, [see these articles,] constitute the benefice of Aughrim. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3. Gross income, £449 19s. 2½d.; nett, £404 15s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built, in 1819, by means of a parochial assessment of £180, and a loan from the late Board of First Fruits of £1,384 12s. 3½d. Sittings 300; average attendance 150. Two meeting-houses, the one Wesleyan and the other Primitive Wesleyan, are attended by respectively 50 and 40. The Aughrim Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 550; and, jointly with Kilconnel chapel, is under the care of one officiate. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Killaghton and Killimore-Daly. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 336, and the Roman Catholics to 2,029; the Protestants of the union to 482, and the Roman Catholics to 8,566; a Sunday school in the parish was attended by 40 children; and 9 daily schools in the union had on their books 412 boys and 187 girls. Three of the daily schools were in the parish; and one of these had £26 a-year from the London Wesleyan Missionary Society, and another £8 from the rector, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society.

An expanse of gentle declivity or hanging plain, a little north-east of the village of Aughrim, in full view from the Dublin and Galway road, and now disposed in a series of green pasture-fields, is celebrated as the scene of the last of the great Irish battles between the forces of James II. and those of William III. The battle was fought on the 12th of July, 1691, and was an immediate sequent of the expulsion of James's troops from ATHLONE: see that article. "Having repaired the fortifications of Athlone," says Gordon, "De Ginckle marched, on the 10th of July, toward the enemy, and encamped along the river Suck, 3 miles north-eastward from the Irish forces, who occupied a post of great strength at the village of Aughrim. The army of St. Ruth, consisting of 25,000 men, was encamped along the heights of Kilcommeden, behind a bog, near a mile in breadth, which, extending all along the front, left only two passes for the approach of an enemy; the one on the right, through a range of hills opening into wider ground; the other on the left, occupied by the old castle of Aughrim, and intrenchments filled with soldiers between the bog and a tract of hills and morasses. The whole slope of Kilcommeden, down to the edge of the bog, was intersected with hedges and ditches, which formed lines of communication, guarded by Irish infantry. With only 18,000 men, and even these not otherwise collected than by draining his garrisons to a degree of danger, Ginckle advanced on the 12th of July at noon, after a foggy morning, to attack an army so superior in number, so strongly posted, but without sufficient artillery, encouraged by every argument of the general in his harangues, and by the priests who ran through the ranks, and are said to have sworn the men on the sacrament not to desert their colours. A part of Ginckle's army, consisting of Danes, supported afterwards by English dragoons, and these again by other detachments, began the battle by forcing the pass on the right of the enemy, which, after a variety of fortune, they accomplished in an hour, gaining a position beyond the bog. After a pause, in consequence of a consultation among Ginckle's officers, the entire left wing of the English army, according to a plan recommended by Mackay, advanced at 5 o'clock in the evening through the acquired pass, and furiously attacked the right of the Irish, who obstinately defended their ditches, not giving way till the muskets of the combatants mutually touched, when they retired by their lines of communication, flanked their assailants, and charged with double fury. When the engagement had thus continued on that side for an hour and a half, St. Ruth drew great part of his cavalry from his left wing to support his right. Mackay, who had waited for this incident, immediately ordered the cavalry in the right wing of the English to force their way through the pass of Aughrim-castle on the left of the enemy; and some regiments of infantry in the centre were ordered to march through the bog, and to take post on the lowest ditches beyond it, until the cavalry should gain the pass by the castle, and wheel from the right to support their attack. The infantry, plunging to the middle in the bog, made their way, with great labour, to the opposite side, where the enemy, after a furious fire, poured on them from the hedges, designedly retired. Transported with ardour, forgetting their orders, and pursuing almost to the main body of the Irish, they were overpowered by a charge in front and flank, driven back to the bog, many of them slain, and many taken, of whom some were persons of distinction; while the French general, too easily elated, exclaimed, in an ecstasy of joy, 'Now will I drive the English to the very walls of Dublin!' But in the meantime, the English cavalry, commanded by Talmash, rushed through the narrow and dangerous pass on the enemy's left, close by the walls of Aghrim-castle through a tremendous fire, to the amaze of St. Ruth, who asked some officers, 'What do the English mean?' Receiving for answer, 'To force their way to our right;' he had the generosity to say, 'They are brave fellows! it is a pity they should be so exposed.' While the cavalry were pressing forward with desperate impetuosity, and gave opportunity to the infantry in the centre to rally at the bog and recover their former ground, the French general resolving to direct his main force against the cavalry, pointed a battery for that purpose, and led a formidable body of horse to attack them. In this critical moment, when fortune seemed to threaten discomfiture to the English, St. Ruth was slain by a cannon-ball; and as the order of battle had not been communicated to Sarafeld, who had not lived on friendly terms with the deceased, this commander was unable to form dispositions till the battle was decided. When the Irish cavalry, destitute of orders, on the fall of their general, halted and returned to their former ground, confusion spread through all their troops, who, violently pressed from every point of attack by the forces of Ginkle, were driven to their camp, and thence into total rout; the infantry flying to a bog, the cavalry to Loughrea. With all their cannon, ammunition, tents, and baggage, a great quantity of small arms, eleven standards, and thirty-two colours, the Irish lost in the battle and pursuit of 3 miles, 7,000 slain, 450 taken prisoners; of the English were killed 700, and 1,000 wounded."

AUGHNIS. See ACHNIS.

AUGHTERAGH, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Kilmore. Post-town, Ballinamore. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

AYEAN, or AVAGHON, a lake in the parish of Aughnacullen, and near Ballytrain, co. Monaghan, Ulster.

AVOCA. See OVACA.

AVONBEG (THE), the middle one of the three great head-streams which form the river Ovoca, in co. Wicklow, Leinster. It issues from the small lake Finogfin, between Wicklow-gap and Stranahely-hill, and runs about 13 miles south-eastward along Glenmalure to a confluence with the Avonmore, and the formation of the Ovoca, at a point $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Rathdrum. In the early part of its course it leaps down the precipitous declivity of a table mountain, and forms in its progress 'The Ess fall;' it afterwards, from the head of Glenmalure to a little below Drungoff barracks, a distance of about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles, moves between mountain-screens which are only one-fourth of a mile asunder, and jointly with them and the intermediate belt of valley, constitutes a magnificence of water and glen scenery elsewhere excelled in Ireland only in the Killeries between co. Mayo and co. Galway; and it eventually exchanges a portion of its grandeur for beauty, and finds its way to the Avonmore along an ultimately open, cultivated, and simply charming valley.

AVONBUOY. See ANNABUOY.

AVONDALE, a beautiful demesne, the property of J. Parnell, Esq., on the river Avonmore, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile below Rathdrum, co. Wicklow, Leinster. A smooth lawn in front and on one side of the house is variegated with clumps and single trees, and gently rises to a hill whose summit is wreathed and capped with large beeches and massive firs. The ground behind the house now slopes with an easy declivity, and now breaks almost sheer down in precipices and abrupt escarpments, "covered with old oak, the roots of many of which are 100 feet perpendicular over the tops of them, whilst the grotesque forms of the rocks, covered with ivy and moss-grown roots, vie with the variety of natural wood flowers and several curious plants, to render the scenery at once pleasing and romantic." The flat or low ground of the Avonmore valley is reached by a winding walk through the woodell and intricate surface of the demesne; on its further side flows the river, now gliding with a smooth and gentle current, and now dashing over huge masses of broken granite and native rock, with the foam and rage of a cataract; and beyond the stream rises a lofty range of hill-screen, patched at intervals with fields of meadowy verdure, and elsewhere sheeted almost all over with woods of oak.

AVONMORE (THE), the most northerly of the 3 great head-waters of the river Ovoca, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It is formed by a confluence of rivulets in the vicinity of Glendalough; and it proceeds along the vale of Clara, and past the town of Rathdrum and the demesne of Avondale, to 'the meeting of the waters,' or a junction with the Avonbeg, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles below Rathdrum. Its length of run is about 11 or 12 miles; and the direction of its course is first to the south-east and next to the south. Its name, which signifies 'the great winding stream,' corresponds most happily with its character, the banks continually forming the finest waving lines, either covered with close coppice woods, or with scattered oak and ash of considerable growth; the ground in some places smooth meadow and pasture, and in others rising in romantic cliffs and craggy precipices." In 1800, this river gave the title of Viscount in the Irish peerage to the noble family of Yelverton.

AVONTAR (THE), corruptedly ANZER, a small river of the county of Tipperary, Munster. It rises in a bog to the north of Killenale, and flows 15 or 16 miles southward to the Suir at Two-mile-Bridge, 3 miles east of Clonmel. In its progress it is augmented by two considerable affluents.

AWBEG (THE), or AWINBEG, a river chiefly of the northern division of co. Cork, Munster. It rises within the county of Limerick, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west of Ardpatrik; but in the course of less than 3 miles passes into co. Cork, and thence it runs 10 miles southward to Buttevant, and 11 or 12 eastward and southward, past Doneraile and Castletown-Roeche, to the Blackwater at Bridgetown. This river, under the name of 'The Gentle Mulla,' is celebrated, by the poet Spencer, in verses "likely," says Mr. Brewer, "to prove as lasting as the flow of its own waters." "It has a winding and desultory progress in a district replete with charms. Its course is placid, and it glides in dimpling eddies worthy the celebration of the muse." Near its banks stands KILCOLEMAN [which see], the now ruinous castle in which Spencer once resided.

AWBEG (THE), AWINBEG, or SHAWNAN, a rivulet of the baronies of Muskerry and Barretta, co. Cork, Munster. Two head-streams rise at points 6 miles asunder near the water-shed between the basin of the Lee and that of the Blackwater, and run 7 or 8 miles to a confluence a little below Blarney; and the united stream then runs about $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles sinusously southward to the Lee, at a point within 3 miles of Cork. The glen traversed by the Awbeg is sequestered, romantic, and richly wooded.

AWINAGHLOOR, three partially reclaimed bogs on the western border of co. Cork, Munster. Area, 1,350 English acres. They lie in the basin of the Blackwater, partly in the immediate vicinity of Mill-street, and partly from $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile to $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the north-west. "A good deal of these bogs, from their vicinity to the town of Mill-street," says Mr. Nimmo, "have been cut away or reclaimed; a level navigation might be formed along them to the lime-quarries of Drishane, which lie on their eastern side." The eastern division of the bogs is bisected by the Blackwater's little affluent, the Finaw, and lies flat and low; but the north-western division occupies a table-land of about 450 feet in altitude, immediately overlooks the Blackwater, and seems to be borne aloft by a continuation of the culm veins from the Duhallow side of the river. Mr. Nimmo's estimated cost of reclaiming the three bogs was £973 7s. 2d.

AWINBANNA (THE), a rivulet of co. Wexford, Leinster. It partly flows within the barony of Gorey, but chiefly divides it from the barony of Ballaghkeen; and it has a boldly sinuous course of about 11 miles to the sea, at a point 2½ miles south-east of Gorey.

AWINEA. See OWENEA.

AWINIGARRY (THE), a rivulet and a considerable bog, near the western border of co. Kerry, Munster. The rivulet rises on the south-west side of Sugarloaf Hill, and has a northerly course of upwards of 5 miles to the Laune, at a point ¼ of a mile above Killorglin. The bog is bisected by the rivulet; and has an area of 2,162 English acres. "It has on the whole," says Mr. Nimmo, "a considerable slope towards the Awinigarry river; and, being intersected with streams from the Reeks, its drainage is not difficult. It is much intermingled with moor, the bottom usually an open stone brash or rubble." "It is worthy of remark that, in the boggy and moorish ground between this and Killorglin, there are numerous swallow holes of considerable depth among the gravel and rubble. Some of these have been opened or sunk very lately; and not many years ago, a case of that kind took place in the lake of Farrantreen near Killorglin, as that lake, which has no proper outlet, suddenly ebbed away and dried up, discharging a considerable deposition of mud in its bottom. The hole by which the water escaped being allowed to choke up again, the lake has now resumed its ancient extent, and the overflow subsides in a little pool hard by, and without doubt finds an exit through the open gravel into the Laune." "This open bottom, existing under all this extensive bog, shows clearly the futility of every attempt to drain bog by percolation through its substance." Estimated expense of reclaiming the bog, £1,448 19s.

AWINMORE. See OWENMORE.

AYLE (THE), or AILE, a rivulet of the baronies of Burrischoole and Carra, co. Mayo. Connauht. It rises in a mountainous district; runs first in a northerly and afterwards in a southerly direction; and has a course of about 8 miles to the head of Lough Mask. It becomes subterranean immediately after debouching from the lofty uplands of its origin, and runs about 2 miles along a natural tunnel, through a spur or shoulder of mountain-range. Its course elsewhere is marked by some lacustrine expansions.

AYLE, an alias name of the large parish within which is the greater part of the rivulet Ayle's course. See ATOBAGOUR.

* A large number of rivulets in Ireland have names beginning with "Aw," "Avin," "Ow," and "Owen,"—corruptions of Avon or Abbin, "a rivulet or winding stream." A few have been already noticed; and several more, or a specimen of such as have popularly taken the corruption "Owen" for their prefix, will be noticed under the letter O.

BACK, a small village in the parish of Drumachose, barony of Kenaught, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Post town, Newtownlimavaddy.

BACKS, a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Killalla. It and Kilmoremy are the bishop's parishes of the dioceses; and it is served by the diocesan and two curates. Post town, Ballina. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

BADONY, or BODONY LOWER, a parish in the barony of Strabane, 4½ miles east of Newtown-Stewart, and 8 north-north-east of Omagh, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It contains the village of GORTIN: which see. Length, 14 miles; breadth, 7; area, 47,921 acres, 3 roods, 10 perches,—of which 178 acres, 2 roods, 4 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 7,024; in 1841, 7,784. Houses 1,357. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 7,374. Houses 1,288. The surface is principally mountainous, and is drained westward by the river Moyle and its tributaries. Beltrim, the seat of A. W. C. Hamilton, Esq., occupies a romantic site between the mountains of Muntierlowney and the Ardstraw mountain of Mary Grey. The village of Gortin, the site of the parish-church, is the cynosure of a considerable extent of circumjacent country, and the vestibule of a fine natural gallery of landscape. See GORTIN. "Among the numerous cultivated and thickly inhabited mountain glens which branch off Gortin, and run through this district," says Mr. Fraser, "there is a great deal of interesting scenery. Several of these glens, with their accompanying rivers, extend for many miles; and as they are all traversed by roads leading to the more easterly towns in the counties of Derry and Tyrone, they are accessible. They are interesting, not merely to the admirer of nature's works on a grand scale, but to those concerned in the moral and physical improvement of the country."—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition and gross income, £750; nett, £643 6s. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church was built in 1706; but at what cost, or from what funds, is not known. Sittings 300; attendance 250. A Presbyterian meeting-house is attended in winter by 100, in summer by from 500 to 600. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Roosky and Greencastle are under the care of a parochial officiate and two conductors; and are attended, the former by from 1,100 to 1,200, the latter by from 700 to 1,000. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,257 Churchmen, 738 Presbyterians, and 5,513 Roman Catholics; 8 Sunday schools had an average attendance in winter of 587 children, and in summer of 964; and 16 daily schools—one of which was aided with £20 of salary, and usually £10 of gratuity from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and 4 were in connection with the Kildare-street Society, and received various aid—had on their books 444 boys and 213 girls. In 1840, a school at Broughdery, attended by 39 boys and 12 girls, was salaried with £14 8s. 4d. from the National Board.

BADONY, or BODONY UPPER, a parish in the barony of Strabane, $\frac{6}{8}$ miles north-east of Newtown-Stewart, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Length, 14 miles; breadth, 3; area, 38,288 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches, of which 150 acres, 2 roods, 9 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 5,715; in 1841, 5,822. Houses 1,071. The surface is chiefly mountainous, and the land of poor quality. Cattle and horses are numerous reared and pastured on the uplands. Most of the small farmers, as in adjoining parishes, are linen weavers. Some vestiges remain of an ancient castle. A Franciscan friary was founded in the 15th century, at Corriek.—The original parish of Badony—a name corrupted from Both-dhonnaigh—comprehended both Lower and Upper Badony. The latter is now a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Derry. Tithe composition, £380. Gross income, £520; nett, £410 8s. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. Archdall, with characteristic carelessness or credulity, says, "St. Patrick founded the church of Both-dhonnaigh in the valley of Golan-ale; and St. Aengus, cook to the saint, was a presbyter here." The present church was built about 56 years ago, chiefly, or to a large degree, by means of donations from Lord Bristol, the bishop. Sittings 400; attendance, from 120 to 250. One meeting-house of the General Assembly Presbyterians, formerly Secessional, is attended by from 50 to 40; and another, formerly of the Synod of Ulster, and now or lately under the care of the minister who officiates in Lower Badony Presbyterian meeting-house, is attended by 150. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Plum bridge and Craragh are under the care of a parochial officiate and a coadjutor; and are attended, the former by from 900 to 950, the latter by from 700 to 800. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 539 Churchmen, 924 Presbyterians, 9 other Protestant Dissenters, and 4,377 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were attended by 140 children; and 7 daily schools—one of which at Corriek was aided with £5 5s. a-year from Mr. Gardiner, one at Clogherny with £8 from the National Board, and one at Castledamph with £8 from the Board, and £2 from the rector—had on their books 271 boys and 98 girls.

BAGENBON—originally and uncorruptedly, Bag-and-Bun—a promontory in Ballyteigue Bay, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-east of Fethard, in the barony of Shelburne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It is celebrated as the spot on which the little vanguard of Earl Strongbow's Anglo-Norman army, under Robert Fitzstephens and Harvey de Monte Marisco lauded in 1169 or 1171. Its name among ancient historians was Dondonolf; and its present designation was given it from 'the Bag' and 'the Bun,' the two vessels which brought to it the nucleus of the invading army. It is a comparatively small cape, neither very high nor projecting far into the sea. A creek, with a fine sandy bottom on one side, and a rocky inlet with pretty deep water on the other, were Fitzstephens' facilities for landing his men. A trench and a rude embankment are still traceable across its neck; and a considerable hill which overlooks it is now crowned by a martello tower, which was raised during the last general war as a defence against French invasion. Fitzstephens and Monte Marisco, on landing at the spot in the capacity both of Strongbow's vanguard-leaders and of his pioneer, were accompanied with only 30 knights, 60 men in armour, and 300 archers. They knew nothing of the country or its language; had no spies, no agents; expected succour from no quarter except from the doubtful, fickle, and comparatively feeble king of Leinster; and required either to achieve complete success, or perish with every individual of their little band. They remained a few days without seeing either enemy or ally; they made no incursions into the country, and took no notice of any little groups of peasants who stared at them with stupid wonder; and, after a period of impressive suspense, they were approached by a party of the King of Leinster's troops under his son Donald, and by joining them in open day, and, according to treaty and stipulation as an ally, they made the first move in the great game of Ireland's conquest, without either assuming an appearance of invasion, or possessing more strength than had been wastefully expended in many a petty and mischievous exploit of a pitiful band of Danish pirates and marauders.

BAGGOTRATH, a quadam fortalice, in the vicinity of Ball's Bridge, on the south side of Dublin bay, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from Dublin Castle, co. Dublin, Leinster. In the 17th century, this castle was the scene of some military operations on the night preceding the battle of RATHMINES: see that article. Hardly a vestige of the building now exists.

BAGGOTRATH, a village in the parish of Donnybrook, barony and county of Dublin, Leinster. Area, 30 acres. Pop., in 1841, 476. Houses 35.

BAGGOTRATH (WEST), a village in the parish of St. Peter's, barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area, 44 acres. Pop., in 1841, 329. Houses 32.

BAGGRA, a range of mountain along the mutual border of the baronies of Duhallog and Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. The range extends east and west; measures upwards of 10 miles in length, and in some places 6 in breadth; and divides—though at a much less distance from the former than the latter—the river-system of the Blackwater from that of the Lee. In winter, it is, for the most part, marshy and impracticable; but in summer, it becomes dry and covered with heath and verdure, and is then grazed by vast herds of cattle. The tract, though high and wild, is tabular or flat; it is screened on the north and west by still loftier ground; and, during the greater part of the year, it is constantly wreathed in black and dismal fogs. Both Dr. Smith and Mr. Holmes quote, as quite descriptive of it, the following lines of Thomson:—

"——— The brown-burnt earth
Of fruits and flowers, and every verdure spoiled,
Barren and bare, a joyless dreary waste;
Thin cottag'd; and, in time of trying need, Abandon'd.
Those roving mists that constant now begin
To smoke along the hilly country, these
The mountain-caverns fill, those grand reserves
Of water, scowp'd among the hollow rocks,
Whence gush the streams, the ceaseless fountains play,
And their unfailing stores the rivers draw
To send a thund'ring torrent to the main."

BAGNALSTOWN, a small and beautifully situated post-town in the parish of Dunleckny, barony of Idrone-East, co. Carlow, Leinster. It stands on the river Barrow, and on the road from Carlow to Goresbridge, $\frac{7}{8}$ miles south of Carlow, and about 2 south of Leighlin Bridge. The town was commenced by Mr. Bagnal of Dunleckny, and was intended by him to possess considerable architectural pretensions, and to bear the name of Versailles; but, in consequence of an alteration in the line of the Dublin, Clonmel, and Cork mail-road, which sent it across the Barrow at Leighlin Bridge, the projected town of splendour became only a large, neat village. Its present proprietor, Mr. Bagnal Newton, has greatly improved it by the promotion or erection of a Sessions-house and other buildings. The Sessions-house has a handsome Ionic portico, occupies an elevated site, and groups finely with surrounding objects to produce a pleasing picture. A considerable proportion of the private houses are good and showy; and are occupied by annuitants, or by persons comparatively affluent. Many of the operative families are quarriers and dressers of granite for building, and of Carlow flag. These rocks abound in the vicinity, and are largely worked for transportation, along the navigation of the Barrow and its ramifications southward to Waterford, northward to Dublin, and in both directions to intermediate places. A fever-hospital in the town is a well-managed institution; in 1839-40, it received £200 and expended £185 19s.; and, in the same year, a dispensary in the town, received £114 8s., expended £101 11s., made 2,220 dispensations of medicine, and served for a district of 14,008 acres, with a pop. of 6,016. In 1842, the Bagnalstown Loan fund had a capital of £1,423; circulated £4,221, in 1,311 loans, and expended for charitable purposes £71 10s.; and from the date of its formation till the close of that year, it circulated £30,480 in 10,061 loans; cleared a nett profit of £553 4s. 1d., and expended for charitable purposes £457 19s. 4d. A handsome bridge at the town carries across the highway. In the immediate vicinity are the mansions of Dunleckny and Bagnalstown, the seats respectively of W. Newton, Esq., and of J. Newton, Esq. The plantations of the Bagnalstown demesne almost environ the town. Dunleckny is the ancient seat of the Bagnal or Bagenal family, but has been recently renovated in the Tudor style of architecture. The Bagenals settled in the county shortly after a severely contested battle, in the year 1552, between the government forces under the knight-marshal, Sir Nicholas Bagenal, and the followers of Hugh Mac-Morrough Kavanagh. An intermediate possessor of Dunleckny-house between Beauchamp Bagenal, Esq., M. P., and the Newtons, was a gentleman of the name of Ryan, said to be the lineal male representative of the chief of the O'Byrns, toparchs of Idroue, at the epoch of the Anglo-Norman invasion. Bagnalstown gives name to a Roman Catholic parish, served by an officiate and two coadjutors in the dio. of Kildare and Leighlin. See DUNLECKNY. Area of the town, 61 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,315; in 1841, 2,225. Houses 350.

BAILIEBOROUGH, a parish, partly in the barony of Castleraghan, but chiefly in that of Clonke, co. Cavan, Ulster. The Clonke section contains the town of BAILIEBOROUGH: see next article. Area of the Castleraghan section, 41 acres; of the Clonke section, 12,375 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the parish, 6,084; of the Castleraghan section, 20; of the rural districts of the Clonke section, 5,761. The ecclesiastical parish includes also the quoad civilia parish of Moybologue, lying partly in co. Cavan, and partly in co. Meath; and the census of 1831, mistaking the ecclesiastical parish for the civil one, states the pop. at 10,480. The parochial surface, though partly upland and aggregately second-rate, contains much arable land which, while generally too feeble for wheat, is very fertile in oats and potatoes. Such hills as occur are of moderate height, and all pasturable. Bog exists chiefly in the form of turbarry, and is so equally diffused as to be found on almost every farm. One stream comes in from mountainous ground on the east, and traverses the parish south-westward, on its way to the Blackwater near Moynalty; and another comes in from Enni-sheen, and runs across the parish westward, on its way to Lough Rammer, near Virginia. Loughlets are numerous; and one lake in the demesne of Bailieborough-castle combines noticeable size with features of considerable beauty. The parish is intersected by the road from Kells to Cootehill, and by that from Cavan to Kingscourt. Bailieborough-castle, the seat of Sir William Young, the proprietor of almost all the Ulster section of the parish, is an imposing structure, and stands about 1½ mile distant from Bailieborough town, to the left of the road thence to Cootehill. There are, including the glebe-house, three other mansions. The civil parish was originally co-extensive with the ecclesiastical one, and was anciently called Moybologue, and afterwards Bailieborough alias Moybologue; but a practice having grown up of calling the Ulster section Bailieborough, and the Leinster section Moybologue, the two sections were eventually made two parishes.—Bailieborough parish is a rectory and a separate benefice on the eastern border of the dio. of Kilmore. Tithe composition, £314 1s. Gross income, £578 15s. 9d.; nett, £490 3s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate is salaried at £75. The church was built about the year 1780, at the expense of the parish. Sittings 300; attendance 150. A Roman Catholic chapel in the town has an attendance of 2,000; and, jointly with a chapel in Shercock, is served by two officiates. A second Roman Catholic chapel in the parish has an attendance of 1,560; and, in common with a chapel at Kilmainshamwood, is served by two officiates. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses in connection with the General Assembly, the one formerly Secessional, and the other of the Synod of Ulster, are attended by respectively 200 and 450. A Wesleyan chapel has an attendance of 150. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,039 Churchmen, 2,232 Presbyterians, 3 other Protestant dissenters, and 7,101 Roman Catholics; and 17 daily schools—one of which was a classical boarding as well as daily school, and three were aided with respectively £8, £10, and £10 from the London Hibernian Society—had on their books 681 boys and 356 girls. In 1838, the National Board granted £91 5s. toward the building and fitting up of a schoolhouse at Kilgriff.

BAILIEBOROUGH, a small market and post town, and the capital of the above parish, stands on the road from Kingscourt to Cavan, 5½ miles west-north-west of Kingscourt, and 11½ north by west of Kells. Though a sequestered place, in the midst of a comparatively upland and little frequented district, it has stirring markets, and wears a somewhat snug appearance. Both the town and the lands which surround it have been much improved by Sir W. Young. The roads which connect it with towns at a distance have been greatly ameliorated. A market is held weekly; and fairs are held on Feb. 17, May 17, June 13, Aug. 17, Oct. 14, and Nov. 17. A bridewell in the town is kept in good order by correct and attentive officers; and contains the separate accommodation required by law for a few prisoners in transit to the county-gaol.—The Bailieborough Poor-law union ranks as the 84th; and was declared on Nov. 20, 1839. It comprises portions of the counties of Cavan and Meath, amounting to 88,021 acres, and containing, in 1831, a pop. of 41,414. Its electoral districts with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Meath, Newcastle, 1744; Ardagh, 3,109; Moybologue, 2,817; and Tullyarran, 2,418;—and in co. Cavan, Bailieborough, 5,338; Skeagh, 4,708; Terman, 4,595; Shercock, 4,568; Kingscourt, 6,735; Crossbane, 2,785; and Killeenker, 2,597. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 1 and 18; and of the latter, 3 are chosen by each of the divisions of Baileborough and Kingscourt, 2 by each of the divisions of Skeagh, Termon, and Shercock, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £31,839 0s. 0½d.; the total number of persons rated was 6,508; and of the latter 481 were rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—722, not exceeding £2,—688, not exceeding £3,—698, not exceeding £4,—and 681, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on May 1, 1840,—to be completed on Sept. 30, 1841,—to cost £6,000 for building and completion, and £1,160 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 6 acres, partly given free by Sir William Young, Bart., and partly purchased for £240,—and to contain accommodation for 600 paupers. Admission to the workhouse was commenced on June 20, 1842; the amount of expenses thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £2,947 14s. 2d.; and the amount of all previous expenses was £1,368 1s. 5d. Three dispensary districts in the union comprise an area of 57,918 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 33,263; they have their seats at Baileborough, Kingscourt, and Shercock; and, in 1839-40, their officers received £309 2s., expended £293 6s. 9d., and administered to 4,337 patients. The Baileborough dispensary has a district of 27,997 acres, with a pop. in 1831 of 19,394; and in 1839-40, it expended £111 15s. 10d., and administered to 2,393 patients. In 1842, the Baileborough Loan Fund had a capital of £1,400, circulated £8,196 in 2,663 loans, cleared a nett profit of £74 6s. 5d., and expended for charitable purposes £93 14s. 2d.; and, from its formation till the end of 1842, it circulated £31,422 in 10,076 loans, cleared a nett profit of £356 16s., and expended for charitable purposes £204 10s. 5d. A presbytery of the General Assembly has its seat in Baileborough, exercises inspection over 10 congregations, and meets on the second Tuesday of May and the first Tuesday of Feb., Aug., and Oct. Area of the town, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,085; in 1841, 1,203. Houses 179.

BALBRIGGAN, a chapelry, containing the town of Balbriggan, in the parish of Balrothery, and barony of East Balrothery, co. Dublin, Leinster. All the civil statistics, and some of the ecclesiastical, are included in those of the parish. The original chapel was built, in 1816, at the cost of £2,787 1s. 3½d.; of which £443 1s. 3½d. was raised by subscription, £1,051 13s. 11d. was a donation from the late Rev. George Hamilton of Hampton Hall, and £1,292 6s. 1½d. was gifted by the late Board of First Fruits. But this edifice, containing 500 sittings, was burnt in 1833; a school-house, containing accommodation for only 100 persons, served for a time as a substitute; and a handsome new chapel was completed about the year 1836. The chaplain is appointed by George A. Hamilton, Esq., of Hampton Hall, and receives £36 18s. 5½d. of emolument from that gentleman, and £48 2s. of augmentation allowance from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners out of Bonlter's fund; and an assistant chaplain receives from the diocesan, the archbishop of Dublin, a stipend of £75. The Roman Catholic chapel, in 1834, had an attendance of 1,345; a spacious successor to it was built in 1838; and this is clustered with the chapels of Balrothery and Balscaddan in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement. For other statistics, see BALROTHERY.

BALBRIGGAN, a market-town and sea-port, in the parish of Balrothery, and barony of East Balrothery, 3½ miles north-west of Skerries, and 1½ north by east of Dublin, co. Dublin, Leinster. It rose from the condition of an obscure fishing hamlet, to that of a seat of manufacture, a considerable sea-port, and an incipient town, about the year 1780, under the fostering care of the late Chief Baron Hamilton. Its appearance indicates both comfort and industry, and presents a pleasing contrast to that of the greater number of small Irish towns. A cotton factory was established in the town by Baron Hamilton; a second cotton-mill was built at a subsequent period; and one of the two, in 1838, employed 6 males and 84 females. The yarn spun, excepting a small portion sent to Dublin, is worked into webs in the town and neighbourhood. Two local manufacturers and a Glasgow agency employ about 250 looms on the spot, and about 150 at Garristown, 5½ miles to the west; and these 400 looms are estimated to produce weekly 100 pieces of chequers of 60 yards each, 30 pieces of domestic calico of 80 yards each, and 100 pieces of cotton drills and fancy goods of about 43 yards each, the whole weighing 4,000 lbs. The chequers are sent to Dublin for sale; the domestic calico is conveyed athwart the country in carts, and disposed of to pedlars, shopkeepers, and private families; and the drills and other fancy goods are manufactured for the foreign trade, sent to Belfast to be bleached, and thence conveyed to Dublin or Glasgow. About 1,000 persons in Balbriggan and its neighbourhood, including Skerries, are partly or chiefly employed in the embroidering of muslin; and earn, on an average throughout the year, about 2s. each per week. The embroiderers work wholly to Belfast and Glasgow agencies; they all embroider in their own houses; and the muslin, when they have worked it, is conveyed to Belfast to be bleached. Cotton-hosiery of the town's manufacture has long been in high repute; yet, in 1838, it employed only 36 stocking-frames and 50 workers, the latter belonging to 20 families, and aggregately earning £25 per week. Dublin is both the emporium whence the yarn is brought, and the market to which the hosiery is sent. Salt-making is prosecuted in one small manufactory; yet not to such an extent as to occasion a carrying trade. A considerable portion of the agricultural produce of the rich tillage district around the town, is sold in Balbriggan market; yet as a great part is sent directly from the farms to Dublin and Drogheda, and large quantities of wheat and oats are sold at the stores of 4 extensive mills in the vicinity, whence supplies of flour, meal, and bran, are sent to the towns of the district and to Drogheda, even the most correct account of sales in Balbriggan, with an estimate of the proportion destined for removal to other places, would fall far short of indicating the extent of the export, farm produce, and the inland carrying trade, of the circumjacent country. Coals, oak-bark, potatoes, and rock salt are imported; the coals are conveyed westward as far as the northern road by Ashbourne; and the fish brought in from the fishing grounds round the port, are conveyed by land to Dublin. In 1835, the exports seaward were estimated in value at £5,417 10s., and consisted of 645 tons of corn, meal, and flour; and the imports were estimated at £11,391 19s. 2d., and consisted of 11,373 tons of coals, culm, and cinders, 20 tons of oak-bark, 351 tons of rock salt, and 1,109 tons of potatoes. In 1838, the public conveyances were a stage car for 12 passengers to Dublin, and 2 daily coaches, a thrice-a-week coach, and 2 daily cars in transit between Dublin and either Drogheda, Newry, or Belfast. In the year ending 5th April, 1830, the Balbriggan fishing district and station employed 85 decked vessels, carrying 3,073 tons and 576 men; 4 half-decked vessels, carrying 60 tons and 22 men; 1 open sail-boat, with 5 men; and 59 row-boats, with 331 men;—but since that period, the fishing trade of the place is said to have suffered a serious decline. The pier at the port is nearly 600 feet in length, and was built by the late Baron Hamilton, and improved and strengthened by the present proprietor, Mr. Hamilton. The Baron is stated to have expended upon it no less a sum than £15,000; and he was granted by the Irish parliament, on account of it, £1,500 in 1761, and £3,752 in 1765. "The town," says Mr. Nimmo, "has almost entirely originated, and the agriculture of the neighbouring country has greatly extended, since the building of the pier. Balbriggan harbour is clean, with a bottom of soft sand, so that vessels may run boldly for it, when there is sufficient water, which, within the pier-head, is about 14 feet at high water springs; it is all dry at low water. Many vessels have been saved here in easterly or south-east gales; yet it would still require much improvement to make it safe in winter; and various designs have been proposed for this purpose,—among others, that of excavating a dock in the upper part of the harbour to the depth of low water, with a quay on the north side thereof, which would be more convenient to the town, &c. I do not think it would be practicable to preserve this depth among so much moveable silt, without a continual and enormous expense; and would therefore recommend that a pier or break-water should be formed on the north side of the harbour, from the point of the rock under the Martello Tower, to within about 10 perches of the present pier-head. This would cut off the current which now sweeps along that shore and out under the lee of the pier with all inshore winds, and by which vessels are so often carried adrift when entering this harbour, and would send the swell off to spend itself at the Martello Rocks. The harbour would then enclose a space of 11 acres, quiet in all winds; and the run or portion of the billow which would be admitted by the entrance, would have ample room within to expend and subside." He proposes also that a wharf wall and bank should be run from the end of Grace's Lane or Freeman's Row, to the middle of his projected breakwater, "with tunnels and sluices across it, by which the tide-water might be retained to 6 or 8 feet deep in a space of 3 or 4 acres between that and the Martello Towers, and let off at low water to scour the harbour;" and he estimates the cost of executing the whole of his plan at £4,635. An excellent lighthouse was constructed a number of years ago, at the pier-head, by the Ballast Board; and the disbursements on account of it, during the year 1840, amounted to £230 12s. 11d. In 1839-40, a dispensary in the town, under the Balthorey Poor-law union, received £154 7s., expended £153 17s. 5d., administered to 2,312 patients, and had a district containing 9,611 inhabitants. The town is a summer resort for sea-bathing. In 1329, occurred at Balbriggan, a conflict in which Richard Talbot and other persons of distinction fell victims to the rival factions of the Verdons, Gernons, and Savages [see MALAHIDE]; and on the 3d of July, 1690, William III. encamped at the town, after achieving the victory of the Boyne. Hampton Hall, the handsome seat of the proprietor of the town, stands about a mile distant, on the road to Skerries; and commands an extensive view of the coast and the country inland. Area of the town, 180 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,046; in 1841, 2,959. Houses 567.

BALCARRA. See BELCARRA.

BALCARRICK, a small village in the parish of Malahide, barony of Nethercross, and 3 miles east of Swords, co. Dublin, Leinster.

BALDERIG, or BELDERIG, a small coast-guard station, on the coast of Erris, about 7 miles north of Ballycastle, and about 1 mile west of the new line of road from that village to Belmullet, co. Mayo, Connaught. Mr. Fraser, speaking of approaches westward to Belmullet, says, "In addition to the three main lines of road through Erris, there is another along the coast from Ballycastle to Belmullet. It is, however, very circuitous, and merely introduced to direct the tourist to the splendid scenery along the coast, west from Balderig; and also to enable us to notice the wild desolate tract along the northern shores of this district." "The parts of the coast to which we would particularly direct the attention of the lovers of marine and cliff scenery, extend from Balderig to Rossferry, a distance of 15 miles, and thence till we meet the new road from Ballycastle to Belmullet, 5,—making a detour of at least 20 miles. There are neither roads nor houses of accommodation along this part of the iron-bound coast; the surface is dreary moorland, varied only by the hills which rise to 800 feet in height along the inhospitable shores. This excursion is only suited to pedestrians in summer weather; and it is even with some difficulty that boats can be procured at Balderig and the more westerly coast-guard stations of Port-Turling and Portacloy, to see the cliffs and caverns along the interesting parts of this coast. It is recommended to view the coast between Balderig and Portacloy from a boat, and perform the remainder of the journey by land, visiting the hill of Ben-wee and Killgalligan Head on the road to Rossferry. The shores along this part of Erris are, from the difficulty of access, but little known; although they are fully equal in wildness and magnificence to any along the whole range of our sea-girtisle. Every projection that is rounded discloses some striking combination of impending cliff or vaulted cavern. Where all is wonderful, it is often difficult to particularize scenes; but here, even amid the extraordinary objects which rise successively to view, we are more forcibly struck with Moista Sound and the caverns termed the Arch and the Parlour." See ARCH, PARLOUR, MOISTA SOUND, BENWEE, and PORTACLOY. The cove, or little natural harbour of Balderig, affords berths for yaws; but it is open to the north, always subject to a heavy ground swell, and, like most openings on the coast of Mayo, gives little shelter to any kind of craft. Yet, according to Mr. Nimmo, "there appears a tolerable opportunity of having a small harbour, by running a short pier from the west side to cover a cut which might be made through the beach into the stream behind, which is pretty level and deep for near half-a-mile up the valley, and would therefore be a tolerable harbour if the entrance could be kept open."

BALDOYLE, a parish containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,236 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,218; in 1841, 1,100. Houses 205. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 209; in 1841, 265. Houses 42. The surface extends along the shores of the shallow sandy estuary of Portmarnock, immediately west of Howth, and about 16 miles north-east of Dublin. Though the immediate seaboard is sandy and bleak, the interior exhibits the fertility and lushness which so generally characterize the environs of the metropolis, and the aggregate quality of the land is good. Dermot Macmorrough, the King of Leinster, who invited the Anglo-Normans to Ireland, and who founded, in 1166, the priory of All Saints in Dublin, granted to that monastic establishment the manor of Baldoyle, with all its serfs and farmers! In 1369, Sir William de Windor, lord-justice of Ireland, held a parliament at Baldoyle. The village stands on the Portmarnock estuary, about half-a-mile north of the road which leads eastward from Dublin to Howth. It has a neat and comparatively comfortable appearance; and is much frequented in summer as a marine watering-place. Little trade exists. Its harbour is nearly dry; admits boats only before last quarter flood; and experiences an average tidal rise of about 12 feet. Yet there are good landing-places, with conveniences for drying nets; and a few wherries and smacks employ about 100 men in the fisheries. The Roman Catholic chapel stands in the village; and the parish-church, now an utter ruin, though picturesque, stands about a mile distant. Area of the village, 27 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,009; in 1841, 835. Houses 163.—This parish is a curacy in the dio. of Dublin, and forms part of the benefice of HOWTH: which see. The corporation of Dublin being the proprietors of the parish, and having let it tithe-free, the incumbent of Howth was currently regarded as having no right to any emolument from the parish; but, in 1837, he is officially reported to have obtained information from recent discoveries which appeared to entitle him to the tithes. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000; is grouped with the chapels of Howth and Kinseely in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement; and, jointly with them, has 3 officiates. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 85, and the Roman Catholics to 1,053; and 3 daily schools—2 of which were each salaried with £35 from the National Board, and served respectively for males and for females—had on their books 243 boys and 219 girls. In 1840, the salaries attached to the National schools were only £18 and £17.

BALDRASHANE, BALLYRASHANE, STYNGENSTOWN, or ST. JOHNSTOWN, a parish partly in the barony of Lower Duluce, co. Antrim, and partly in the Liberties of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Length, 4½ statute miles; breadth, 3¼; area, 6,361 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,851; in 1841, 2,658. Houses 478. Area of the Antrim section, 2,680 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,214; in 1841, 1,112. Houses 199. Area of the Coleraine section, 3,672 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,637; in 1841, 1,546. Houses 279. The surface is part of the low ground along the river Bann, immediately east of the town of Coleraine; it contains no mountain, and very little bog; and is nearly all good land, capable of fine cultivation.—The demesnes are Ballyvelin, Clogfin, Kirkistown, and part of Boardville.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £350. Gross income, £380; nett, £308 0s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. The vicarage and the rectory were formerly held separate, and the latter was appropriated to the chancellorship of Connor; but they became united under act of parliament in 1831. The church was built in 1826, by means of a grant of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance, from 30 to 50. Two Presbyterian meeting-houses have an attendance of respectively 350 and 400. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 116 Churchmen, 2768 Presbyterians, and 152 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools were attended, on the average, by 160 children; and 4 daily schools—one of which was parochial, with an assured salary of £20 a-year and £2 from the rector—had on their books 116 boys and 59 girls. In 1840, two National schools at Baldrashane and Damhead were attended by 136 children, and aided from the Board with respectively £4 and £2.

BALDRASHANE, a grange, in the Liberties of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Pop., in 1831, 982; in 1841, not separately returned.

BALDUNGAN, or BALDONGAN, a small parish, 5 miles south-east of Balbriggan, in the barony of East Balthoreby, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area, 853 acres. Pop., in 1831, 88; in 1841, 118. Houses

19. The surface extends along the sea-coast; and the land is, in general, good. A splendid and capacious castle, composed entirely of flint, stood on a bold eminence in the parish, and commanded an extensive and thrilling view over both sea and land. The ruins not long ago existed, and were both extensive and strongly picturesque. At the west end rose two square towers, to dignify and protect the grand entrance; and at the east end stood two towers of less noble aspect,—one of them apparently of later erection than the great body of the pile, and carrying up the staircase or path of ascent to the battlements. The castle was probably founded, late in the 13th century, by the Barnewall family; it soon passed, by marriage, to the family of Bermingham; and, in the 18th century, it was again affected by matrimonial alliance, and transferred to the Earls of Louth. Previous to 1635, it was the residence of Nicholas Fitzwilliam, son of Sir Thomas Fitzwilliam of Merzon; in the Carolist war, it was held and defended for the parliamentarians by Colonel Thomas Fitzwilliam, the son of Nicholas; and, before the close of that war, it was surrendered to the royalists, dismantled, and partially blown up with gunpowder. Archdall, Grose, and a crowd of scribblers in their train, assert that Oliver Cromwell battered the castle from his ships; while others—aware perhaps that the position and altitude of the fortalice with relation to the shore rendered such an exploit nearly if not quite impossible—say, more cautiously, that he attempted to batter it from a neighbouring hill. A tradition, recorded by Archdall, that the castle was “at different times a friary and nunnery,” is altogether unworthy of credit, but may have originated in the fact, that an establishment of Knights Templars in the immediate vicinity, was dedicated to the Virgin Mary. Mr. Brewer, describing the ruins of that establishment as they existed in 1824, says, “At a very short distance [from the castle] are the remains of a church, extending to the length of more than 80 feet. The steeple is a curious structure, and was apparently designed to answer the purpose of defence as well as that of religious appropriation. This building is a tower of 10 angles, and is of such excellent workmanship and materials, that it has little to apprehend from the hand of time, if left free from the more destructive operations of man. The walls of the church and of that part of the tower which is near the body of the fabric, have perforations about 4 or 5 inches square; probably intended for openings to musketry during the civil wars of the 17th century. In the vicinity of the church are the ruins of buildings which may have been used by the religious fraternity noticed in the tradition preserved in the Monasticon Hibernicum.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition and gross income, £52 4s.; nett, £48 5s. 9d. Patron, the Earl of Howth. The rector is non-resident. A curate has a stipend of £40. A house in the adjoining parish of Balrothery is used as the parochial place of worship. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither glebe-house, chapel, nor school.

BALDURROCK, a lugubriously interesting locality, the site of a supposed ancient city, and the scene of a sort of necropolis, on the west coast of the Mullet, about 4 miles south-west of Belmullet, barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. In a great sandy plain along the seaboard, occur a series of small circular areas, stripped, within the last 50 years, of great heaps of incumbent sand, and disclosing numerous antique relics of human sepulture. Two of the areas are each about 60 feet in circumference; one, about 120; and one, about 300. J. B. Trotter,

Esq., who visited the locality in 1817, says respecting one of the smallest, "There we saw vestiges of stone coffins, formed by placing large flat stones at the sides, bottom and head, in the manner of a coffin, and there had been also a stone lid. When first discovered, some years ago, the skeletons of the dead were in them. They were scattered afterwards. Several skulls, and some remarkably large thigh and other bones, apparently long preserved, were lying near them." Respecting the one of 120 feet in circumference, he says, "In the centre of it was a round kind of building, 10 feet high, and full of sand: round this, were stone-coffins, skulls, and bones;" respecting the largest, he says, "It was once enclosed by a wall, some of which remained. A division had been made into two parts of this spot, and one head or grave stone stood in it. Skulls were scattered around;" and respecting the whole, he states on the authority of a resident gentleman who ciceroned him, "that on the first discovery of these places, by the blowing away of the sand, the interior of the coffins had the appearance of having been scorched by fire." About 3 furlongs from these very ancient monuments, is the site of the supposed old city of Baldurrock. A tradition prevails, that an invading army of an early king of Munster was with vast slaughter, defeated in a great battle at the place, and that the burying-grounds were formed by the interment of his slain troops. But the sweepings of a battle-field, even in civilized times, and much less in a period of barbarism, are rarely, perhaps never, accompanied by the observance of any very formal rites of sepulture, or the formation of any regular cemetery. Mr. Trotter, acknowledging himself quite at fault as an antiquary, and adopting the notion, which some have favoured, of a quondam continent in the Atlantic, says, "The ancient city of Baldurrock, and these cemeteries, may have once been in the centre of extended lands; for marks of the encroachment of the sea are evident. Ireland may have been joined to the now distant islands, or formed part of the Atlantic continent, which gave name to the sea."

* * These are conjectures; but that a very different state of things existed once at Baldurrock, is manifest. The mind endeavours to penetrate into the gloom and uncertainty of antiquity with pleasing and tremulous anxiety; doubts where it is advancing, yet longs to proceed, to ascertain what it hopes or fears." See, for traditions and remarks respecting the supposed continent, the article HY-BRAZIL.

BALDWINSTOWN, a village in the parish of Garristown, barony of West Balrothery, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 218; in 1841, 133. Houses 23.

BALDWINSTOWN, a village in the barony of Bargie, and near the head of Ballyteigue bay, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the road from Wexford to Clonmines, 2 miles east by north of Duncormuck. In its vicinity are the mansions of Richfield and Brideswell,—the latter, the residence of Dowager Lady King.

BALEEK, or BELLECK, a quoad sacra parish, containing a village of the same name, in the quoad sacra parish of Loughgilly, barony of Upper Orior, co. Armagh, Ulster. See LOUGHGILLY. The village stands 3½ miles east of Newtown-Hamilton, on the road from that town to Newry. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 129; in 1841, 112. Houses 20. Length of the parish, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, about 5,000 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,396. A portion of the surface is unreclaimed; and the rest is, in general, good land.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition—being that of the tithes of 8 out of 12 townlands comprehended in the parish—£179 2s. 3d. Gross income, £201 2s. 3d.; nett, £191 1s. 2d. Patron, the incumbent of Loughgilly. The church was built in 1825, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, 55 in winter, 95 in summer. A Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of between 300 and 400. A Roman Catholic chapel is attended, in summer, by 700; and is grouped with another chapel in Loughgilly, and one in the perpetual curacy of Ballymoyer, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 316 Churchmen, 938 Presbyterians, and 2,149 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were attended, on the average, by from 133 to 143 children; and 5 daily schools had on their books 159 boys and 110 girls. One of the daily schools was aided with £1 a-year from the curate, and a free house; two others, with small premiums from the London Hibernian Society; and the same two, with respectively £8 and £9 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice.

BALFEIGHAN, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Upper Deece and of co. Meath, and about a mile north of Killocock, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,617 acres. Pop., in 1831, 155; in 1841, 152. Houses 23. The land is of second-rate quality. The surface is drained by Rye Water, touched by the Royal Canal, and partially adorned with Piercetown demesne.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Meath; and forms part of the benefice of RUDDONS-TOWN: which see. Tithe composition, £87 13s. 9½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 132; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALGALLEY HEAD, a promontory on the coast of the barony of Glenarm, 4 miles north by west of Larne, co. Antrim, Ulster. In its vicinity are the ruins of Cairn-castle, and the old seat of the Shaw family. The coast here, and northward to Glenarm, is singularly grand and impressive; and the hard chalk-cliffs of which it consists are traversed, a very little above high watermark, by the elaborate new road lately formed by the Board of Public Works.

BALGREE, a hamlet in the parish of Kilskeer, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 77.

BALGRIFFIN. See BELORIFFIN.

BALISAKEERY, BALLISAKEERY, or BALLY-SAKEERY, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Tyrawley and of co. Mayo, and 2½ miles south-east of Killalla, Connaught. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, ¾; area, 12,692 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,993; in 1841, 6,034. Houses 1,035. The surface extends along the west bank of the river Moy; consists, over nearly one-fourth of its area, of waste and boggy land; and is traversed northward by the road from Ballina to Killalla.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Killalla. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £193 4s., and the rectorial for £175 7s. 8d.; and the latter are appropriated to the deanery of Killalla. The vicarages of Balisakeery and Rathrea, [see RATHREA.] constitute the benefice of Balisakeery. Length, 7½ miles; breadth, 3; area, 15,422 acres, 1 rood, 30 perches. Gross income, £307 4s.; nett, £265 8s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1810, by means of a loan of £946 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitting 400; average attendance, 90. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and is served by two officiates, one of whom officiates also at the chapel of Kiline. Presbyterian, Baptist, and Wesleyan meeting-houses, are attended by respectively 90, 45, and 25. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 715 Churchmen, 11 Protestant Dissenters, and 5,423 Roman Catholics; the inhabitants of the union consisted of 807 Churchmen, 31 Protestant Dissenters, and 7,276 Roman Catholics; and 9 daily schools in the union—7 of which were in Balisakeery—had on their books 390 boys and 287 girls. One of the Balisakeery schools was aided with £14 a-year and a house from Miss Knox of Rappa; one with £20 certain, and £10 conditional, from the Board of Erasmus Smith; one with £2 from Archdeacon Verschoyle, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society; and two with respectively £12 and £14 from the Baptist Society. The National Board, in 1840, had a school at Mullyfarry; and, in 1839, granted £73 10s. toward the building and fitting up of a school-house at Rathglass.

BALL, or BALLAGH, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Claumorris, co. Mayo, Connaught. The village stands $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles east-south-east of Castlebar, on the road thence to Strokestown. Though much spoken of by ancient chroniclers, it is now a small collection of poor houses, and continues to draw notice only by containing a round tower and some prostrate ruins of an old church, and by being the scene of some extraordinary periodical rites on the part of the Roman Catholic peasantry. The round tower has lost its upper part, and is now no more than about 50 feet high. The church ruins, in its vicinity, are small, plain, and constructed of the same kind of stones and workmanship as the tower. Dr. McParlan, the author of the Agricultural Survey of Mayo, contends that the village received its name from being a place where the heathen god Bal was worshipped, and notices, in the following terms, the periodical rites which it continues to witness: "This Ball is to this day a most extraordinary place of superstitious worship. Here are a couple of small chapels vaulted over a river, which runs through the town; and once a-year, I think in autumn, immense swarms of people crowd from all parts to perform certain circuits and evolutions on their knees, dropping, as they proceed in describing those figures, a certain number of beads to various intentions, and in expiation of various sins; but the day closes most cheerfully in eating and drinking. Mr. Lynch, who lives just at the town, assured me that not less than 300 sheep are consumed at this festival." Archdall, who must very often be read with considerable variations upon his language, says that an abbey was built and presided over in the 7th century by St. Mochua or Cronan. In 1840-41, the dispensary of Ball and Ballyglass, belonging to the Castlebar Poor-law union, received £158 19s., expended £158 9s., made 5,236 dispensations of medicine, and served for a district of 37,154 acres, with 11,888 inhabitants. Fairs are held on June 11, Sept. 4, and Nov. 7. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 343; in 1841, 562. Houses 99.—The parish declines southward from the extremity, or outer edge of the basin, which is drained to Loughs Mask and Corrib; it forms part of what are called the plains of Mayo; and, in a general point of view, it consists of excellent land. Athavallie, the seat of the Rev. Sir F. Lynch Blasse, Bart., adjoins the village. Length of the parish, 4 miles; breadth, 3½. Area, 5,509 acres, 1 rood, 25 perches,—of which 90 acres, 26 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,586; in 1841, 1,934. Houses 331.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £175. The rectories of Ball, MINOLA, and ROSSLEE, [see these articles,] constitute the benefice of Ball, and a prebend in the cathedral church of Tuam. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 4. Gross income, £406 14s.; nett, £378 16s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The benefice comprehended, till a few years ago, not only its present parishes, but also those of Drum, Ballintubber, and Towaghty; it derived from the latter parishes one-third of their tithes; and it had in one of them its place of worship. See DATUM. The union, as at present constituted, has no church; but, in 1834, public worship was conducted during about six months in the year, in the Court-house of Ball, by a resident clergyman, who was unconnected with the benefice; and, in 1836, a curate was employed at a salary of £34 12s. 3½d. Attendance, about 25. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 700, and is linked with Balcarra chapel in Drum, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement. In 1834, the Protestants of Ball parish amounted to 20, and the Roman Catholics to 1,682; the Protestants of the union to 77, and the Roman Catholics to 4,837; 2 hedge-schools in the parish had on their books 68 boys and 22 girls; and these, with 4 other daily schools in the union, had 261 boys and 130 girls.

BALLAGH, or BELOUGH, a village in the parish of Clounuity, barony of Lower Kilmamagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Area, 13 acres. Pop., in 1831, 400; in 1841, 217. Houses 33. Post town, Thurles.

BALLAGH, or FUNCHEON, a lake nearly in the centre of the barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Its length is about 2 miles. Two small streams enter on the north-west; and all surplus waters are supposed to pass through swallow holes into subterranean chamels. The lake embosoms some islands, and occasionally insulates a large promontory. Yet in spite of these islands, and of an eastern screen of hills, the sheet of water is tame and almost repulsive; its shores being all bare, and, except on the east, stretching away in low, marshy flats.

BALLAGHADIREEN, a post town in the parish of Killeleeman, barony of Costello, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the eastern border of a projecting wing of the county, and on the road from Loughford to Ballina, 14 miles north-west of Tulsk, and 14 east-south-east of Swineford. The surrounding country, especially toward Swineford, is prevailingly boggy, bleak, and desolate. The appearance of the town itself, too, is poor, and by no means inviting. Here is a regular and generally occupied barrack. Fairs are held on March 25, May 1, June 23, Aug. 1, Sept. 7, Nov. 1, and Dec. 22. In 1842, the Ballaghadireen Loan Fund had a capital of £3,610, circulated £18,941 in 4,108 loans, cleared £211 17s. 10d., and expended for charitable purposes, £138 15s.; but it also expended a part of its profits in payment of an agriculturist, under protest of the Loan Fund Board. In 1839-40, a dispensary in the town, under the Castlereagh Poor-law union, received £92, expended £81 13s. 10½d., made 2,521 dispensations of medicine, and served for a district of 53,526 acres, with 16,942 inhabitants. Area of the town, 42 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,147; in 1841, 1,342. Houses 202.

BALLAGHAN. See BELLAGAN.

BALLAGHKEEN, a maritime barony of co. Wexford, Leinster. It is bounded on the north by Gorey; on the east by St. George's Channel; on the south by Wexford-harbour, which separates it from Forth; and on the south-west and west by the river Slaney, which divides it from Shelmalier and Scarewalsh. Its length north-north-eastward is 16 miles; its breadth east-south-eastward is 8½ miles; and its area is 86,539 acres, of which 139 acres are tideway. Its surface is a series of gently swelling hills and some beautiful vales; it abounds in marl, and is productive in grain; its low and flat grounds are alluvial, and its rocks are all secondary: its coast-line, except along Wexford harbour, has scarcely an indentation, or even a sinuosity.—This barony contains the extra-parochial district of Tara Hill, part of the parishes of Ballinaslane, Donaghmore, Kilcavan, Kiltrisk, St. Margaret's, Templeshannon, Kilmuckuck, Kilniehaelogue, Monamolin, and Skreen, and the whole of the parishes of Ardmine, Ballyhuskard, Ballyvaldon, Ballyvalew, Castle-ellis, Edermine, Kilancooly, Killenagh, Killila, Killisk, Kilmuckridge, Kilmalogue, Kilnemanagh, Kiltannel, and Melina. Pop., in 1831, 27,867; in 1841, 31,249. Houses 5,460. Families chiefly employed in agriculture, 4,110; in manufactures and trade, 1,177; in other pursuits, 501. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 5,713; who could read but not write, 2,391; who could neither read nor write, 5,344. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,675; who could read but not write, 4,284; who could neither read nor write, 6,753.

BALLAGHKEEN, a hamlet in the parish of Ballyhuskard, barony of Ballaghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. Area, 5 acres. Pop., in 1841, 132. Houses 22.

BALLAGHMOON, a small parish on the southern border of the barony of Kilkea and Moon, and of co. Kildare, Leinster. It lies 3 miles south-west by south of Castle-Dermot, and is bisected by the road between that town and Carlow. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, three-fourths of a mile; area, 2,178 acres. Pop., in 1831, 311; in 1841, 308. Houses 48.—This parish is a rectory, and a component part of the benefice of CASTLE-DESMOT [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £110. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 307; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLAGHTOBIN. See BALLYTOBIN.

BALLAGHY. See BELLAGHY.

BALLANACOURTY. See BALLINACOURTY.

BALLANE, or BULLANE, a parish on the northern border of the barony of Loughrea, 4½ miles north of the town of Loughrea, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,729 acres. Pop., in 1831, 551; in 1841, 445. Houses 70. Both the arable and the pasture lands are of a very superior description.—This parish is a vicarage and a component part of the benefice of KILCOLGAN [which see], in the dio. of Kilmacduagh. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £12, and the rectorial for £35; and the latter are appropriated to the prebendary of Annacalla and the sacrist of Kilmacduagh cathedral. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450, and is united to the Clontarf chapel of Killaue at Newtown, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a daily school, held in the Roman Catholic chapel, was attended by 45 boys and 25 girls.

BALLARD, a promontory or headland in the barony of Ibrickane, co. Clare, Munster. It forms part of a bold and precipitous piece of coast, and is situated on the south side of the entrance of Dunbeg bay, and 14½ miles north-east of Loop Head lighthouse.

BALLEE, or BALLY, a parish in the barony of Lecale, about 2 miles south-east of Downpatrick, on the way thence to Ardglass, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 6,428 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,118; in 1841, 2,255. Houses 408. The civil parish, as constituted previous to 1834, included two districts now united to Saul and Ardglass.

Pop., in 1831, of the whole, 2,444; of the part now united to Saul, 136; and of the part now united to Ardglass, 190. "A perpetual cure of the same name," says the Ecclesiastical Revenues Report, "had been established within the rectory of Ballee, which parish was appropriated to the deanery of Down; but by order in council of 31st Oct., 1834, the rectory of Ballee was disunited from the deanery; and said rectory, with the perpetual cure thereof, was erected into a separate and distinct parish, severing therefrom the tithe composition arising from and out of the townlands of Slievenagiddle, Loughmoy, Carrownacow, Ballyrenan, Ballyallen, and Upper and Lower Ballynacross in Ballee parish, and annexing same for ever to the foresaid deanery; but, providing that the cure of souls within said townlands shall continue to belong to the rectory of Ballee. The two townlands of Jordanscrew and Kildarescrew, with the tithe composition, and cure of souls therein, were, by said order, disunited from Ballee parish, and annexed to the perpetual cure of Ardglass, to which cure was also annexed the tithe composition arising from Ballybosset townland, situate in Ballee parish,—providing, however, that the cure of souls within Ballybosset townland shall continue to belong to the rectory of Ballee; and by the order aforesaid, the townland of Ballystokes, with the tithe composition and cure of souls thereof, was disunited from Ballee parish, and annexed for ever to the parish of Saul." The land is, for the most part, of a good arable quality. Slievenagiddle, on the north border, has an altitude of 414 feet.—This rectory is a separate benefice in the dio. of Down. Tithe composition of the rector's portion, £340 13s. 2d.; of the dean of Down's portion, £146 7s. 0½d.; of the curate of Ardglass's portion, £97 7s. 4½d.; of the rector of Saul's portion, £14 6s. 11½d. Gross income of the benefice, £354 13s. 2d.; nett, £302 0s. 7d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1740; but from what funds, cannot be ascertained. Sittings 180; attendance 60. A Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of from 100 to 200; a Roman Catholic chapel of 100; and the latter is clustered in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, with Larana and Strangford chapels in Ballyculter. In 1834, the ecclesiastical parish contained 255 Churchmen, 518 Presbyterians, and 1,364 Roman Catholics; and had a National school, a parochial school, and 4 other daily schools, on whose books were 213 boys and 174 girls. See ARDGLASS and SAUL. In 1839, the National Board granted £98 toward the building and fitting up of a school-house at Ballycrotty; and in 1840, they had one school at Ballee on a salary of £10, and another at Slievenagiddle on a salary of £4.

BALLEEN, a parish in the barony of Galmoy, about 2 miles north-west of Freshford, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 2,559 acres. Pop., in 1841, 837. Houses 127. The Pop. Returns for 1831 state the pop. then at 1,029, and appear to include under Balleen the parishes also of Sheffin and Coolcashin. The Ecclesiastical Revenues Report links these three parishes together, yet exhibits them separately, and assigns to Balleen, in 1831, a pop. of only 157. The Public Instruction Reports seem to agree with the Ecclesiastical Revenues Report, yet omit the name Balleen, and use that of Clontubrit. To complete this confusion, other works represent Balleen and Clontubrit as quite separate parishes, and, at the same time, appear to make them one in statistics. All confusion, however, has been terminated by the Ordnance Survey. The highest ground has an altitude of 635 feet. The demesnes are those of Foyle House and Elnwood Lodge. Ballyspellan

Spa is on the west border. See BALLISPELLAN. The castle of Balleen, an imposing ruin, and once a place of considerable extent and strength, crowns a slowly ascending yet rather lofty hill, and overlooks a richly cultivated and beautifully diversified expanse of country. The edifice is of various dates; it is said by tradition never to have been completed, and it consisted, when in its prime, of two towers, an intervening large hall, a fine eastern wing, an inner and outer ballium, and the several offices of a large castle, the whole surrounded by a deep fosse, which was filled from an adjoining stream. The walls of the ballium are partly overthrown, and lie in large prostrate masses; and where they are in any degree preserved, they exhibit large square loopholes, suitable to small early artillery. Excepting these and the two towers, all the castle, its halls and vaulted chambers, are now a confused mass of rubbish; and "as if to mock at the departed grandeur of the place, a hovel has arisen within its fallen courts, and includes the ancient portal through which often passed with goodly retinue many a noble chieftain of the Butlér race." The north-west tower, now in a very dilapidated condition, seems to have been erected in the 14th century; it was the keep of the original fortalice, and it consisted of four stories, one of which was vaulted. The other tower is, as to its mere masonry, in a state of tolerable preservation; it was built in the year 1455 by the fifth Earl of Ormonde, a powerful noble, and a favourite of Henry VI.; and its windows, with graceful label-mouldings, mullions, and transoms, partly overhung and interlaced with ivy, are of elegant construction. The castle was a principal stronghold of the Earls of Ormonde, and was probably designed by the fifth Earl to be extended and beautified into a residence befitting his high rank and power. Margaret Fitzgerald, the lady of the eighth Earl, and a person of extraordinary energy of character, is traditionally said to have made additions to the edifice; and the neighbouring peasantry still point out the 'chair' of 'Peg Garret,' or 'Maughridh n Gearodh,' the names by which they designate the lady. In 1600, the castle, along with the fortalices of Athnagar and Mountgarret, was taken by Thomas, Earl of Ormonde, from the Count Mountgarret, then in rebellion; and it eventually suffered dismantling and dilapidation from the soldiers of Cromwell—Balleen is a vicarage and a component part of the benefice of ARGTOWRE [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Its vicarial tithes, jointly with those of Coolcashin, are compounded for £54 16s. 8d.; and its rectorial tithes—the rectorial tithes of 'Clontubrit'—jointly with those of Coolcashin, are compounded for £109 13s. 4d., and appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Canice, Kilkenny. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 200; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement is grouped with the chapels of Coolcashin and Lisdowney. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics, and there was no school.

BALLENVALLEY (THE), or BALLINAVELLEY, a streamlet in the parish and barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. An extraordinary, but ephemeral fame which it acquired, in connection with the discovery of native gold, belongs rather to the mountain of Croghan-Kimshela than to it. See CROGHAN.

BALLIBAY. See BALLYBAY.

BALLIBOFEY See BALLYBOFEY.

BALLICKMOYLER, a village in the parish of Killeban, barony of Slieveinargy, Queen's co., Leinster. Area, 12 acres. Pop. in 1831, 249; in 1841, 294. Houses 48. It stands about 5 miles south by west of Athy. Its houses, compared with those of many other villages, are tolerably good and comfortable. Being the only village in the barony, and in the midst of a highly disturbed district, it suffered so grievously in the rebellion of 1798, that its market was destroyed, and half of its houses were made a heap of ruins. It has a patent for a weekly market, and for fairs on March 15 and Nov. 11. In 1839-40, a dispensary here, under the Carlow Poor-law union, received £96, expended £103 10s., made 1,050 dispensations of medicine to 709 patients, and served for a district of 16,537 acres, with 7,396 inhabitants. Contiguous to the village is the seat of Cooper-hill.

BALLINA, a post, market, and sea-port town, in the parish of Kilmoremy, and barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the left bank of the river Moy, 5 miles south of the point where that stream begins to expand into Killalla bay, 9 miles north of Foxford, 29 miles west-south-west of Sligo, 54 north-west of Tulsk, and 116 from Dublin by way of Boyle and Banada, 118½ by way of Longford and Ballaghaderreen, and 126½ by way of Boyle and Ballysadare. On approaching it from Banada, and clearing the glen of Lough Talt, the traveller gradually opens the dismal waste of bog around the north base of the Lurgan hills; but on advancing, he descends nearly the whole of the vast expanse of plain from Ballina to Sligo, intersected and wooded along the north by the arms and bosom of the Atlantic ocean, screened on the south by the Lurgan hills, overhung on the west by the wild and lofty uplands of Erris, climbing away to the dome of the monarch mountain Neplín, and both variegated and embellished on the east by fertile, cultivated, and picturesque hills which blend with the mural cliffs of Benbulbin. The approach by way of Ballaghaderreen and Foxford leads almost uniformly through a poor, moonish, dreary country, and offers little relief to the eye till the banks of the Moy are reached in the immediate vicinity of the town. The approach by way of Ballysadare, or from Sligo and Ulster, conducts for a great distance along an alternation of brief fairy spots and large sheets of semi-wilderness; but, to adopt the words of Mr. Fraser, "Within five miles of Ballina, we pass, at about a mile from the road, Cottlestown, the old seat of Col. Kirkwood, and, at two miles, close on the shore, and near the singularly formed and extensive ranges of sand hills which are clustered about the mouth of the Moy, are Scurmore and Moyview cottages, the latter the occasional residence of the Hon. Col. Wingfield. The arid sand hills, partially covered with sea-bent, and tenanted only by rabbits and sea-birds, while they are highly injurious to the navigation of the Moy, break and diversify its lucid waters, and, from their picturesque outlines, add much to the beauty of Moyview and Scurmore, and several other villas along this part of the coast." As we approach Ballina, the aspect of the country improves, the extensive plantations of Belleek Manor, the seat of Col. Knox Gore, crowning the left banks of the Moy, and embosoming his modern beautiful Elizabethan mansion; Belleek-castle, the residence of Edward Howley, Esq., which tops the Knoll overhanging the river; the Moy, one of the finest of our rivers, with its ample and picturesque tributary, the Bunree, rushing over its rocky bed; the spacious bridges, with their broad avenues; the town rising, on the opposite banks of the river, with Neplín, the most gigantic of our mountains,—are all seen in succession, and fully recompense us for the bleak unwooded scene we have just traversed."

The town itself is not altogether unworthy of its fine site, or out of keeping with the scenic character of its environs. Excepting Ballinaloe and Westport, no town in Connaught excels it in cleanliness, neatness, regularity, occasional embellishment, and comparative freedom from every offensive property. The Moy, while sweeping past it, separates the county of Mayo from a wing or projection of the county of Sligo; and bears on its right bank the beautiful and more ancient town of ARDNAREE: which see. Ballina, in the large and popular sense, includes both Ballina proper and Ardnaree; and thus understood, is the third in bulk and commercial importance of the towns of Connaught, being inferior in these properties only to Galway and Sligo, just as in attraction it is inferior only to Westport and Ballinasloe. Two bridges connect the two parts of the town; one of these, if it have not within the last five or six years been replaced by a new erection, is a very fine old structure of 16 arches; and above it are considerable rapids and a salmon-weir, where salmon are caught in such plenty that an annual rental of £1,000 is said to be paid for the fishery. See MOY. A straight and terraced street of Ballina proper runs parallel with the river; is rather neatly edificed; is the chief seat of local business; and possesses shops and houses which would be creditable to any town. Most of the other streets intersect one another at right angles; and, though far from wanting the patches and lines of mere cabins, or poor single-floored cottages which so abound in Irish second-rate towns, they exhibit very considerable aggregate pretensions in domestic architecture. Great improvements, too, have been very recently effected. A court-house is the most noticeable civil public building. The ecclesiastical structures, and the schools, as well as the statistics connected with them, are partly noticed in the article ARDNAREE, and will be fully exhibited in the article KILMOREMOY.

Ballina is the head of a Poor-law union, in the counties of Mayo and Sligo. The dispensary districts of the union are Ballina, Belmullet, Binghamtown, Castleconnor, Crossmolina, Killalla, and part of Dromore-West; and, excepting the latter, the chief part of which is in Sligo union, they comprehend an area of 579,079 acres, with 95,962 inhabitants. In 1839-40, the Ballina dispensary received £184 1s. 3d., expended £182 19s. 11d., administered to 1,965 patients, and served for a district of 75,030 acres, with a population of 22,030. In the same year, a fever hospital in the town had 138 intern patients, received £115 15s. 5d., and expended £161 13s. 0½d.; it was originally a dwelling-house; and it contains only 11 beds, but is capable of containing 16. A large portion of the Poor-law union, at least one-third, is beyond the reach of any dispensary. This Poor-law union ranks as the 112th, and was declared on July 31, 1840. Its area is 507,154 acres, with a pop., in 1831, 115,030. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1811, are, in co. Sligo, Ardnaree, 6,613; Dromore-West, 3,330; Eskay, 6,129; Kilglass, 4,356; and Castle-Connor, 3,871.—and in co. Mayo, Ballina, 12,858; Backs, 6,606; Attymass, 3,276; Kilgarvan, 4,230; Ballisakeery, 5,993; Killalla, 7,054; Lacken, 7,587; Ballycastle, 4,110; Kilfian, 7,637; Crossmolina, 11,479; Belmullet, 10,742; and Binghamtown, 9,150. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 11 and 33; and of the latter, 4 are returned by the division of Ballina, 3 each by the divisions of Crossmolina, Belmullet, and Binghamtown, 2 each by the divisions of Ardnaree, Backs, Eskay, Ballisakeery, Killalla, Lacken, and Kilfian, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of property rated is £96,221; the total number of persons rated is 23,808; and of the latter, 6,002 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1.—5,072, not exceeding

£2,—4,062, not exceeding £3,—2,780, not exceeding £4,—and 1,612, not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Oct. 16th, 1840,—to be completed in April 1842,—to cost £9,400 for building and completion, and £1,980 for fittings and contingencies,—to occupy a site of 8 acres, 15 perches, purchased for £620,—and to contain accommodation for 1,200. The total expenses of the union up to Feb. 6th, 1843, amounted to £1,285 18s. 2½d.; and the workhouse, at that date, was not opened.

"In point of trade, extent, population, and improvement," says Mr. Fraser, "Ballina is the third town in the large county of Mayo; and, but for the impediments which the sand banks present to the navigation of the estuary, would rank much higher than it does as an export town. Its trade, however, has increased much; and a little is still done in coarse linens. * From the excellent fishing the Moy affords, the liberality of the proprietors of the fishery, and its proximity to Lough Conn, Ballina is the resort of many anglers during the summer season. It is also the principal road to the wild district of Erris, and a considerable thoroughfare; the cross mail-coaches to Sligo and Castlebar, the mail-cars to Foxford, Crossmolina, and Killalla, starting from it." This summary account, though apparently flattering, falls considerably within the truth. No other town in Mayo equals Ballina in population; and only Westport competes with it, and does so with no remarkable amount of superiority, in either seaward or inland commerce. The Moy is navigable to within a mile of the town, and brings the tide up quite to the bridges. During a series of years preceding 1833, the exports, consisting chiefly of grain, amounted annually to about 10,000 tons; and, though they suffered serious diminution in that year in consequence of the bankruptcy of a house in the trade, they immediately afterwards resumed their former amount. In 1835, the exports were valued at £70,568, and consisted of 8,839½ tons of corn and meal, 453½ tons of provisions, 40 tons of kelp, 6½ tons of untanned hides, and 6 tons of feathers; and the imports were valued at £13,532, and consisted of 600 tons of coals, 1,700 barrels of herrings, and various quantities of British and foreign iron, wrought iron, and hardware, mahogany, and other timber, wheat, slates, sugar, coffee, salt, spirits, tinued plates, glass, earthenware, and articles of cotton and woollen manufacture. In 1837, the estimated amount of carriage to the town consisted of 8,000 tons for exportation,—4,500 tons of agricultural produce for local consumption as food, and 200 for the use of local breweries and distilleries,—600 tons of excisable articles not received by direct importation,—and 25,000 tons of stone, lime, turf, &c.; and the estimated amount of carriage from the town consisted of 500 tons of imported articles, 400 of the surplus produce of breweries and distilleries, and 1,200 of coals, manure, &c. In 1838, the public conveyances were a mail-coach to Sligo, a mail-coach to Castlebar, and three mail-cars to respectively Killalla, Crossmolina, and Swineford. A branch office of the Provincial Bank was established in the town in 1828; one of the Agricultural and Commercial Bank, in 1835; and one of the National Bank, in 1837. Fairs are held on May 12, June 5, and Aug. 12.

In 1798, the French, under the command of General Humbert, were, for a brief period, in possession of Ballina. They arrived in Killalla bay, in 3 frigates from Rochelle, on the 22d of August; they consisted of 1,100, of whom 70 were officers; and having chased a garrison of 50 yeomen and fencibles of the Prince of Wales's regiment from Killalla, they advanced, on the 24th, toward Ballina, defeated the picket-guards, obliged the garrison to retire to Foxford, and took possession of the town. In the defeat of the pickets, the Rev. George Fortescue, nephew to Lord Clermont, and rector of Kilmoremy, who had volunteered, was slain. On the morning of the 26th, General Humbert, having received intelligence of the assembling of a force against him at Castlebar, moved in the direction of that town from Ballina, sturdily but vainly "resolving to achieve his utmost for the excitement of rebellion by an early and deep impression." See CASTLEBAR.—Three miles below Ballina, on the right bank of the Moy, stand the ruins of Connor-castle; and on a romantic site, in a sequestered dell, among undulated grounds, on the left bank of the river, stand the extensive ruins of Roskerk Abbey. Area of the town, exclusive of Ardnaee, 121 acres. Pop., in 1831, 5,510; in 1841, 5,313. Houses 962. See ARDNaEE.

BALLINA, a village on the western border of the parish of Templeckely, of the barony of Owney and Arra, and of co. Tipperary, Munster. It stands on the left bank of the Shannon, and on the road from Limerick to Castletown; and is connected with the episcopal town of Killaloe, by a bridge of 19 arches across the Shannon. The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish, in the united dio. of Cashel and Emly. See TEMPLECKELY and KILLALOE. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 832; in 1841, 774. Houses 105.

BALLINA, a Roman Catholic parish, in the united dio. of Kildare and Leighlin. It is in the barony of Carbery, co. Kildare. Post-town, Johnstown-Briggs, Enfield. See CADAMSTOWN. Ballina-house, within the district, is the seat of Richard More O'Ferrall, Esq.; and extensive plantations, belonging to that seat, contribute a broad and pleasing feature of relief to an adjoining expanse of flat boggy plain.

BALLINA, co. Cavan. See BALLINAGH.

BALLINABOY, a parish in the four baronies of Cork, Kerrycurryhy, Kinnalea, and Muskerry-East, co. Cork, Munster. The Kerrycurryhy and the Muskerry sections, contain respectively the villages of BALLINASSIG and BALLYTROOLEEN: which see. Length, 31 miles; breadth, 24. Pop., in 1831, 2,888; in 1841, 2,749. Houses 460. Area of the Cork section, 650 acres; of the Kerrycurryhy section, 2,834 acres; of the Kinnalea section, 2,961 acres; of the Muskerry section, 1,528 acres. Pop. of the Cork section, in 1831, 196; in 1841, 211. Houses 32. Pop. of the Kerrycurryhy section, in 1831, 1,045; in 1841, 1,003. Houses 173. Pop. of the Kinnalea section, in 1831, 973; in 1841, 938. Houses 144. Pop. of the Muskerry section, in 1831, 674; in 1841, 599. Houses 109. The surface is drained eastward by the Annaboy river; and lies at about equal distances from Cork, Bandon, and Kinsale. Six townlands are remarkable for their fertility; but the other districts contain a considerable extent of waste land, and can scarcely be reckoned more than tolerable.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Cork. Gross income, £69 5s. 6½d.; nett, £44 5s. 6½d. Patron, the Earl of Shannon. The tithes are compounded for £500, and are wholly inappropriate in the Earl of Shannon. "But it is reported," say the Ecclesiastical Revenue Commissioners, "that for the last 40 years, the parish has not paid tithes; the parishioners having occasionally, during that period, been engaged in giving resistance to his lordship; and alleging that they are at present ready to do so should he act on the suit still pending; conceiving that there exists, on his lordship's part, no legal claim." The church was built upwards of a century ago. Sittings 100; attendance 30. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is classed, with Ballaheady chapel, in Dunderrow. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 124, and the Roman Catholics to 2,872; and a pay daily school was attended by 30 boys and 20 girls. In 1840, two National schools, male and female, at Goggin's hill, were attended by respectively 125 and 50, and aided with respectively £12 and £10.

BALLINACALLA, a parish. See BALLINCALLA. BALLINACALLA, a village in the parish of Kilnamannagh, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 6 acres. Pop., in 1841, 171. Houses 28.

BALLINACALLY, a village in the parish of Kilchrist, on the east coast of the barony of Clonderalaw, co. Clare, Munster. It stands near the estuary of the Fergus, about 6½ miles south-south-west of the town of Clare. A small quay on the Fergus, in its vicinity, facilitates the exportation of farm produce. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1841, 194. Houses 29. The ruin of Dangan tower or castle is in the neighbourhood.

BALLINACARGY, a village, or small post-town, in the parish of Kilbixy, barony of Moygoish, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the banks of the Royal Canal, and on the road from Mullingar to Strokestown, 5 miles east by south of Colehill, and 7½ west-north-west of Mullingar. Though a small it is a thriving town; and it is surrounded by a fertile and comparatively improved district of country. A townland which is cognominal with it, and in which is the town's site, comprehends an area of 166 acres. In the vicinity are Baronstown, the splendid seat of Mrs. O'Connor, Tristernagh, the decayed seat of Sir J. Piers, Bart., and several neat villas. A fair is held in the village on May 9th. In 1839–40, a dispensary here, under the Mullingar Poor-law union, received £92 12s., expended £92 10s., administered to 2,345 patients, and served for a district of 21,027 acres, with 7,200 inhabitants. Area, 32 acres. Pop., in 1831, 308; in 1841, 483. Houses 63.

BALLINACARGY, or BELLANACARGY, a village in the parish of Drong, barony of Tullaghgarvey, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands 6 miles south-west by west of Cootehill, on the road thence to Ballyhas. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 150; in 1841, 65. Houses 18.

BALLINACARRIG, a parish in the barony and county of Carlow, 1½ mile south-south-east of the town of Carlow, Leinster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 2,605 acres. Pop., in 1831, 615; in 1841, 692. Houses 124. A section which, in 1831, contained a pop. of 35, was recently transferred to the barony of Carlow from that of Rathvilly. The surface is drained westward to the Barrow by the river Burren; and, excepting a small quantity of bog, it consists of arable land and pasture.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Leighlin; and forms part of the benefice of STAPLESTOWN: which see. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £70, and the rectorial for £100; and the latter are appropriate, and held under lease from the dean and chapter of Leighlin. In 1834, the members of the Established Church amounted to 55, and the Protestant Dissenters to 7; the Roman Catholics, consisting of all the other parishioners, were returned in cumulo with all in the benefice; and 2 daily schools, the one of which was supported by the incumbent, and the other by private subscription, had on their books 20 boys and 20 girls.

BALLINACARRIG, a hamlet, the site of a curious old castle, and of a Roman Catholic chapel, in the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. The place—"the hamlet of the rock," as its name signifies—is on the south side of the Bandon river, about 8 miles west of the town of Bandon. The castle is a quadrangular pile, 96 feet high, surmounting a rocky ledge which overhangs a moderately sized lake. The hall is rudely vaulted; and occupies nearly the whole interior area; the walls are very thick; and a narrow spiral staircase ascends from story to story, leading successively to three small apartments, and to what probably was the principal room when the pile was inhabited. This last apartment is at the top of the edifice, spacious, and lighted with two very curious windows, the one of which overlooks the lake, while the other commands a view of the great and dismal bog of Moneneurg, and of the low furzy hills which bound the bog on the north. Both windows exhibit the Saxon arch, and a series of rudely carved devices: on the one appear the Virgin and Child; and on the other are a ladder, a cock, a hand, a heart pierced with transverse swords, some masonic emblems, and the initials of the castle's founders, with the date of its erection. The rock which bears aloft the pile, falls on one side sheer down, 30 or 40 feet, to the bed of a tumbling brawling stream, which is fed by the neighbouring lake. A small, circular, isolated watch-tower in front of the castle, is overgrown with ivy, ferns, and briary; and, as well as the castle itself, is now roofless.—Ballincarrig-castle was built, in 1583, by Randal MacCarthy, or by his wife, Catherine Collins, or by both. In the wars of 1641, it was garrisoned by the English, and regarded as a post of considerable and even noted strength. Up to 1815, when the Roman Catholic chapel of the hamlet was built, its hall was used as the place of meeting for the Roman Catholic congregation. A wild legend respecting the castle is told in No. 111. of the Dublin Penny Journal.

BALLINACARRIGA, a village in the parish of Kilmanagh, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 152. Houses 34.

BALLINACLASH, a quoad sacra parish, in the civil parish of Rathdrum, barony of Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 5; area, about 30,000 acres. The surface is drained by the northern and the middle head-waters of the river Ovoca; and contains some of the finest features and groupings of the exquisite scenery in the glens of these streams. Two-thirds of it are mountainous; and the rest are tillage, grazing, demesne, and woodlands. The village or hamlet of Ballinacash stands about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Rathdrum, on the road hence to Aughrim. In its vicinity are the brilliant demesnes of AYONDALE, BALLYARTHUR, and CASTLE-HOWARD: which see.—This parish is a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Dublin; and was constituted such by a deed bearing date 18th May, 1832. The curacy includes the royal chapelry of CARYSFORT: which see. Gross income, £50; nett, £30. Patron, the incumbent of Rathdrum. "Incumbent observes," say the Ecclesiastical Revenue Commissioners, "that in addition to the above sum, he allows a perpetual curate £50 per annum, in consideration of his discharging the ministerial duties of Carysfort chapelry, which lies on the south extremity of the parish. No glebe belonging to this cure; although incumbent reports that in Carysfort chapelry there is a glebe of 150 statute acres, worth about £100 per annum, which was granted by King Charles I., in 1628, for the support of the chaplain, but that it has been long since alienated to other purposes, but how, or by what means, is unknown, and is now in the hands of the Earl of Meath's tenants." The chapel of the curacy, situated at Ballinacash, was built in 1834 by means of £100 raised by subscription, and £900 granted by the late Board of First Fruits; and it has 200 sittings. The Carysfort chapel, situated 4 miles distant from the former, was built in 1827, at an expense of £100, contributed by the rector and the parishioners; and it accommodates 120 persons. Other statistics are mixed up with those of RATHDRUM: which see.

BALLINACLERAGH, a Roman Catholic parish, in the dio. of Kilmore. Post town, Ballinamore. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

BALLINACLOUGH, a parish in the barony of Upper Ormond, 3 miles south-east by east of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,869 acres, 2 roads, 4 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,140; in 1841, 1,152. Houses 162. The surface is traversed by the road from Nenagh to Borrisleagh; and is drained north-westward by the stream which flows past Nenagh to Lough Derg. The land is, in general, of good quality. The highest ground has an altitude of 350 feet above sea level, or of 163 feet above the level of the draining stream. The chief residences are Ballinacough, Coolagh, and Delisborough.—This parish is a vicarage, and also a perpetual curacy, in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £78 6s. 8d.; and the rectorial for £156 13s. 4d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Alexander Holmes, Esq. The vicarages of Ballinacough and TERRYGLASS, and the rectories of DROMINEER and KILKEARY [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Ballinacough, and the corps of the deanery of Killaloe. The parishes of the benefice are not contiguous, Dromineer being 7 miles distant from Ballinacough and Kilkeary, and separated from them by Mount-ea and Nenagh. Gross income, £427 1s. 8d.; nett, £269 7s. 4d. Patron, the Crown. Two churches and two Roman Catholic chapels, are situated in the curacies respectively of Ballinacough and Terryglass. In 1834, the Protestants of the united parishes amounted to 287, the Roman Catholics to 4,917; and 8 daily schools had on their books 230 boys and 136 girls.—The perpetual curacy of Ballinacough is commensurate with the parish. Gross income, £57 16s. 6d.; nett, £49 1s. 4d. Patron, the dean of Killaloe. The church was built in 1807, by means of a grant of £646 3s. 1d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 80; average attendance, about 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of between 300 and 400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is classed with the chapel of Kilmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 58, and the Roman Catholics to 1,149; and 3 daily schools, one of which was aided with an acre of land, and £5 from the dean, had on their books 101 boys and 26 girls.

BALLINACLOUGH, or DOLLARDSTOWN, a parish in the barony of Conagh, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 1,092 acres. Pop., in 1841, 630. Houses 90. It lies about 8 miles north-west of the town of Tipperary, and is traversed by the road thence to Limerick. The ecclesiastical parish is much smaller than the civil one, and contained, in 1831, a population of only 211.—This parish is a rectory, a prebend, and a component part of the benefice of KILCORNNAN, [which see.] in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £46. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 3, and the Roman Catholics to 214.

BALLINACOR (NORTH and SOUTH), two baronies, in co. Wicklow, Leinster. They are bounded, on the north, by co. Dublin; on the north-east, by the half-barony of Rathdown; on the east, by the baronies of Newcastle and Arklow; on the south-east, by the barony of Arklow; on the south, by co. Wexford; on the south-west, by the barony of Shillelagh; and on the west, by co. Carlow, and the barony of Talbotstown. Their greatest length, from north to south, is 23½ miles; and their greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 10 miles. Area of North Ballinacorr, 74,110 acres; of South Ballinacorr, 78,316 acres. The surface is a series of mountains, intersected by deep romantic glens, and picturesque narrow valleys; and contains the major part of the justly celebrated scenery of the county. The monarch mountain, LUGNAQUILLA, [which see,] towers aloft on the western border; and the bed of the Avonmore, the northern head-water of the Ovoca, forms, for some distance, the eastern boundary. The western and larger division is all granitic; a belt adjacent, and extending from end to end of the barony, consists of rocks altered by granitic influence, or rocks passing from granite to trap and argillaceous schist; and a comparatively small eastern district consists chiefly of greywacke and greywacke slate. A very large portion of the area is unimproved and uninhabited.—North Ballinacorr contains the whole of the parish of Rathdrum, and parts of the parishes of Callary, Derrylisossary, and Knockrath. Pop., in 1841, 10,196. Houses 1,473. Families chiefly employed in agriculture, 1,137; in manufactures and trade, 290; in other pursuits, 189. Males at and above 5 years of age, who could read and write, 1,805; who could read but not write, 940; who could neither read nor write, 1,792. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,277; who could read but not write, 1,160; who could neither read nor write, 1,919.—South Ballinacorr contains the whole of the parishes of Ballinacorr, Ballykine, Kilcommon, Moyne, and Preban, and parts of the parishes of Crosspatrick, Hacketstown, Kilpipe, Kiltogan, and Knockrath. Pop., in 1841, 15,491. Houses 2,440. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,069; in manufactures and trade, 409; in other pursuits, 97. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,690; who could read but not write, 1,393; who could neither read nor write, 2,886. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,422; who could read but not write, 1,828; who could neither read nor write, 3,349.

BALLINACORR, one of four denominations which constitute the ecclesiastical parish of Rathdrum, in the barony of South Ballinacorr, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Area, 17,449 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,221; in 1841, 1,350. Houses 208. The denomination does not, in modern times at least, appear to have been a separate parochial status; yet has been practically erected into a civil parish by the proceedings of the Ordnance surveyors, and of the officers of the last census. In 1834, 204 of its inhabitants were members of the Established Church, and the rest were all Roman Catholics. The village or hamlet of Ballinacorr stands on the right bank of the Avonbeg, 2 miles south-west of Rathdrum. The handsome, recently-built, Grecian villa of Ballinacorr, the seat of Mr. Kemmis, crowns a lofty piece of ground, and commands a delightful view down the vale of the Avonbeg.

BALLINACORRA. See BALLINACORRA.

BALLINACOURTY, a village and a low headland, at the east side of the entrance of Dungarvan Harbour, in the barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. The headland is called both Ballinacourty Point, and Wyse's Point. Vessels of large burden may safely run behind it at low water, and enjoy good shelter. The village stands near the extremity of the headland, about 2½ miles east by south of Abbesside. A pier was commenced here by the late Fishery Board, and completed in 1833, by contract under the Commissioners of Public Works, at a cost of £1,180; of which £830 was a grant from government, and £350 were contributed by Thomas Wyse, Esq., and others. The Ballinacourty boats are used very limitedly in fishing, and principally in conveying limestone along the coast. In the vicinity of the village, are Ballinacourty-house, the seat of Mr. Longan, and Ducks-pool, the seat of J. M. Galwey, Esq.

BALLINACOURTY, a maritime parish, at the head of the bay of Galway, and in the barony of Dunkellin, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 6,208 acres, 22 perches,—of which 172 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches lie detached. Pop., in 1831, 3,230; in 1841, 3,407. Houses 501. The land is a naked, shallow, limestone soil, which, when cleared and well-cultivated, is fertile, and produces the finest wheat in Ireland; but part of it is disposed in sheep-walk, and the rest is much forced and maltreated by mere sea-weed manuring. The parish includes several islands; the chief of which are Tawnish, St. Brendan's, and Inniscorn. The village of Ballinacourty stands on the north side of the cognominal creek, about 5 miles south of Oranmore. The creek, or pool, or natural harbour, opens from the head of Killoilgan bay; it is covered by a spit of beach which runs up that bay, and forms a natural pier or breakwater; it is one of the finest and safest stations which the bay contains; it has mud and grassy banks, and 14 feet of water at ebb tide; but it is entered by a narrow and somewhat intricate passage, and is, in consequence, considered a bar harbour. A pier, built by the Fishery Board, accommodates the fishermen of the village, affords occasional shelter to the boats of the bay, and serves as a landing-place for the sale or curing of fish; it consists of a work 154 feet long, which rises above high water, and a work of 80 feet in continuation over which the tide rises 7 feet; and it is formed by a cut across a narrow bank of gravel into a pool behind,—the cut being quayed on the east side in hewn limestone.—This parish is one of the 8 rectories included in the benefice, and the exempt and peculiar jurisdiction, of the wardenship of Galway. See GALWAY. Tithe composition, £180. The Roman Catholic chapel at Gurrane has an attendance of 1,800; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is grouped with the chapels of Oranmore and Frenchfort. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 3,475; 2 National schools at Gurrane, respectively for boys and for girls, and each aided with £7 10s., had on their books 69 boys and 51 girls; and 3 other daily schools, at Gurrane, Ballinacourty, and West-town, were attended by 118 children.

BALLINACOURTY, a parish in the barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It forms part of the roughly tumulated peninsula along the north coast of Dingle bay; and lies about 8 miles north-east by east of the town of Dingle, on the road thence to Tralee. It contains the hamlets of ANNASCALLE and BALLINCLARE; which see. Area, 5,318 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,884; in 1841, 1,472. Houses 247.—This parish is a vicarage and a part of the benefice of KILLYN [see that article], in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £84 15s.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the Earl of Cork. A church in the parish was built in 1816, by means of a loan of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 50; average attendance 35. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 450; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballinivoher. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 42, and the Roman Catholics to 1,972; and a daily free-school, supporteil by the Earl of Cork and the incumbent, had on its books 180 boys and 90 girls.

BALLINACRAGGY, a village in the parish of Dromcreehy, barony of Burren, co. Clare, Munster. Pop. in 1831, 123. See DROMCREEHY.

BALLINACREAGH, a village in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It stands $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile west-south-west of Clonakilty, on the road thence to Skibbereen.

BALLINACREEN, a village in the parish of Kilmahon, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 10 acres. Pop. in 1841, 126. Houses 24.

BALLINACURRA, or BALLINACORRA, a village in the parish of Middleton, baronies of Barrymore and Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It is situated on the Middleton river, upwards of a mile below the town of Middleton; and it is the port of that town, the outlet for the agricultural produce brought to its market, and the site of its small quay and of its principal corn stores. The country around it is fertile, and partially powdered and beautified with handsome lodges and cottages. In its vicinity stands Ballinacurra-house, the seat of Mrs. Garde. The river or creek expands, immediately below the village, into the forked belt of waters, one stripe of which wshes the north side, and another the east side of Great Island, in Cork Harbour. Area of the Barrymore section, 23 acres; of the Imokilly section, 7 acres. Pop. in 1841, of the B. section, 604; of the I. section, 108. Houses in the B. section, 116; in the I. section, 19. See MIDDLETON.

BALLINADEE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, and lying partly in the barony of West Muskerry, but chiefly in the eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 8,334 acres,—of which 697 acres are in Muskerry. Pop., in 1831, 2,600; in 1841, 3,038. Houses 486. The surface is drained southward by the river Bandon, and consists chiefly of arable land of medium quality. The village of Ballinadee stands in the East Carbery section, about 3 miles east of Bandon. Pop., in 1831, 228; in 1841, 284. Area, 29 acres. Houses 51.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ross. Tithe composition, £581 11s. 9d. The rectories of Ballinadee, KILGOBAN, RATHDOWLAN, and part of MACLONEIGH [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Ballinadee, and the crrps of the treasurerhip of Cork cathedral. The parishes are not contiguous. Gross income, £688 12s. 6d.; nett, £642 10s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75 and the use of the glebe-house and glebe. The church is old and of unknown cost.ittings 150; attendance 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is classed with the chapel of Petrelrine. In 1834, the Protestants of Ballinadee parish amounted to 129, and the Roman Catholics to 2,624; a Protestant Sunday school had an attendance of 15; and 2 daily schools, one of which was aided with £10 a-year from the rector and £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, were attended on the average by 80 scholars.

BALLINADRIMNA, a parish in the barony of Carbery, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 4,285 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,503; in 1841, 1,501. Houses 240. The average value of the land is 26s. per plantation acre. A chief feature is Garrisker, the handsome demesne of John Naugh, Esq., on the road between Kinnegad and Enfield.—This parish is a vicarage, and a part of the benefice of CASTLE-CARBERY [which see], in the dio of Kildare. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £30 15s. 11½d., and the rectorial for £61 11s. 3d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the Marquis of Downshire. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is grouped with the chapels of Cadamstown and Nurney. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 40, and the Roman Catholics to 1,374; and a daily school at Broadford was aided with £12 a-year from the National Board, and had on its books 63 boys and 58 girls.

BALLINAFAD, a village in the parish of Aughanah, barony of Tiraghirl, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands at the base of the Curlew hills, near the head of Lough Arrow, and on the mail-road from Dublin to Sligo, about 4 miles north-north-west of Boyle. In its vicinity are the ruins of a castle said by Grose to have been built by the MacDonoughs, but really built by Capt. John St. Barbe, who died in 1628. Area of the village, 12 acres. Pop. in 1831, 155. Houses 32.

BALLINAFAD, a townland and a hamlet in the parish of Clonfinlough, 2½ miles south of Stokestown, barony and co. of Roscommon, Connaught. The townland comprises 125 acres. Ballinafad-castle, some ruins of which are still visible, was the seat of one of the two rival chieftains of the sept of O'Connor. A fair is held at the hamlet on Aug. 27. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLINAFAD, the site of a Roman Catholic chapel, in the parish of Moyrus, barony of Ballinabinech, co. Galway, Connaught.

BALLINAFAGH, or BALLYNEFAGH, a parish in the barony of Clane, about 2½ miles west-north-west of Prosperous, co. Kildare, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 1½ mile; area, 4,155 acres. Pop., in 1831, 614; in 1841, 929. Houses 151. The surface, over several hundred acres, is bog, and elsewhere is land worth from 20s. to 30s. per plantation acre.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Kildare. The tithes of the townland of Staplestown belong to the incumbent of Donadea. Tithe composition of the other townlands, £103. Gross income, £126; nett, £108. Patron, the Crown. A curate, who acts for both this parish and adjoining ones, and has a salary of £80, receives £26 from the incumbent. The church was built in 1831, at the cost of £900, gifted by the late Board of First Fruits.ittings 200; attendance 12. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 937; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is grouped with the chapels of Balrahan and Clane. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 8, and the Roman Catholics to 617; and two National schools, the one for boys and the other for girls, aided with respectively £8 and £6, had on their books 64 boys and 74 girls.

BALLINAFUNA, a village in the parish of Clondulane, barony of Condons and Clongibbon, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 19 acres. Pop., in 1841, 318. Houses 56.

BALLINAGALL, a fishing village and a creek, on the south side of Dungarvan Harbour, about 3 miles south of the town of Dungarvan, in the barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. The fishermen of the village are said to be "the most persevering and industrious on the Waterford coast." The creek or natural harbour near the village, and immediately north of Helwick Head, is dry at low water, but has a depth, near the edge, of from 8 to 10 feet at high water. A rude pier of loose stones was built by the fishermen, and thrown prostrate by storms, and again often rebuilt and re-drestroyed, in a process of alternation which singularly illustrates the fishermen's perseverance. A work was projected some 15 years ago, under the Commissioners of Irish Fisheries, which was designed as a more permanent pier, and estimated to cost £1,200. H. Villiers Stuart, Esq., the proprietor of the village and circumjacent grounds, expended a large sum in excavating a harbour—which, after all his labour, proved to be an unsafe one—at Grandison, in the vicinity of Ballinagall.

BALLINAGALL, a splendid mansion and demesne, about 2½ miles north of Mullingar, on the road thence to Castlepollard, co. Westmeath, Leinster. The mansion, the seat of James Gibbons, Esq., is an edifice in the Grecian style, erected by the present proprietor, designed by Mr. Francis Johnston, and built at the cost, it is said, of more than £30,000. The surrounding demesne is one of the finest and most extensively planted in the county. "The handsome Grecian mansion," says Mr. Fraser, "accords with the rich and beautiful park around; while the schools and neat church in the demesne, together with the picturesque but comfortable houses for the tradesmen and labourers, show the good taste and liberality of the proprietor." The property, till a recent period, belonged to the Reynell family, and bore the name of Castle-Reynell. In the immediate vicinity is the finely scenic KNOCKDRIN, which see.

BALLINAGAR, a village in the parish and barony of Geashil, King's co., Leinster. It stands about 2½ miles south-west of Philipstown, on the road thence to Tullamore, at a point where a road branches off to Geashil. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 153; in 1841, 107. Houses 20.

BALLINAGERAIL, a village in the parish of Kilcarragh, barony of Clannaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 230; in 1841, 139. Houses 23. See KILCARRAGH.

BALLINAGH, BALLINAGH, or BELLANAGH, a small town, in the parish of Kilmore, barony of Clounmahon, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands 4½ miles south-south-west of Cavan, at the intersection of the road thence to Granard with the road from Dublin to Killeshandra. Fairs are held on the Thursday before Easter, and on June 5, Aug. 5, Oct. 2, and Dec. 21. In 1839-40, a dispensary here, under the Cavan Poor-law union, received and expended £61 4s., and made 2,570 dispensations of medicine. The surrounding country is beautifully featured with wood and water, villas and mansions. See KILMORE. Area, 58 acres. Pop. of the town, in 1831, 702; in 1841, 836. Houses 134.

BALLINAGORE, a village in the parish of Newtown, barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1831, 182; in 1841, 125. Houses 26. See NEWTOWN.

BALLINAGORY, or BALLYMAGORRY, a village in the parish of Leckpatrick, barony of Strabane, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands 2 miles north of the town of Strabane, on the road thence to Londonderry. Fairs are held on May 3, July 5, and Nov. 2. Area of the village, 8 acres. Pop., in 1841, 213. Houses 46.

BALLINAGUILSHA, one of a series of bogs, the other members of which are Clonbealymore, Ballywilliams, and Clonbrone, on the western border of King's co., Leinster. The series commences about 1½ mile east of Birr; continues on each side of the road for a mile, to Clonbealymore; stretches across to Coole and Killyon; and thence runs southward to the road between Birr and Killyon, which for nearly 1½ mile forms its southern boundary. Length, from west to east, about 2½ miles; breadth, about 2; area, 2,548 English acres. The summit and a great extent of the average surface of the tract lie from 70 to 87 feet above the level of the keystone of Macartney Aqueduct; and the natural taps or means of drainage are streams to the mill of Eglis at Ballinaguilsha and Cloncarbin, a stream at Rathin and Clonbealybeg, the barony stream between Lishen and Clonoughell, and 3 or 4 secondary outlets at Clonbrone, emptying themselves into the Birr river. Estimated cost of reclamation, £7,032 6s. 9d.

BALLINAGULLOCK, a quondam parish on the northern border of the barony of Bargie, and 3½ miles south of Taghmon, co. Wexford, Leinster. It figures, in the older authorities, as a vicarage in the dio. of Ferns; but seems to have been swallowed up by some neighbouring parish; so that it has no place in modern statistics.

BALLINAHAGLISH, a parish in the barony of Tyrrawley, 2½ miles south by east of Ballina, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 2; area, 12,650 acres,—of which 958 acres are under water. Pop., in 1831, 5,103; in 1841, 5,397. Houses 940. The surface extends along the left bank of the river Moy; is traversed by the road from Ballina to Foxford; contains a considerable amount of marshy, boggy, mountainous, and unprofitable land; and exhibits a prevailing wild and dreary aspect. The water area comprises 41 acres, 8 perches in Lough Conn, 656 acres, 13 perches in Lough Cullen, and 261 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches in the river Moy and in small lakes.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Killala, and forms part of the benefice of Ardagh or Kilmoremy. See ARDAGH. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £150, and the rectorial, jointly with those of Kilbelfad, for £240 3s. 2d.; and the latter are appropriated to the vicars choral of the two cathedral churches of Dublin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,000; and in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbelfad. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 116, and the Roman Catholics to 5,332; and 5 daily schools—one of which was aided with £10 a-year from the Baptist Society, another with £12 from that Society, and another with £5 from Mr. Knox of Mount Falcon, and £8 from the National Board—had on their books 254 boys and 173 girls.

BALLINAHAGLISH, a parish on the coast of the barony of Trughenackmy, 5 miles west of Tralee, co. Kerry, Munster. It contains the villages of CHAPELTOWN and KILFINURA; which see. Length and breadth, exclusive of impervious tracts of bog and mountain, respectively 3 and 2½ miles; area, 3,006 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,883; in 1841, 2,147. Houses 322. The surface extends along the north side of Tralee bay; runs out into a narrow westward peninsula; and has a serrated coast line, and a rugged interior.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Ardferd and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £161 10s. 9d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Sir Edward Denny, Bart. The rectories of ANNAGH and CLOCHERRIBRIEN [which see], form jointly with this vicarage, the benefice of Ballinahaglish. The parishes are contiguous. Gross income, £789 4s. 6d.; nett, £716 10s. 6½d. Patron, Sir Edward Denny, Bart. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church in Ballinahaglish is so old that the date and cost of its erection are unknown. Sittings 70; attendance, 15 in winter, 40 in summer. There is a church also in Annagh. The Roman Catholic chapels are in Annagh and Clocherribrien. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 49, and the Roman Catholics to 3,034; the Protestants of the union to 310, and the Roman Catholics to 7,635; the daily schools of the parish, to 3 hedge-schools, attended by 85 boys and 40 girls; and the daily schools of the union to 8, attended by 275 boys and 153 girls.

BALLINAHASSIG, or BALLINASSIG, a small village in the parish of Ballinaboy, on the western border of the barony of Kerriourihy, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the Annabuoyn river, and on the road between Cork and Kinsale, about 6 miles south of Cork, and about the same distance north of Kinsale. In 1839-40, a dispensary here, under the Kinsale Poor-law union, received £118 3s., expended £121 10s. 4d., made 3,152 dispensations of medicine to 2,032 patients, and served for a district containing 3,622 inhabitants. The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the dio. of Cork; the statistics of which are given in our notice of BALLINABOY: see that article. The river Annabuoyn, while in the vicinity, waters two well-wooded demesnes; passes beneath a stone bridge of 3 arches; flows along a deep channel; and is stocked with good trout, pike, tench, and eels. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 152. Houses 29.

BALLINAHINCH, a barony on the coast of the co. Galway, Connaught. It is bounded, on the north, partly by the Killeries, and partly by the summit-line of a range of mountains, which divide it from the county of Mayo; on the east, by the baronies of Ross and Moycullen; and on the south and west, by the Atlantic ocean. Its greatest length, from east to west, is 22 miles; its greatest breadth, from north to south, is 14 miles; and its area is 191,433 acres. As its northern division consists of a portion of Joyce-Country, and its southern division constitutes both the larger and the more boldly-featured part of Cunnemara, our articles on these districts must necessarily give a view of its whole surface. See JOYCE-COUNTRY and CUNNEMARA. The barony, generally regarded, possesses close similarity of physical and scenic character to the grandest maritime sections of the Highlands of Scotland; it abounds in long narrow sea-loughs, and interior fresh-water lakes, belted round with stripes of rich and fertile land; it flings far into the sea a series of bold and beetling peninsule and headlands, and sends soaring to the clouds a throng of picturesquely outlined mountain summits; and it expands in so great an aggregate of alpine upland and moorish bog as to be prevaillingly waste, impervious, and unimprovable. The parishes within its limits are Ballinakill, Ballindoon, Moyrus, and Omay. Pop., in 1831, 28,639; in 1841, 33,465. Houses 5,682. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 4,665; in manufactures and trade, 864; in other pursuits, 380. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,009; who could read but not write, 716; who could neither read nor write, 11,598. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 652; who could read but not write, 395; who could neither read nor write, 13,070.

BALLINAHINCH, a lake, a rivulet, a village, and a demesne, in the barony just noticed, co. Galway, Connaught. The lake is the most easterly of the chain of romantic lakes which extends through Cunnemara, and whose other chief links are Loughs Derryclare, Ina, and Garroimin. It washes the southern slopes of the Lottery Mountain,—the extreme or front height of the Binnabola group of Alps; it receives some of the rills which leap down that mountain's precipitous sides, and gathers all the drainage from the deep basin of Glen Hagan, which intersects the very centre of the Binnabola group; and it sends off to the sea its superfluous waters under the name of the Ballinabinn river. This stream meets the sea, or begins to expand into a long and sinuous estuary or marine inlet at the head of the Roundstone division of Birterbuy bay, and not very far below its efflux from the lake; but, though brief in course, it is powerful in scenery, and possesses the fame of being the best salmon-fishing stream in the province of Connaught. The marine inlet is navigable with three fathoms to near the bridge where the new coast road crosses the river; and as the road afterwards comes close to the shore at some steep rocky ground, a portion of the naturally mural shore has recently been shaped by art into a small quay. In the vicinity stands the village,—small and of little note. But both it and the quay may possibly rise into notice in connection with the shipment of a beautiful green marble, which is quarried in the Binnabola mountains, and which only waits to be better known in order to its very probably finding distant and multitudinous markets. A road to Ballinabinn from Oughterard was, previous to 1813, one of two lines of road, which constituted the only means of internal communication in Cunnemara. Ballinabinn-house, the seat of Mr. Martin, who is said to possess a greater number of acres than any other proprietor in Ireland, but whose landed property consists chiefly of the circumjacent wastes and mountains, stands on the banks of the lake, and not very far from the village. The mansion is large and plain; the demesne around it could be worked into one of the most picturesque in the kingdom; and both house and grounds command magnificent views of the Binnabola mountains, the lake, the vale of the river, and the islet-studded bays of Roundstone and Birterbuy. On a platform of timber piles, interlaced with wood, stands picturesquely in the lake the ruin of an ancient castle.

BALLINAHINCH (THE), a river of co. Down. See ANNACLOY.

BALLINAHINCH, a small town in the parish of Magheradroll, barony of Kineleary, co. Down, Ulster. It stands on the Annacloy or Ballinabinn river, and in the midst of the great roads leading from Lurgan, Dromore, Hillsborough, and Lisburn, to Downpatrick, 4 miles south-west of Saintfield, 8 east of Dromore, and 78½ north-north-east of Dublin. The country around is rocky, hilly, and broken; once nearly impracticable, but now intersected by good roads, and much improved. The manor on which the town stands was granted, by Charles II. to Sir George Rawdon, the ancestor of the present Marquis of Hastings; it continued till 1810 in the possession of the noble family of Moira; and it is now the property of D. Kerr, Esq. of Portavo. Montalto-house, adjoining the town, was formerly the chief seat of the Earls of Moira; and is occasionally resided in by the present proprietor. In June 1798, immediately after a repulse by the royal troops at Saintfield, about 4,000 insurgents reassembled, and took post at Ballinabinn. They at first occupied Windmill-hill, which overlooks the town on one side, while the high grounds of Montalto demesne overlook it on the opposite side; but, on the approach of General Nugent at the head of 1,500 men, they abandoned this hill to the occupancy of the royal troops, and took post on the Montalto heights. Next day a cannonade of three hours' duration was exchanged between the two armies; the town, lying between them, blazed in flames which had been kindled by Nugent's soldiery; and the insurgents, impatient at the prolongation of the contest, rushed to close combat, and achieved a momentary success at the eventual expense of utter discomfiture. "The Monaghan militia, posted with two field-pieces at Lord Moira's great gate," says Gordon, "were driven by an impetuous charge of pikemen back on the Hillsborough cavalry, and both together forced in disorder from their ground. But what their valour had gained was lost to the insurgents by their want of tactics. Assailed in flank by other troops, which gave time for rallying to the discomfited, they were thrown into confusion, and retreated up the high ground to the summit. After a defence of this post for some time, they fled in all directions, and again assembled on the mountains of Slieve-Croob. Here, after consultation, influenced by the same arguments which had been successfully urged to the insurgents at Antrim, they finally dispersed. Their loss at Ballinahinch was about 150: that of the royal forces seems to be stated too low at 40.—Fairs are held in the town on Jan. 1, Feb. 12, April 5, July 10, and Oct. 2. In 1838, the public conveyances were a coach and a car to Belfast, and a caravan in transit between Belfast and Castlewellan. In the town are the places of worship, and most of the schools of the populous parish of MAGHERADROLL: which see. About 2 miles south-south-west of the town, on the skirts of Slieve-Croob, is a chalybeo-sulphureous spa. Area of the town, 30 acres. Pop., in 1831, 970; in 1841, 911. Houses 151.

BALLINAHINCH, a Roman Catholic parish, on the borders of the counties Limerick and Tipperary, and in the united dio. of Cashel and Emlý. Post-town, Newport. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

BALLINAHOWN, a hamlet, south of the road between Athlone and Moate-Grenogue, co. Westmeath, and a Roman Catholic parish, intersected by that road, and situated in the diocese of Ardagh, Leinster. Post-town, Athlone. The statistics belong to the article KILCKRAGH: which see. Near the hamlet stands Ballinahown-house, the seat of Mr. Ennis.

BALLINAKILL, a market and post town, and formerly a parliamentary borough, in the parish of Dysert-Gallen, and on the southern verge of the barony of Cullinagh and of Queen's co, Leinster. It stands in the midst of a fertile plain, 2 miles east of the river Nore, 3 south-east of Abbeyleix, and 5½ south-west by south of Dublin by way of Abbeyleix, but only 50 by way of Timahoe. The parish-church, situated in the town, is a modern edifice, and sends aloft a spire which figures conspicuously in the landscape of the environing plain. The Roman Catholic chapel is a spacious structure. The military barrack has accommodation for two troops of cavalry. The dispensary is within the Abbeyleix Poor-law union; and in 1839, it received £91 6s., expended £88 10s., administered to 1,100 patients, and served for a district containing 6,375 patients. Two schools, the one for boys and the other for girls, are supported by subscriptions and by the National Board. The castle of Ballinakill was besieged by Fairfax, battered by him from an adjoining height in Heywood demesne, bravely defended by its garrison, but eventually taken and destroyed. A second castle was erected by the Dunns in 1680; but it was never inhabited, and now exists in ruin. Heywood, the property of M. F. Trench, Esq., is a beautiful demesne, flinging up odours and ornament over the town, and "long remarkable for the taste and skill displayed in its formation, and the care bestowed on its subsequent management." In the vicinity are the old church and castle of Roseconnell.—At the commencement of the present century, the town had a brewery, 3 tanyards, and some small woollen factories; and, being then the only market-town in Cullinagh, it had a brisk trade in grain, and was a place where "a competition amongst the buyers insured the fairest price to the farmer." But it has sadly declined, and is still declining. Its woollen manufacture is not far from being extinct; a weekly market, which was held on Wednesday, has long been discontinued; and a weekly market on Saturday, which was well attended till about twelve years ago, has been nearly destroyed by the attractions of a new market on the same day at Abbeyleix. Fairs are entitled to be held on April 3, July 22, Nov. 5, Dec. 18, and the Thursday of the week of Pentecost; but, in some instances, they exist only on paper. In 1838, the town does not seem to have had a single public conveyance, either of its own or in transit. The limits of the quondam borough, measured from the centre of the town, extend, on the north, about an English mile along the road to Dublin; on the east, about 60 perches, to Camersford's brewery; on the south, 120 perches; and on the west, about 120 perches, to Mr. Stubbard Mullin's demesne wall. The site of the castle was excluded by charter from the corporation's jurisdiction. The borough's charter of incorporation was granted in the 10th year of James I., and gave to "the sovereign, burgesses, and freemen," the power of returning two members to parliament. The Marquis of Drogheda carried the whole corporation in his pocket, used it for the sole purpose of opening the doors of parliament to his nominees, and received the whole of the £15,000 of compensation money which was given at the Union for the loss of its franchise. All the burgesses and most of the freemen were non-resident; even the sovereign was generally non-resident; and the mockery of a corporation, of course, ceased to exist the instant its parliamentary franchise was destroyed. A borough court, held by the sovereign or his deputy, ceased in 1800; a manor-court ceased about 22 years later; and quarter-sessions and petty-sessions, formerly held in the town, have been removed to Abbeyleix. A party of the county-police preserve the peace. The streets are neither paved nor lighted, and are kept in repair by turnpike-road trustees and by county presentment. The market-house is maintained by the Earl of Stanhope, the lord of the manor. Area of the town, 85 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,927; in 1841, 1,540. Houses 274.

BALLINAKILL, a large Highland parish on the coast and along the northern district of the barony of Ballinahinch, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 15 miles; breadth, 5; area, 49,052 acres, 3 roods, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 7,183; in 1841, 7,928. Houses 1,421. Both the surface and the coast-line would be accurately outlined, were we to repeat our brief description of the barony of BALLINAHINCH: which see. The area includes 416 acres, 3 roods; 1 acre of water in Lough Kylemore; 432 acres, 1 rood, 28 perches, in Lough Fee; 240 acres, 3 roods, 24 perches, in Lough Ina; and 606 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches, in small lakes. The four principal mountains have an altitude above sea-level of respectively 1,172, 1,586, 1,973, and 2,193 feet; and the last of these is Letterbreckan, situated in the south-east corner. A few minor islands off the coast are included within the limits. The chief bays are the Killeries, long the northern boundary, and Ballinakill and Cleggan bays on the west. See KILLERIES and CLEGGAN. Ballinakill bay enters between Cleggan tower on the south and Renvyl hill on the north; it is covered at its mouth by Heath or Truchelaun island, along the north side of which is the channel with 5 or 6 fathoms water; and it offers excellent accommodation for large ships, and is a common station for the herring fishery. Small vessels may round the point of Ballinakill on the south side, and be in a completely landlocked bight, with 3 fathoms on mud, looking up on a clean gravel beach. Toward the head, the bay forks into two or three creeks or subordinate bays, the more southerly of which is clean and pretty deep, and the more northerly comparatively shallow. A spot on one of these inlets is the site of a small pier, constructed from government funds, and would be a good site for a fishery village. See DERRINVER. "At the head of Ballinakill bay," said Mr. Nimmo, in 1813, "there is a flat of about 1,000 acres, on which some attempts have been made at drainage. As usual, the catch-waters were omitted, and the work is imperfect and neglected. There is a good deal of cultivation on the south side of Ballinakill bay and towards Cleggan; the soil frequently favourable. Besides the limestone which is found in various places on the south side, at Dourus on the north shore, as also at Cleggan, Streamstown, &c., there is also excellent coralline in the bay of Ballinakill, and all the strands and beaches from thence southward, are highly calcareous. An entire new set of roads must be made across this district; and, being continued through the vale of Kylemore, and to the head of Killery bay, they will form a communication with Westport, which is now the principal market for this neighbourhood." Since Mr. Nimmo wrote, great improvements have been made, and new roads formed; and the latter, which lay open Cunnemara and Joyce-Country, touch Ballinakill bay both at Derrinver and at other points.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £64 12s. 3d. The rectories of OMEY, BALLINDOON, MOYRUS, and INNISBOFFIN, and the vicarages of KILLANIN, ARRANMORE, ENNISMAIN, and INNISHERE [see these articles], are united to this rectory to form the benefice of Ballinakill. Four of the parishes are contiguous, and constitute the barony of Ballinabuech; Killanin is separated from these by the sea at Moyrus, and by the intervention of Kilcommon parish; Arranmore, Ennismain, and Innis- here, consist of the Arran islands at the entrance of Galway bay; and Innisboffin is an island in the Atlantic, and politically included in the county of Mayo. The length of the whole is about 40 Irish miles, and the breadth about 20. Gross income, £310 6s. 11½d.; nett, £263 0s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates are employed on a stipend each of £75, paid by the Archbishop of Tuam. The church is situated at Clifden in Omev, and was built in 1812 by means of a grant of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 120: attendance, from 70 to 80 in winter, and from 100 to 120 in summer. Private houses are regularly occupied as parochial places of worship in the northern district of Ballinakill, and the southern district of Moyrus. The Roman Catholic parochial division distributes the union into 6 complete parishes and part of a seventh. In the first complete parish are Ballinakill and Ennisboffin parochial chapels, and private houses at Tully and Cailmore in Ballinakill, with attendances of respectively from 800 to 1,000, 500, from 50 to 500, and from 100 to 300; in the second are chapels at Ballinafad and Carna, and a private house at Roundstone, all in Moyrus, with attendances of respectively from 300 to 400, from 300 to 400, and from 200 to 300; in the third are chapels at Clifden and Claddaghdu in Omev, and a chapel in Ballindoon, with attendances of respectively from 500 to 1,200, from 500 to 600, and from 600 to 700; in the fourth are a chapel at Killanin, with an attendance of from 300 to 600, and private houses used as chapels at Rossmuck, Lettermore, and Lettermullen in Killanin; in the fifth is a chapel at Ross in Killanin, with an attendance of from 400 to 500; in the sixth is a chapel in Arranmore, with an attendance of from 400 to 600; and in the seventh is a chapel at Tully in Killanin, with an attendance of from 200 to 800, and united to a chapel beyond the union in the parish of Moycullen. The number of officiates and coadjutor officiates steadily attached to these chapels is 15. In 1834, the Protestants of Ballinakill parish amounted to 113, and the Roman Catholics to 7,604:

the Protestants of the union to 500, and the Roman Catholics to 44,501. In the same year, 4 daily schools in the parish, one of which at Tully was wholly supported by the Tuam Diocesan Education Society and the Dublin Ladies' Irish Society, had on their books 69 boys, 23 girls, and about 8 children whose sex was not specified; and 28 daily schools in the union, 23 of which were dependent wholly on fees, had on their books 447 boys and 259 girls. In 1840, the National Board had 6 schools, in pairs for males and females, at Ballinakill, Woodford, and Dunery, attended by 465 boys and 440 girls, and aggregately salaried with £62; and they had suspended 3 other schools at Kilmore, Tully, and Boffin's Island, till new trustees and managers should be appointed.

BALLINAKILL, a parish, 6½ miles west by north of Roscommon, and partly in the half-barony of Ballymoe, co. Roscommon, but chiefly in the half-barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Roscommon section, 2,006 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches; of which, 27 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches, are in the river Suck. Area of the Galway section, 12,571 acres, 1 rood, 6 perches; of which 104 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches, are water. The pop. returns of 1831 do not notice the Roscommon section. Pop. of that section, in 1841, 565. Houses 96. Pop. of the Galway section, in 1831, 4,315; in 1841, 4,433. Houses 700. The surface, though containing much waste and bog, aggregately consists of tolerable land. The highest ground is in the Galway section, and has an altitude of 405 feet. The sluggish and repulsive Suck traces the boundary between the two sections. The chief residences are Glinsk and Keeloges. The hamlet of Balling or Mountain, in 1831, had 53 inhabitants.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of DONAXON [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial and the rectorial titles are each compounded for £115 5s.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the Earl of Essex. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 16, and the Roman Catholics to 4,540; and 5 hedge-schools had on their books 269 boys and 73 girls.

BALLINAKILL, a parish in the barony of Leitrim, co. Galway, Connaught. It contains the village of WOODFORD: which see. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 4½; area, 50,606 acres, 2 roods, 19 perches; of which 4,118 acres, 2 roods, 17 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 13,103; in 1841, 14,373. Houses 2,372. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 13,977. Houses 2,304. The spot from which the parish has its name is 5½ miles west-south-west of Portumna; and the site of the church is 4 miles nearer Gort. Lough Derg expands along the east; and the Slieve Baughta mountains occupy a large aggregate area in the west and south. The surface contains a considerable proportion of good tillage land, a large extent of improved and improvable mountain, and a vast tract of wild and unreclaimable upland. A height near the centre, another in the west, and the Sculp mountain in the south-west, have altitudes of respectively 562, 692, and 1,074 feet. Among several demesnes which beautify the finer districts is Ballingar, the property of A. A. Nugent, Esq.; and other pleasing residences are Carrowroe, Shannon-hill, Ballycorbagh, Donestort, and Silverstream. The road from Portumna to Gort bisects the parish southward; and that from Loughrea to Scariff bisects it south-south-eastward. From high parts of the latter road, and also from neighbouring heights, good views are obtained of Lough Derg, with its islands and varied shores.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LICKMOLASSY [which see], in the dio. of Clonfert. Tithe composition, £235

0s. 9½d. The church is situated at Woodford, and was built, in 1821, by means of a loan of £784 12s. 3½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 250; average attendance 40. Cloncoe and Lockarty Roman Catholic chapels, are attended by respectively 3,500 and 2,500; and belong to a district within the parochial limits which constitutes a complete Roman Catholic parish. Knockadrien Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 2,500, and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Doneira. Marble Hill Roman Catholic chapel has an officiate for itself, and an attendance of 200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 106, and the Roman Catholics to 13,940; and 10 daily schools, all dependent entirely on fees, had on their books 386 boys and 190 girls.

BALLINAKILL, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Tiraghbrill, and co. Sligo, and 5½ miles south-west of Dromahaire, Connaught. Length and breadth, each 2 miles; area, 4,500 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,815; in 1841, 1,906. Houses 335. The surface declines to the west; forms the northern border of the river system of the Arroy; and consists variously of waste, pastoral, and arable lands.—This parish is a vicarage, and a part of the benefice of BOYLE [which see], in the dio. of Elphin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £41 10s. 9d., and the rectorial, jointly with those of Tannagh, Drumcollum, and Ballysumaghan, for £158 15s. 4d.; and the latter are appropriated to the prebend of Kilmacallane in the cathedral of Elphin. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilross. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 132, and the Roman Catholics to 1,724; and 2 day-schools had on their books 50 boys and 31 girls.

BALLINAKILL, a parish on the south-east border of the barony of Coolestown, and of King's co., and 3 miles south of Edenderry, Leinster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,761 acres. Pop., in 1831, 947; in 1841, 1,079. Houses 158. The parish is very irregular in outline, and in some parts narrow, and is much indented and encroached on by bog. The land averages in value from 20s. to 30s. per plantation acre.—This parish is a vicarage, and a part of the benefice of CLONBULLOGUE [which see], in the dio. of Kildare. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £65 10s. 9½d., and the rectorial for £92 6s. 1½d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Mr. Garden. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 800; and, along with another chapel in Clonbullogue benefice, is grouped, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, with the chapels of Edenderry, Crohane, and Rhode. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 53, and the Roman Catholics to 912; and a hedge-school had on its books 25 boys and 20 girls.

BALLINAKILL, or BALLYMAKILL, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Gualtier, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 1,877 acres. Pop., in 1831, 609; in 1841, 639. Houses 81. The surface lies along the Suir, from a point about a mile east of Waterford, and entirely consists of excellent arable land. Little Island, in the Suir, belongs to the parish; it is about a mile in length, and 180 acres in area; and it contains an old castle, and has a pleasant, charming, softly picturesque aspect. Opposite this island, and nearly on the lip of the river, stands the agreeable seat of Ballinakill-house. The road from Waterford to Passage traverses the parish, and commands, at most points, a brilliant view of the city, the luxuriant banks of the river, and a considerable stretch of water, studded with sailing vessels, or ploughed with steamers.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Waterford. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £55 1s. 9d., and the rectorial for £84 1s. 9d.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Waterford cathedral. The vicarages of Ballinakill, BALLYGUNNER, KILMACLEAGUE, and KILMACOMB [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Ballinakill. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½. Gross income, £245 0s. 10d.; nett, £226 12s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The church, situated in Ballinakill, was built in 1818 by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; average attendance, 180 in summer, 100 in winter. The Roman Catholic chapel is in Ballygunner. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 90, and the Roman Catholics to 529; the Protestants of the union to 174, and the Roman Catholics to 3,026; and 3 daily schools in the union, one of which was in Ballinakill, had on their books 113 boys and 57 girls. The Ballinakill school is wholly supported by bequest of Bishop Fay; it boards, educates, and apprentices 50 boys, though, in 1834, it had only 47 on the foundation; and it affords instruction in reading, writing, arithmetic, book-keeping, and grammar.

BALLINAKILTY, a parish in the barony of Killian, about 1½ mile north by east of Mount Bellew, and 5 miles west by south of Ballinamore, co. Galway, Connaught. All its statistics are so mixed with those of Aghiat, that it can be described only when viewed as including that parish. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 5,221 acres,—of which 4½ acres are water. Pop., in 1831, 1,630; in 1841, 1,762. Houses 295.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of MORLOUGH [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £148 10s. 8d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 1,743; and a hedge-school had on its books 40 boys and 16 girls.

BALLINALACK, a village in the parish of Leney, barony of Corkaree, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands on the river Inny, on the road from Dublin to Sligo, about 1 mile above Lough Iron, 2 miles below Lough Derrevaragh, and 7 north-north-west of Mullingar. In 1839-40, a dispensary here, under the Mullingar Poor-law union, received £80 8s., expended £86 4s. 6d., and 1,581 patients recommended to it, and served for a district of 13,813 acres, with 4,266 inhabitants. In the village and its vicinity are some well-endowed schools. See LENEY. Fairs are held on Feb. 15, May 18, Oct. 2, and Dec. 20. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 334; in 1841, 312. Houses 55.

BALLINALEE, a village in the parish of Clonbroney, barony of Granard, and 6 miles north-west of Edgeworthstown, co. Longford, Leinster. Its houses are segregated, or rather dispersed, in straggling disorder. In its vicinity, and near the base of Cairne-hill, stands Kilshurly, the seat of Major T. Edgeworth. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 299. Houses 50.

BALLINALEE, co. Wicklow. See BOLINALEA.
BALLINALTIG. See BALLINALTIG.

BALLINAMAGHARY, a hamlet in the parish of Carlingford, barony of Lower Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 94.

BALLINAMALLARD, BALNAMALLARD, or BELLANAMALLARD, a village in the parish of Magheracross, barony of Tyrkenedy, co. Fermanagh, Ulster. It stands about 3½ miles east of Lower Lough Erne, and 6½ north-north-east of Enniskillen, on the road from that town to Drumquin. A mile north of it is Jamestown, the seat of George Lendrum, Esq. Fairs are held in the village on Feb. 12, April 5, May 17, Aug. 5, Oct. 21, and Nov. 27. A dispensary here belongs partly to the Poor-law union of Enniskillen, and partly to that of Lowthers-town; and in 1839-40, it received £42 17s., expended £49 7s. 6d., made 3,459 dispensations of medicine, and served for a district of 4,650 acres, with 5,221 inhabitants. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 323; in 1841, 376. Houses 65. See MAGHERACROSS.

BALLINAMARA, or BALLYNEMARA, a parish on the eastern side of the barony of Crannagh, 3½ miles south of Freshford, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,839 acres. Pop., in 1831, 867; in 1841, 915. Houses 136. The land graduates in quality from excellent pasturage to light tillage.—This parish is a vicarage and a separate benefice in the dio. of Ossory. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £80, and the rectorial for £160; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Canice, Kilkenny. Gross income, £90 18s. 6d.; nett, £82 3s. 7d. Patrons, the dean and chapter of St. Canice. The church was built in 1826, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sitings 120; average attendance 28. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 64, and the Roman Catholics to 821; and 2 daily schools, one of which was aided with about £10 a-year from subscription, had on their books 83 boys and 29 girls.

BALLINAMEEHAN, a Roman Catholic parish in the north-western part of the dio. of Kilmore. Post-town, Manor-Hamilton, co. Leitrim. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

BALLINAMEEN, a village in the parish of Desertoghill, half-barony of Coleraine, co. Londonderry, Ulster. Area 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 192. Houses 31.

BALLINAMONA, co. Cork. See MOURNE ARNEY.

BALLINAMONA, a creek or natural harbour and fishing-station on the south side of Carlingford bay, between Bellagran Point and Carlingford, barony of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Boats can enter the harbour at half flood of the tide; but there is no quay.

BALLINAMONA, a demesne, the property of Thomas Carew, Esq., in the parish of Kilbarry, 3 miles south-south-west of Waterford, co. Waterford, Munster. A small rude tower which surmounts a hill in the deer park, draws the attention of the tourist; and the ground around its site commands a brilliant view of the city of Waterford, the exulting course of the Suir, and much of the luxurious and undulated expanse of the counties Waterford, Kilkenny, and Wexford.

BALLINAMONA, a village in the parish of Dunkitt, barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 3 acres. Pop., in 1841, 125. Houses 21.

BALLINAMONA, a parish in the barony of Small County, 5 miles east-north-east of Bruff, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ½; area, 1,498 acres. Pop., in 1831, 513; in 1841, 387. Houses 81. The surface, though lying very near the eastern summit of the system of the Shannon, or the water-shed between co. Limerick and co. Tipperary, consists of excellent land.—This parish is a vicarage, and a part of the benefice of ANEY [which see], in the dio. of Emy. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £45 11s. 10d., and the rectorial for £91 3s. 8d.; and the latter are impropriate, and belong to J. D. Freeman, Esq., of Castlecor, co. Cork. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics, and there was no school.

BALLINAMORE, a village in the parish and barony of Killian, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on the rivulet Shiven, and on the direct road from Athlone or Dublin to Tuam and Westport, 2½ miles east of the river Suck, 15 west-north-west of Athlone, 18 east by south of Tuam, and 75 west by north of Dublin. Adjacent to it, and respectively on the left and the right bank of the Shiven, stand Ballinamore-house and Riversdale, the former the seat of the Hon. Martin Ffrench, and the latter the seat of James Kelly, Esq. Pop. returned with the parish. See KILLIAN.

BALLINAMORE, a post and market town in the parish of Outragh, barony of Carrigallen, co. Leitrim, Connaught. It stands half-way between Lough Garadice and St. John's Lough, on the road from Carrick-on-Shannon to Belturbet, about 12½ miles north-west of Carrick-on-Shannon, and 71 north-west of Dublin. Compared to the majority of Connaught towns of its size, or even of a size larger, it has a remarkably clean, airy, comfortable, and prosperous appearance. Its markets are crowded and bustling, and seem to have rapidly nursed it into a thriving condition. It derives importance also from being a sessions' town. A bridewell in the town contains but few cells, and 2 day rooms, the one for males and the other for females; and is designed simply for the accommodation of a few prisoners, previous to their final committal and transmission to the county gaol. In 1839-40, a dispensary here, belonging to the Mobile Poor-law union, received £103 10s., expended £109 5s. 6d., administered to 1,067 patients, and served for a district of 43,914 acres, with 20,419 inhabitants. Schools and places of worship will be noticed in the article OUTRAGH; which see. Area of the town 61 acres. Pop., in 1831, 312; in 1841, 946. Houses 146. Of three lines surveyed in 1839, by W. T. Mulvany, civil engineer, for a projected junction canal between the rivers Erne and Shannon, one passes close by the town of Ballinamore, and is called by Mr. Mulvany the Ballinamore line. This line leaves the Shannon at the harbour proposed to be formed at Leitrim, by the Shannon Commissioners, as the northern terminus of the inland steam navigation of the Shannon; it proceeds up the valley of the Leitrim river, to the summit-level at Letterfine, where the average depth of cutting to obtain the requisite supply is but 134 feet for a length of 2,400 yards; it descends gradually falling ground along the valley of Ballinamore to the Erne a little above Belturbet; and steam navigation along the Erne would connect its eastern terminus with the entrance of the Ulster canal at Wattle-bridge. The summit-level is 220 feet above the level of the sea; the catchment basin contains 670 acres of lakes, available as reservoirs, and comprehends an entire area of 40,320 acres; and the total rise and fall from the summit-level to the termini, is about 150 feet, and requires about 16 locks. Through this canal, even the rich agricultural district around the town of Boyle in co. Roscommon, would send the greater part of its produce to the ports of Newry and Belfast.

BALLINAMUCK, a village in the parish of Killoe, and in the barony and co. of Longford, Leinster. It stands on the road from Newtown-Forbes to Arvagh, within ½ mile of the co. Leitrim, and 8½ miles north-north-east of the town of Longford. One of Mr. Mulvany's three lines for the Erne and Shannon Junction canal [see BALLINAMORE], passes near the village, and is designated by him the Ballinamuck line. This line would extend from the Shannon at Lough Forbes, along the valleys which are traversed by the boundary-line between counties Leitrim and Longford to Killeshandra, a distance of 23½ miles; and the navigation would thence be continued by Lough Oughter and the river Erne. But certain objections to the line are pronounced by the engineer "insuperable." The village gives name to the last action of the French army which invaded Ireland at Killalla in 1798. General Humbert, after the various fortunes of his brief campaign, and while careering before a force which he could not check, found himself in such a desperate position at Ballinamuck, that if he should proceed he must inevitably be surrounded by nearly 30,000 troops, under the able command of the Viceroy, Marquis Cornwallis. His small army was drawn out in battle order; his rear-guard was attacked by Crawford, who had been harassing his march; about 200 of his men immediately surrendered; and the rest defended themselves upwards of half-an-hour, but surrendered on the appearance of the main body of the English army. Lord Roden, who had been made prisoner while advancing into the French lines to obtain their surrender, opportunely ordered the English troops to halt, and prevented some effusion of blood. Irish auxiliaries, 1,500 in number, who had accompanied the French to the field were excluded from quarter, and instantly attempted flight in every direction, but were slain to the number of probably 500. Humbert's troops were found, after the surrender, to consist of 748 privates and 96 officers; so that his entire loss from the time of landing at Killalla, was 256. The affair at Ballinamuck occurred on the 8th of September. Pop. of the village, in 1831, 163.

BALLINAMUDDAGH, a village in the parish of Ballyhuskard, barony of Ballaghkeen, co. Wexford, Leinster. Area, 20 acres. Pop., in 1841, 205. Houses 39.

BALLINAMULT, a village in the parish of Seckinane, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. It stands on the river Phenisk, amidst a mountainous and boggy tract of country, about 9½ miles south by west of Clonmel, on the road thence to Lismore. Here, says Dr. Smith, "is a redoubt for about 20 men."

BALLINAMULTINA, a demesne, and a locality where good slates have been quarried, in the parish of Clashmore, barony of Decies-within-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster.

BALLINARD, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Small county, 3 miles east by south of Six-mile-Bridge, co. Limerick, Munster. It contains part of the village of HERBERTSTOWN: which see. Length, 1 mile; breadth, half-a-mile; area, 1,442 acres. Pop., in 1831, 867; in 1841, 918. Houses 143. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 689. Houses 103. The surface declines to the west, is drained by a head-water of the Maig, and consists of good land.—This parish is a vicarage and a part of the benefice of ANEY [which see], in the dio. of Limerick. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £49 12s. 8d., and the rectorial for £99 5s. 4d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to J. D. Freeman, Esq., of Castlecor, co. Cork. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,000, and is under the care of two officiates. In 1834, the parishioners, with only one exception, were all Roman Catholics; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 63 boys and 30 girls.

BALLINAS, or BALLINNESS (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Kilmacrennan, co. Donegal, Ulster. It traverses an upland region, and enters the sea at a point about 6 miles south-west of Horn Head. It is tidal, and navigable over 2 miles above its mouth. The depth of water over its bar at ebb tide is only 2 feet, but it rises to 18 feet at flood of spring tides. A pier was erected within its entrance, in 1831, by workmen who were paid in provisions sent for the relief of the district; but it has not improved the fisheries, and is much out of repair. The salmon-fishery in the stream is vested by patent in the Rev.

John Olphert, of Ballyconnel; and, in consequence of the mother fish being constantly destroyed in the breeding season by poachers, it has decreased. On the dreary shore, and near the head of the rivulet's estuary, stand the church, glebe-house, and Roman Catholic chapel of Tulloghobegley.

BALLINASAGGART. See ERRIGAL - KEROOR.

BALLINASCARTHY. See BALLYMACARTHY.

BALLINASCREEN, a parish in the barony of Loughisholin, 2½ miles west of Tubbermore, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It contains the village of DRAPERSTOWN: which see. Length, 16 miles; breadth, 4; area, 32,492 acres. Pop., in 1831, 7,854; in 1841, 8,384. Houses 1,491. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 7,442; in 1841, 8,011. Houses 1,430. The surface consists of the glens, the narrow vales, and the amassed mountain-screens of the incipient Moyola, and its earlier affluents; it climbs boldly away in the Slieve-gallion, Carnthor, and Sawyer ranges respectively on the south, the north, and the west; and, as to geognostic formation, it is partly metamorphic schist, and partly basalt. Various rich levels or straths in the vale of the Moyola, are subject to despoliation by freshets in the stream. A principal feature is the small demesne of Derryroyd.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Derry. Tithes composition, £623 1s. 6½d. Gross income, £920 1s. 6½d.; nett, £784 7s. 1½d. Patron, the diocesan. Two curates are employed on a stipend of £75 each; and one of them has the use of the glebe-house. When, or from what funds, the church was built is not known. Sittings 250; attendance, from 80 to 100 in winter, and from 100 to 120 in summer. The church is situated in Draperstown. Two Roman Catholic chapels, at Straw and Moneynyene, are under the care of two officiates, and are attended, the latter by 1,500, the former by 1,000 at one service, and by from 1,900 to 2,000 at another. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 419 Churchmen, 494 Presbyterians, 143 other Protestant dissenters, and 7,009 Roman Catholics; 5 Sunday schools were attended by about 210 children; and 13 daily schools had on their books 758 boys and 544 girls. Five of the daily schools at Draperstown, Derryroyd, Brackagh, Drumard, and Labby, were aided each with £8 a-year, and one at Altyskey with £10, from the National Board; two were aided with respectively £10 and £10 10s. from the rector; and two at Carnamony and Blackhill were on alternate days boys' schools and girls' schools, taught by a master and a mistress, and were wholly supported by the London Drapers' Company, many of the children being gratuitously clothed, and the master and mistress having salaries of respectively £46 3s. with a house, and £35 Irish. In 1840, the National Board gave £15 of salary to each of 3 of its schools, and, in 1838, granted £94 8s. toward the building and fitting up of a school-house at Altyskey. In 1839-40, a dispensary in the parish, and within the Magherafelt Poor-law union, received £105 8s. 6d., expended £122 5s. 2d., made 5,844 dispensations of medicine, and served for a district of 37,819 acres, with 10,854 inhabitants.

BALLINASKELLIGS, or BALLINSKELLIGS, a bay washing partly the barony of Dunkerrin on the south, but chiefly that of Iveragh on the east and north, co. Kerry, Munster. It enters between Hog Head on the east and Bolus Head on the west, and is about 5 miles broad between these promontories; and, with slowly diminishing breadth, it sweeps inland to the extent of about 6 miles. The Inny rivulet, 11 miles in length of course, enters its head; and several smaller streams enter its sides. The Hog islands, and several other islets, lie from 2½ to 4½ miles south of Hog Head, and serve to break the swell of the Atlantic, and diversify the seaward scenery of the bay. Horse Island lies about 3 miles inward from each of the sentinel headlands, but pretty near the Iveragh shore. A rock in the bay, called Carrig Irrana, or Irr's Rock, claims traditionally and in song to be the grave of Irr, one of the original Milesian chiefs,—or the place on which his body was cast, and his bones whitened, after he was drowned in the western main. The whole bay is much diversified and lifted to grandeur by its bold headlands; and it laves a district so wild and magnificent in character, so intricate in outline, so noble and even sublime in contour, as to constitute quite a gallery of mountain and marine landscape. "Though the roads in the district," says Mr. Fraser, "are in many places rugged and steep, and the only accommodation a small public-house in the village of Waterville, yet in summer the splendid views which are obtained will amply repay those fond of marine and mountain scenery." The Skelligs rocks lie about 10 miles to seaward. On the Great Skellig, which is a lofty rock of slate rising several hundred feet above the level of the sea, two lighthouses have been erected; and the men appointed to the charge of them are regularly provisioned for six months. This rock, rising high above the billowy Atlantic, and crowned with its tall white towers, appears not merely as a beacon to the mariner, but as a sentinel of the long line of iron-bound coast. The dark colour of the vast unbroken heathy surface of the headland of Iveragh, adds much to its wild and desolate character, and at the same time contrasts with the deep blue ocean which rolls along the whole extent of its rocky shores." Lady Chatterton, in 1838, says, "The extensive bay of Ballinskelligs, peaceful as it looks, is said to be the most dangerous on this coast; and the harbour which goes by the same name, formed by a small island, has been, as a guide told us, 'outlawed,' that is, as he explained, declared to be unsafe." The harbour referred to by her ladyship, is on the west side of the bay, contiguous to Ballinskelligs island, and about 4½ miles from Bolus Head; and is provided with a regular pier of 172 feet in length, constructed and improved by various grants from government, from the Fishery Board, and from the Dublin Charitable Committee. Mr. Donnel, in his report on the Fishery Harbours, says, "I place this harbour in the second class for its degree of utility in promoting the fisheries;" and he states that fish abound in the vicinity, and that the coast fishermen were improving in their exertions. According to an official 'Abstract of Reports,' in 1833, the pier is "much used by fishing-vessels, and also for landing sea-manure, from the use of large quantities of which the neighbouring country, for a distance of about 7 miles round, is improving much." At the head of the bay stands the village of WATERVILLE, and on a creek projecting from it stands DERRYANE ABBEY: see these articles.

BALLINASLANEY, a parish partly in the barony of East Shelmallee, partly in that of Ballaghkeen, and 4½ miles south by east of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 1½; area, 2,646 acres,—of which 1,766 acres are in Ballaghkeen. Pop., in 1831, 916; in 1841, 1,061. Houses 178. Pop. of the Ballaghkeen section, in 1841, 763. Houses 125. The surface is washed on the west by the river Slaney; traversed southwards by one of the roads from Enniscorthy to Wexford; and consists partly of good, but chiefly of secondary, or inferior land.—This parish is an inappropriate curacy, with part of the tithes attached, and a part of the benefice of EDERMINE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The curatual or vicarial tithes are compounded for £357s. 8½d., and the rectorial for £106 3s. 0½d.; and the latter belong to the Earl of Portsmouth. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 52, and the Roman Catholics to 882; and a pay-school was attended by 30 children in winter, and 50 in summer.

BALLINASLOF,

A market and post town, and the cynosure of much the larger part of the western province of Ireland, partly in the parish of Creagh, barony of Moycarnon, co. Roscommon, but chiefly in the parish of Kilclooney, barony of Clonmacnoon, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands on both banks of the river Suck, 9 miles north-north-west of Eyre-court, 12½ south-west of Athlone, 32½ east by north of Galway, and 72½ west by south of Dublin.

The Suck and its Bridge.—The Suck, not only at the town, but over a long way above, and down to the Shannon below, separates the county of Roscommon from that of Galway; and, like the Inny, the Brosna, and the other upper affluents of the Shannon, as well as the Shannon itself, which sleep and stagnate athwart vast expanses of morass and low flat grounds, it overflows and despoliates large areas of land along its banks. Yet, while slow and sedgy in the immediate vicinity, it purls and almost trots and becomes mirthful while passing the town, and is overlooked by such swells and tumulations of ground as very sensibly relieve the general monotony of its aspect. A tourist of 1839, therefore, displays more wit than accuracy, when, speaking of the stream in connection with the town, he says, "It is very like its elder brother, the Shannon, the same slow, dark-flowing stream, gliding like a black snake through callows, moors, and red bogs. Was it not very poetical in a Roscommon bard to call the punch-drinking squires dwelling on the banks of this sedgy stream 'the sons of Suck?'" The passage across the river at the town is a series of bridges and causeways, carried from island to island, and from stream to stream, and extending upwards of 500 yards. The arches amount aggregately to 16; but they are of very different dimensions, they stand at very irregular intervals, and, in several instances, they are single. The chief bridge, or that over the principal water-way, consists of 4 arches, respectively about 16, 16, 14, and 12 feet in span; and this, jointly with the other parts of the passage, is very old, and anciently formed a key-post of communication between the main body of Connaught and the east.

The Roscommon Section.—The remains of a castle, which was one of the strongholds of the province in the time of Elizabeth, stand at the eastern end of the passage across the river, close to the margin of the stream, on a flat part of the Roscommon main shore. The walls which survive were probably the outer defences of an enclosure which contained the keep; they form a square of about 90 yards, with round towers at the angles; and they were protected on the land-side, by a fosse, which still affords a channel for a constantly running offshoot of the adjoining stream. A neat and moderately-sized house is constructed on the line of the wall which faces the road; and its offices and gardens lie within the ancient enclosures. "The place," says Mr. Weld, "goes by the name of Ivy-castle. A bridge across the fosse with two small arches, leading up to the gateway into the back offices, affords a pretty little subject to the pencil; and the old walls and towers extending along the river side, covered at top with ivy, and at their base nearly washed by the clear edding current, have a very pleasing effect: the height of the walls and towers, however, is considerable." The Roscommon section of the town has the appearance of an extended village; and consists of 9 or 10 tolerably good houses, 6 or 7 thatched cabins, and a large mill and malt houses on one of the islands, and of about 40 or 50 cabins and small houses, scattered along the road toward Athlone. At its extremity, on the north side of the road, and on low ground which is often overflowed by the adjoining river, stands the district Lunatic Asylum for the 5 counties of Connaught. It was originally built to accommodate 152 patients; it has acquired additional accommodation, without building, for 98,—and, with building, for 16; and it has at present 140 single cells. Of 265 patients who were inmates on 1st Jan., 1841, 47 were discharged in the course of the year cured or relieved, 3 were discharged incurable, and 34 died; and of 262 who were inmates on 1st Jan., 1842, 6 males and 33 females were employed at trades, 54 males and 27 females were employed at other works, and 120 of both sexes were unemployed, 20 from want of work, and 100 from want of ability. Throughout 1841, the outlay on works and land amounted to £26 10s. 8d.; the produce from works and land, to £232 6s. 7½d.; the total expenditure, including salaries, to £3,733 17s. 7½d.; and the average cost of each patient, to £13 16s. 8½d. An area of 14 Irish acres of land is attached, and employs many of the patients. The asylum is kept in excellent order, and conducted on such judicious principles, and with such predominant kindness, that little more than moral restraint is ever required. But the official reports uniformly bewail the lowliness and humidity of the site; and that published in 1842 says, "There is not near sufficient room in this valuable asylum for the lunatic poor of so large a district, especially since the demands for admission of patients confined in the county gaols under the late act of parliament. It is expected that the Poor Houses will give some relief in this respect; but nothing short of a large addition, or what would be better, another asylum being erected in the north part of the district, about Ballina, will answer the purpose of providing fully for the demands for admittance."

The Galway Section.—The Galway section of the town is so very much the larger and more beautiful, and so exclusively the seat of business, that it looks as if scarcely deigning to acknowledge the other section as a suburb. Its principal street commences in a short rapid curve at the end of the series of bridges; it proceeds a considerable distance westward, with quite an urban aspect; and it then forks into the two lines of streets which lead toward respectively Westport and Galway. The Westport line bends slightly to the right; continues, for a short space, to possess the same appearance as the main street, and then runs along the north side of the fair green in a single row or series of houses so pretending as to seem a string of villas. The street towards Galway branches off at nearly a right angle; proceeds almost a furlong in straight and well-edified alignment, its houses partly disposed in shops and dwelling tenements, and partly consisting of genteel private residences; it then deflects at nearly a right angle, and runs along the south side of the fair green in a single line of neat, clean, white-washed cottages; and it finally bends a little to the left, and proceeds far along the highway, with the high enclosure wall of Garbally demesne on the right, and a chain of smiling, happy, and flower-scented cottages on the left. Between the earlier part of this street and the river, lies the poorer and less cleanly district,—a segregation of lanes, and houses, and cabins, aggregately repulsive, yet greatly less haggard than what constitutes the whole of many a third or second rate town in Ireland, and unfolding itself at the south-east corner round the basin of the canal. Between the same part of the street toward Galway, and the east side of the fair green, extends a comparatively broad gravel bank, gradual in ascent from the street, rapid in declivity toward the green,—neatly and regularly edified over all the eastern face, and crowned about the middle of its summit-line with the elegant spire-surmounted parish-church. The principal streets are all wide, airy, clean, and replete with pretension; and even the most secluded alleys are free from all the gross and squalid features which offend decorum or excite disgust. The tasteful, liberal, and benign spirit of the noble proprietor, the Earl of Clancarty, has everywhere worked such reform, and impressed such decorations, and asserted such ascendancy, that the entire aspect of the town concurs with common fame in proclaiming him the assiduous and costly promoter of its well-known attractions. "One perceives at a glance," says Mr. Inglis, "that it is not left to chance,—that there is a fostering hand over it,—that some one who is able to serve it feels an interest in it,—in short, that there is a resident and public-spirited proprietor. Lord Clancarty is the owner of Ballinasloe; and every kind of improvement finds encouragement at his hands. No stimulus to improvement is more effectual than the practice of Lord Clancarty, in granting leases for ever on condition of good houses being built." His lordship's own demesne screens all the west side of the fair green, and extends to a considerable distance along both the road to Galway and the road to Westport; and being liberally open to the perambulations of the townspeople and strangers, it forms in itself a series of high additional attractions. See GARBALLY. Though a very great aggregate of flat dreary bog lies within a circle described by a radius of 5 miles from the centre of the town, the existence of hardly a patch of it would be suspected by a stranger who alights on the streets from a close carriage, and looks abroad on what appears to be a brilliant expanse of gently undulated, and richly wooded country. Mackney, the villa of the Hon. Archdeacon Trench, and the villas or mansions of Fortwilliam, Lancaster, Park, Suckville, Ardecarne, Mount Equity, Kellysgrove, Birchgrove, and Tulleigh, all aid the master decorations of Garbally in flinging wood and embellishment athwart the environs.

Public Buildings.—The remarkably handsome and unique church, with its singularly beautiful octangular spire, springing from scrolls, and shooting far aloft from the crown of the gravel ridge, is a striking object itself, and forms a remarkable feature in the landscape for many miles round. The military barracks for infantry is a small and unattractive mass of masonry. The district bridewell was a miserable apology for a place of confinement, and long an ugly blot upon the town; but it has just been replaced by a more suitable erection. Places of worship and schools, and statistics connected with them, will be noticed in the articles KILCOONY and CREAGH; which see. The hotels are large, commodious, and good. A workhouse for the Ballinasloe Poor-law union, was contracted for on Oct. 1st, 1839,—to be completed on June 19th, 1841,—to cost £7,600 for building and completion, and £1,882 0s. 10d. for fittings and contingencies,—to contain accommodation for 1,000 persons,—and to occupy a site of 5 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches, procured for £117 9s. 2d. of compensation to occupying tenant, and £10 13s. 9d. of annual rent.

Poor-law Union.—The Ballinasloe Poor-law union ranks as the 45th, and was declared on June 6th, 1839. It comprehends portions of the counties of Roscommon and Galway, amounting to 126,944 acres, and containing, in 1831, a pop. of 97,581. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are, in co. Roscommon, Creagh, 4,209; Moore, 2,983; and Taughmacconell, 1,714;—and in co. Galway, Ballinasloe, 7,123; Kilgerriil, 3,718; Ahascragh, 3,719; Kileronan, 8,027; Killian, 5,401; Ballinakill, 5,002; Moylough, 5,870; Killasolan, 4,306; Ballymacward, 4,906; Kilconnell, 5,836; Killaan, 2,362; Aughrim, 5,087; Kiltormer, 3,706; Abbeygormacan, 2,233; Killimer, 6,029; Kilquane, 3,755; Eyrecourt, 5,213; Clonfert, 5,915; and Cloontookert, 4,002. The number of ex-officio, and of elected guardians, is respectively 12 and 36; and of the latter, 3 are returned by each of the divisions of Ballinasloe and Killimer, 2 by each of the divisions of Creagh, Kileronan, Killian, Ballinakill, Moylough, Killasolan, Ballymacward, Aughrim, Eyrecourt, and Clonfert, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total number of tenements valued, is 15,666; and of these, 9,559 were valued under £5, 1,058 at £5 and under £6, 923 at £6 and under £7, 631 at £7 and under £8, 519 at £8 and under £9, 370 at £9 and under £10, 529 at £10 and under £12, 297 at £12 and under £14, 123 at £14 and under £15, 119 at £15 and under £16, 171 at £16 and under £18, 157 at £18 and under £20, 247 at £20 and under £25, 159 at £25 and under £30, 198 at £30 and under £40, 118 at £40 and under £50, and 488 at £50 and upwards. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £155,496 19s.; the total number of persons rated is 16,018; and of the latter, 2,097 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—2,504, not exceeding £2,—2,050, not exceeding £3,—1,634, not exceeding £4,—and 1,490, not exceeding £5. The date of the first admission of paupers was Jan. 1st, 1842; the total expenditure from that date till Feb. 6th, 1843, was £3,927 18s.; and the total amount of previous expenditure was £1,344 2s. 9d. The dispensary districts of the union are Ballinasloe, Aughrim, Ahascragh, Ballygar, Eyrecourt, Killaan, and Killian. In 1839-40, the Ballinasloe dispensary received £100, expended £151 8s. 4d., made 5,855 dispensations of medicine to 2,209 patients, and had a district of 20,516 acres, with 8,687 inhabitants. But this dispensary, after existing for many years, is reported, in 1841, to have been discontinued; while Lord Clancarty, with his usual liberality, paid a surgeon for attending the sick among his tenantry and the population of the town and suburbs. In 1839-40, a fever hospital in the town, the only one in the union, had 79 patients; but, after having existed for 12 years, it was discontinued from want of subscriptions. Yet, both the hospital and the dispensary were certain to be immediately established if funds should be raised off the union on the principle of the poor-rate, so as to oblige all proprietors and occupiers to contribute. In 1842, the Ballinasloe Loan Fund had a capital of £1,432, circulated £11,672 in 3,462 loans, cleared a nett profit of £130 18s. 11d., and expended for charitable purposes, £120.

Trade and Statistics.—In consequence of its being the forking-point of the great roads to Westport and to Galway, of its possessing the western terminus of the Grand canal, of its commanding the great projected improvements on the river Suck, and of its being the seat of singularly extensive and important fairs, Ballinasloe is both a very stirring thoroughfare, and the scene of a large aggregate of traffic. Even its general retail trade, as the depot for an expansive circumjacent agricultural district, is of considerable amount; and its corn business, otherwise of some importance, has markedly increased since the opening of the extended cut of the canal. In 1836, branch-offices of the National Bank, the Bank of Ireland, and the Agricultural and Commercial Bank were established. In 1838, the public conveyances—additional to the passenger-boats on the Grand canal, which, in 1836, conveyed from the town 4,596 passengers—were a car to Athlone, a mail-car to Roscrea, a coach to Dublin, a mail-coach to Westport, a coach and a car to Galway, and a coach to Tuam in communication with the canal-boats, and a coach and a mail-coach in transit between Galway and Dublin. The extension-line of the Grand canal from the Shannon to the town was opened for traffic in 1828, is 16 miles in length, and drains nearly 12,000 acres of bog. In the improvements detailed by the Commissioners for the Shannon and its tributaries, are included plans for lowering the water of the Shannon, which will enhance the value of much low land along the river's banks, and confer marked benefit on the town. See SUCK. During 10 years, preceeding 1836, the quantity of grain sold in the market was 6,435 tons of wheat, 2,756 of barley, and 21,226 of oats; and in the last of these years, it was 780 tons of wheat, 48 of barley, and 2,502 of oats. For a series of years, the quantity of wool brought to the market—chiefly at a great wool fair established in 1757 by an ancestor of Lord Clancarty, and held in the month of July—was from 590 to 720 tons; yet this is said to have been exceeded fourfold or fivefold by the quantity sold under the market's influence, but without being brought to the town for sale. The establishment of factors in Dublin and other great towns, however, has, for years past, drawn the wool to other quarters. A fair well-known to fame as "the great fair of Ballinasloe," is held from the 5th till the 9th of October, and not only exercises a powerful influence over the adjacent and midland counties, but affects dealings for cattle even in the metropolis itself. Horses are exposed on a part of the fair green; black or horned cattle are exposed athwart the green's broad expanse; and sheep are exposed in a spacious park within the enclosures of Garbally demesne. "Dealers in various commodities, and tradesmen of different callings from the metropolis also bring their goods and productions to the fair; and shops and warehouses in the town are ceded to them for the occasion, the prices paid being usually very high. Lodgings, both in private houses and at the inns, are in great demand, and must be generally bespoken in advance, whilst the charges are greatly augmented beyond the ordinary current rates at other periods." The average number of sheep and black cattle brought in for sale, is computed to be respectively 90,000 and 12,000; and the greatest number of sheep sold in any year between 1790 and 1840, was 86,374, in the year 1828; and of black cattle, was 11,163, in the year 1840. Area of the Roscommon section of the town, 9 acres; of the Galway section, 131 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 4,615; in 1841, 4,934. Houses 619. Pop. of the Roscommon section, in 1831, 475; in 1841, 505. Houses 48. Pop. of the Galway section, in 1831, 4,140; in 1841, 4,629. Houses 571.

BALLINASMALL, the site of an ancient Carmelite friary, in the barony of Clanmorris, co. Mayo, Connaught. The convent was founded by one of the Prendergasts in the 13th century; and was given, at the dissolution, to Sir John King. The building was extensive; and, when Archdall wrote, it partly survived in ruin.

BALLINASSIG. See BALLINAHASSIG.

BALLINASTOW, a key-post for tourists, and the vestibule of a considerable natural gallery of landscape, about 4 miles south of Enniskerry, and near the boundary between the baronies of Rathdown and Ballinacor, on the Roundwood road from Dublin to Glendalough, co. Wicklow, Leinster. The locality lies on a great expanse of dreary and partially reclaimed table-land, south of Sugar-loaf mountain, and elevated 600 feet above sea-level. An inn recently built by Major Beresford, and the small sequestered church of Catlagh, though unpresiding buildings, somewhat relieve the oppressive monotony of the immediate scenery; and the former is a convenient retreat for visitors to the Devil's Glen, the Glen of the Downs, the summit of Sgarloaf, and other admired localities in the brilliant Highlands of Wicklow.

BALLINATRY, a beautiful demesne, in the parish of Templemichael, barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, about 2 miles from the village of Clashmore, co. Waterford, Munster. The mansion, the residence of Richard Smyth, Esq., is one of the largest and finest of the many attractive seats on the river Blackwater; and it possesses interest as the paternal abode of Miss Penelope Smyth, now Princess of Capua. The Blackwater is considerably broad at the demesne; and flows so sinuously that, as seen from the house, it seems to form a spacious lake.

BALLINAULTIG,* a parish in the barony of Barrymore, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,842 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,270; in 1841, 1,404. Houses 218.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILLASPIGNULLANE [which see], in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £276 18s. 3d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 1,303; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLINAVALLEY. See BALLENVALLEY.

BALLINAVAR, a hamlet in the parish of Rosscarbery, western division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. A fair is held on Sept. 4. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLINAVOREEN, a hamlet in the parish of Drumconra, barony of Lower Slane, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 83.

BALLINCALLA, BALLINACALLA, or BALLINCROLA, a parish, partly in the barony of Ross, co. Galway, partly in that of Kilmain, co. Mayo, and 4 miles south of the town of Ballinrobe, Connaught. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 2; area, 15,195 acres, 1 rood, 20 perches,—of which 3,800 acres, 3 roods, 2 perches, are water or islands. Pop., in 1831, 3,031; in 1841, 2,165. Houses 382. Area of the Galway section, 6,776 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,328; in 1841, 443. Houses 73. Area of the Mayo section, 8,418 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,703; in 1841, 1,722. Houses 309. The two sections are mutually separated by Lough Mask; and consist, in general, of good arable land. See MASK. In the Galway section stands the hamlet of DERRY [which see]; and in the Mayo section is the seat of Lough Mask House. The Galway section contains 522 acres, 1 rood, 14 perches, of water in Lough Mask, and 145 acres, 2 roods, 29 perches, of water in small lakes and streams; and it is bounded on the north by the rivulet Owenbrin, and on the south by the rivulet Srahanlong. The Mayo section contains 3,126 acres, 2 roods, 36 perches, of water and islands in Lough Mask, and 15 acres, 3 perches, of water in small lakes; and its principal islands are Iuishard, Inishbroog, Inishmaine, Inishowen, Inishowel, Inishoght, Carigeendavoe, Shanvally, and Shintilla. The only noticeable antiquities are the ruins of a church and two old castles.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of KILMOLARA [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £315. The church of the union is usually said to be situated in Ballincalla, but really stands beyond the benefice, within the border of the parish of Cong, at the village of the Neale; and it was built about 56 years ago, but at what cost, or from what funds, is unknown. Sittings 200; average attendance 40. The Roman Catholic chapels for Ballincalla, and the other two parishes of the union, will be noticed in the article KILMOLARA. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 3,242; and a pay-school had on its books 30 boys and 15 girls.

BALLINCLARE, a hamlet in the parish of Ballinacourty, barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. Fairs are held on May 1 and Oct. 4. Pop., in 1831, 88.

BALLINCOLLIG, a post-town in the parish of Carrigrohane, barony of East Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the river Bride, about a mile above that stream's confluence with the Lee, and on the road from Cork to Inchegeelagh, 5 miles west-south-west of Cork, and 130 south-west of Dublin. The country which intervenes to Cork is not only rich, well-cultivated, and agreeably varied, but so studded and adorned with numerous villas, that Ballincollig may be regarded as part of the city's environs. In the town, or adjacent to it, are the only gunpowder manufactory in the south, the depot for the police of the province of Munster, and a small barrack for cavalry. Even the private edifices of the town, and the manner in which they are arranged in street alignment, give it a neat and pleasant appearance; but the various houses and offices connected with the public establishments, the mansion of Leemount, and several villas and villa-grounds in its neighbourhood, environ it with at once cheerfulness, comfort, and beauty. The gunpowder manufactory stands on low ground on the outskirts of the town; is very extensive; and pays about £200 a-week in wages to workmen. In 1802, when it was the property of government, it suffered a frightful explosion: it is now conducted by "the Royal Mills Gunpowder Company." A little south-west of the town stands Ballincollig-castle, said to have been built in the reign of Edward III. The Barret family, from whom apparently the barony has its name, resided in this fortress and in that of Castlemore, in the northern extremity of the barony, as their chief strongholds. In 1000, William Barret of Ballincollig, submitted to the Queen's mercy, he having been concerned in the rebellion of Desmond; and in 1665, William Barret, of the same place, was honoured with a baronetcy which has long been extinct. Ballincollig-castle was garrisoned by Cromwell in the wars of the Commonwealth, and by James II. in the war of the Revolution. "This building," says Mr. Windell in 1839, "forms an irregular quadrangle. It is based on an isolated limestone rock, which rises to no very considerable height, in the midst of a gently undulating plain, and consists of a large fortified bawn or enclosure, and a slender keep or tower, of about 40 feet in height. The latter stands at the east side of the bawn, and is vaulted inside. The chambers are of uncommonly small dimensions, measuring in length 5 feet, and breadth 4, each occupying the entire internal space. The ascent is by a narrow and difficult stone staircase, which, as it approaches the upper apartment, becomes spiral and more inconvenient. Of the enclosing walls of the bawn, that to the south was defended by a tower in the centre, and another at the south-east angle; the latter being vaulted, and lit by loops. A portion of the north wall is perforated by a range of 4 windows of irregular dimensions; two are double-headed lancets, one a single lancet, and a fourth an oblong loop. The buildings which these lit have disappeared. On the area or bawn, the cattle of the chief, as well as of the more neighbouring serfs, were kept in times of danger, when invasion or a creagh or foray was threatened. Beneath the keep, a dark natural cave runs some distance into the solid rock; and around the whole lay a deep moat, part of which, much choked up, remains at the west side." Pop. of the town, in 1831, 875; in 1841, 1,287. Houses 154. The town is usually regarded as existing in two sections, called respectively North Ballinacollig and South Ballinacollig. Area of the former, 20 acres; of the latter, 22 acres. Pop., in 1841, of North Ballinacollig, 207; of South Ballinacollig, 1,080. Houses in the respective sections, 34 and 120.

BALLINCREA, a village in the parish of Kilkolumb, barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 22 acres. Pop., in 1841, 197. Houses 26.

BALLINCUSLANE, or BALLYCUSLANE, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Truchennackmy, and of co. Kerry, and 9½ miles north-west of Mill-street, Munster. Length, 12½ miles; breadth, 3½; area, 39,740 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,701; in 1841, 5,701. Houses 927. Though the surface contains much excellent land, it is prevalently mountainous, and either waste or pastoral. It declines on the east to the nascent Blackwater; it is ploughed on the west by several head-waters of the streams which flow to Castlemain Harbour; and it is traversed south-eastward by the road from Castle-Island to Mill-street. The seats are Durreen and Mount-Eagle.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Ardferl and Aghadoe, and previous to 1832, it formed part of the benefice of Castle-Island. Tithe composition and gross income, £400 12s. 7d.; nett, £382 7s. Patrons, H. A. Herbert, Esq. of Mucross, W. T. Crosbie, Esq. of Ardferl Abbey, W. Meredith, Esq. of Dicksgrove, Lord Headly, J. Townsend, Esq. of Castletownsend, Berkeley Drummond, Esq. of London, and C. Fairfield, Esq. of Tralee. A room procured for the purpose is used as the parochial place of worship. The Roman Catholic chapel has an officiate for itself, and an attendance of 2,500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 92, and the Roman Catholics to 4,935; and there were 6 hedge-schools. In 1840, a National school at Knockatee had on its books 71 boys and 21 girls, and was aided with £10 a-year from the Board.

BALLINDAGGIN, a Roman Catholic parish in the county of Wexford, and in the dio. of Ferns, Leinster. Post-town, Ennischorry. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

BALLINDANGAN, or BALLINDINE, a hamlet in the parish of Crosshoyne, barony of Clanmorris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the road from Claremorris to Duimore, half-a-mile from the boundary with co. Galway, 3½ miles south-east of Claremorris, and 6 east of Hollymount. In the village is a Roman Catholic chapel. Five furlongs to the north is the seat of CASTLEMAGGARRETT: which see. From 1½ furlong to 2½ miles to the south lie the bogs of Ballindangan and Milltown, elevated 191 feet above the level of high water in Galway bay, traversed by the boundary-line between co. Galway and co. Mayo, and comprehending an area of 5,162 English acres. These bogs are greatly indented with headlands, and interspersed with numerous deries. They are firm, brown, and easily capable of drainage; they are skirted on one side by the river Robe, and on another by the Milltown rivulet; and they are averagely 10 feet deep, and generally superincumbent on limestone gravel. Estimated cost of reclamation, £5,575 10s. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1841, 448. Houses 77.

BALLINDERRY, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Upper Massarene, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 4; area, 10,891 acres, 1 rood, 26 perches,—of which 283 acres, 2 roods, 10 perches, are in Lough Portmore. Pop., in 1831, 5,340; in 1841, 5,679. Houses 1,045. The surface is low ground along the east side of Lough Neagh; and consists in general of good arable land. Amid flat ground on the west border, about half within the parochial boundary, and not far from the lip of Lough Neagh, are the lake and ruinous castle of Portmore, redolent of associations connected with the name of Jeremy Taylor. See PORTMORE. The chief residences are Portmore, Kiltullagh, Crew, Oatland, and Mount-Prospect. The village of Ballinderry stands on the road from Newry to Antrim, 4½ miles north of Moira, and 5 north-east of Lurgan.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £369 4s. 7½d., and the rectorial for £81 4s. 8d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the Marquis of Hertford. Gross income, £384 15s. 1½d.; nett, £357 13s. 6½d. Patron, the Marquis of Hertford. A curate has a stipend of £75, and an allowance of £25 for a house. The vicar is non-resident. The church was built in 1824, by means of a loan of £2,030 15s. 4½d., from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 600; attendance 400. A Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 200, a Moravian meeting-house by 40, a Roman Catholic chapel from 200 to 300; and the last is united, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, to the chapel of Aghagallon. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 4,026 Churchmen, 259 Presbyterians, 139 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,200 Roman Catholics; and 11 daily schools, one of which was aided with £8 a-year from the London Ladies' Society, and another with £2 from the vicar and £8 from the Society for Discountenancing Vice, had on their books 188 boys and 162 girls.

BALLINDERRY (THE), a rivulet chiefly of the county of Tyrone, Ulster. Its two chief head-streams rise, the one near Pomeroy, and the other 3½ miles farther north, and flow 7 or 8 miles to a confluence in the vicinity of Cookstown. The united stream then runs 7 or 8 miles east-north-eastward to Lough Neagh, dividing, over rather more than the latter half of that distance, the county of Londonderry from the county of Tyrone.

BALLINDERRY, a parish, partly in the barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, partly in that of Loughisholin, co. Londonderry, and 4 miles south-east of Moneymore, Ulster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 8,178 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,163; in 1841, 3,362. Houses 587. Area of the Tyrone section, 2,269 acres; of which 322 are in Lough Neagh. Pop., in 1831, 1,182; in 1841, 1,189. Houses 213. Area of the Londonderry section, 5,909 acres,—of which 2,978 acres are in Lough Neagh. Pop., in 1831, 1,981; in 1841, 2,173. Houses 374. The surface is bisected eastward into its Londonderry and its Tyrone divisions by the Ballinderry river, noticed in the preceding article; and it extends from north to south along the margin of Lough Nengh. The land is, in a general view, good; and lets from 20s. to 30s. per plantation acre. From the Ballinderry river towards Salterstown, the face of the country is beautiful,—the surfaces unequal, the declivities fertile, the low grounds a rich clay, the spots of bog all useful as turbary, and the culture, dwellings, and embellishments indicative of comfort and plenty. Near Salterstown, gravel becomes ascendant and expansive, extends along the shore, and deteriorates the quality of the soil. Towards Ballyronan occur bottoms of clay, flats of peat-moss, ascents of rusty ling-clad rubble, and lofty, bare, bleak knolls of basalt.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £192 6s. 2d. Gross income, £525 2s. 2d.; nett, £436 17s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church was built considerably upwards of a century ago; but at what cost, or from what funds, is not known. Sittings 300; attendance, 100 in winter, 200 in summer. A Wesleyan meeting-house is attended by nearly 100 in winter, and by from 120 to 150 in summer. A Roman Catholic chapel, and a Roman Catholic place of meeting in the open air, are jointly attended by 700 in winter, and by from 1,000 to 1,100 in summer, and have two officiates. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 915 Churchmen, 180 Presbyterians, and 2,280 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were averagely attended by about 270 children; and 4 daily schools, one of which was aided with £10 a-year from the rector, had on their books 81 boys and 38 girls.

BALLINDERRY, a village in the parish of Rathdrum, barony of Ballinacree, co. Wicklow, Leinster. It stands on the slope of Ballyshemane mountain, 2 miles north-west of the town of Rathdrum. Fairs are held on April 21, Aug. 21, Oct. 29, first Monday of Nov., and Dec. 2. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLINDERRY, a hamlet in the parish of Terryglass, barony of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary, Munster. Pop., in 1831, 54.

BALLINDINE. See BALLINDANGAN.

BALLINDOON, a parish in the barony of Ballinahinch, about 7 miles south by east of Clifden, and 45 west by north of Galway, co. Galway, Connaught. Length, 7 miles; breadth 4; area, 20,033 acres, of which 2,069 acres are water, chiefly in numerous small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 4,793; in 1841, 5,615. Houses 961. The surface forms part of the sea-board or coast section of Cunnemara; and includes various headlands, islands, and landing-places, which will be noticed each in its alphabetical place. See also BALLINAHINCH and CUNNEMARA.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Tumm. Tithe composition, £40. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 600 to 700. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 44, and the Roman Catholics to 5,612; 3 day-schools at Ballindoon, Errislinann, and Aldrback, had on their books 141 boys and 67 girls; and a day-school at Ballyconnelly had no list of its scholars. In 1840, the Aldrback school had received £8 of yearly aid from the National Board, but was suspended till new trustees and managers should be appointed.

BALLINDOWN, the site of an ancient abbey, on the east shore of Lough Arrow, barony of Tiraghbrill, co. Sligo, and 7½ miles north-north-west of Boyle, Connaught. See ARROW. Archdall says, "Many parts of this building are yet extant, but none are objects worthy of remark."

BALLINDREAT, a village in the parish of Lifford or Clonleigh, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the Dale rivulet, and on the road from Lifford to Letterkenny, about 2 miles west-north-west of the former. Here is a Presbyterian meeting-house. Area of the village, 13 acres. Pop., in 1841, 174. Houses 35.

BALLINDRIMLY, one of a series of bogs in the barony of Castlereagh, co. Roscommon, Connaught. The other bogs of the series are those of Cloonree, Cloonflower, Loughglyn, Breanamore, Drummin, and some of minor importance. The series commences about 1½ mile north of Castlereagh, and extends northward to the immediate vicinity of Loughglyn; it is bounded on the south-west by the road from Cloonallie, by Cloonflower, to Carrowbeatry; and it comprehends an area of 6,725 acres, 3 roods, 34 perches, English. It is drained in the northern section by a head-stream of the river Lung, and in the southern and larger section by two confluent head-streams of the river Suck; and it is interspersed with considerable high fertile islands, and with vales and cushions, traversed by the main streams and their tiny affluents. Almost every swell and knoll, both in the interior and in the vicinity, except on the lands of Breanamore, furnishes a store of manuring gravel. Estimated cost of reclamation, £14,118 16s. 3½d.

BALLINEA, a village in the parish of Mullingar, barony of Moyashele and Magheradernan, co. Westmeath, Leinster. Pop. in 1831, 109.

BALLINEA, a village in the parish of Nobber, barony of Morgallion, co. Meath, Leinster. Area, 3 acres. Pop. in 1841, 147. Houses 23.

BALLINEALE, a Roman Catholic parish, in the united diocese of Waterford and Lismore. Post-town, Carrick-on-Suir. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

BALLINEALE, a village in the parish of Desertmoon, barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the river Nore, 4 miles south by east of Instigoe. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLINEACARGY. See BALLINACARGY.

BALLINEDDAN, a fishing-village on the north side of Carlingford bay, 3 miles south of Rosstrevor, co. Down, Ulster. It is a small and straggling assemblage of houses on the shore side of the road from Rosstrevor to Killeel. In its vicinity stands the beautifully situated villa of Ballyedmond. A natural cove at the village comprehends an area of 2½ statute acres, and might be quayed along one side, with a small jetty, at the cost of about £250. The fishermen have a few herring-boats.

BALLINEE. See BALLINEA.

BALLINEE, a village in the barony of Ballymoney, eastern division of the barony of East Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the left bank of the Bandon river, about 5 miles east by north of Dunmanway, on the road thence to Bandon. A dispensary in the village belongs partly to the Poor-law union of Handon, but chiefly to that of Dunmanway; and in 1839-40, it received £127 9s., expended £134 9s. 10d., dispensed medicine to 5,569 patients, and served for a district containing 16,787 inhabitants. In 1842, the Ballineen Loan Fund had a capital of £297, circulated £1,212 in 793 loans, cleared a nett profit of £16 3s. 11d., and expended for charitable purposes £24. Area of the village, 14 acres. Pop., in 1831, 691; in 1841, 670. Houses 115.

BALLINEETY, a village in the parish of Cahirnurry, barony of Clauwilliam, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 18 acres. Pop., in 1841, 231. Houses 36.

BALLINEGALL, a decayed hamlet in the liberties of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. "This," says Archdall, "was a town of some note, and was built by the English: at present, it is only a poor village. The family of Roche founded a monastery here for Dominican friars, in the 14th century; and Queen Elizabeth, in her 39th year, granted the same (which in the patent is expressly called a Carmelite friary), with half a carucate of land belonging thereto, to the University of Dublin." See KILMALLOCK.

BALLINESS. See BALLINAS.

BALLINGADDY, a parish in the barony of Coshlea, 2½ miles east by south of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 5,999 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,932; in 1841, 1,761. Houses 204. The townland of Millmount formerly belonged to the barony of Coshlea, but, by the Act 6 and 7 William IV., was transferred to Coshlea.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the union of KILMALLOCK [which see], in the dio. of Limerick; and along with the other parishes of that union, it is appropriated to the dean and chapter of Limerick cathedral. Tithe composition, £280. Within the parish is part of the dean and chapter's economy estate. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 23, and the Roman Catholics to 1,050; and a hedge-school had on its books 36 boys and 28 girls. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is grouped with the chapels of Ardpatrick.

BALLINGARRY, a parish containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Upper Connello, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4; area, 17,732 acres. Pop., in 1831, 8,651; in 1841, 8,679. Houses 1,321. The surface is partly wet and clayey, but consists in general of good pasture and tillage land; it sends off streamlets south-westward and westward toward the Deel, and northward and north-eastward toward the Maig; and it is traversed south-eastward by the road from Rathkeale to Charleville. The town is 4 miles distant from Rathkeale. Area, 25 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,685; in 1841, 1,690. Houses 289. A dispensary here is within the Newcastle Poor-law union; serves for a district containing 8,921 inhabitants; and, in 1839-40, received £161 2s., and expended £159 16s. 8d. In 1842, the Ballingarry Loan Fund had a capital of £93, and circulated £303 in 209 loans. A range of hills rises at Ballingarry, runs east to Croome, and sends up Knockfirne as its most conspicuous summit. In the vicinity of the town are the mansions of Grove, Odelville, and Glanwilliam.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. The vicarage appears by the registry books to include the denominations of Kilmacow and Granboth. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £300, and the rectorial for £600; and the latter belong to the Earl of Cork, and are leased to the Rev. John Graves. Gross income, £312; nett, £220 8s. 8d. Patron, the Earl of Cork. The church is situated in the village, and was built about the year 1812, by means of a parochial assessment, in 1809, of £746 2s. 9d., and of parochial assessments in subsequent years of unascertained amount. Sittings 150; attendance, between 60 and 70. Roman Catholic chapels at Ballingarry, Knockfirne, and Shanavgha, are served, under one parochial arrangement, with 3 officiates, and are attended, the first by about 2,400, and each of the other two by between 400 and 500. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 188, and the Roman Catholics to 8,826; and 8 daily schools were all supported exclusively by fees, and had on their books 295 boys and 126 girls. In 1840, a school at Ballinleena, attended by 81 boys and 42 girls, was taken into connection with the National Board.

BALLINGARRY, a parish in the barony of Coshlea, 8 miles east of Kilmallock, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 6,114 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,497; in 1841, 2,834. Houses 445. The surface is heaved up by northern spurs of the Galtee mountains; lies near the southern edge of the basin or river system of the Shannon; is drained by nascent head-streams of the Maig; and contains much mountainous, marshy, boggy, and waste land. Fairs are held on Easter-Monday, Whit-Monday, July 4, and Dec. 5.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DUNTRILEAGUE [which see], in the dio of Emly. Tithe composition, £250. The Roman Catholic chapel has two officiates, and an attendance of 550. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 2,586; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 108 boys and 91 girls.

BALLINGARRY, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Lower Ormond, and 3½ miles east-north-east of Borris-o-Kane, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 6,683 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches. Pop., in 1831, 1,767; in 1841, 1,962. Houses 321. The surface has a cold, bleak, naked aspect, and contains a large aggregate of bog; yet it is considerably relieved by the demesne of Lisbrien, and some ornamental spots round the residences of Ballingarry, Knockbigowna, Fairhill, Clifton, and Ballymona. Lough Nahinch, on the southern border, has an elevation of 248 feet, and an area of 22 roods, 38 perches. The hamlet of Ballingarry stands on the road between Birr and Borris-o-Kane, by which the parish is traversed from north-east to south-west. Pop., in 1831, 85. Fairs are held here on Whit-Monday, July 23, Nov. 11, and Dec. 11.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Killaloe. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £104 2s. 6d., and the rectorial for £150; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Marmion Thompson, Esq. The vicarages of Ballingarry and Uskeneane [see USKEANE], constitute the benefice of Ballingarry. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½. Gross income, £206; nett, £156 4s. 2d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built upwards of 135 years ago, but at what cost, or from what funds, is not known. Sittings 300; attendance 115. The Roman Catholic chapel has an officiate for itself, and an attendance of 550. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 246, and the Roman Catholics to 1,613; the Protestants of the union to 318, and the Roman Catholics to 3,076; and 3 daily schools in the union,—one of which was in Ballingarry, and received £20 a year from the incumbent,—had on their books 137 boys and 63 girls.

BALLINGARRY, or GARR, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the eastern border of the barony of Slieveadagh and co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 7 miles; breadth, 4; area, 13,714 acres, 1 rood, 33 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,879; in 1841, 7,062. Houses 1,091. The surface, in a general view, consists of good arable and pasture land; it is drained, and divided from co. Kilkenny, on the east, by the Munster river; and it is superincumbent, in the north, on part of the Slieveadagh coalfield. Within the limits are Harley-Park, the seat of James P. Poe, Esq., Colebrook, the seat of C. Langley, Esq., and the mansions of Ballingarry and Ballyhain. The village of Ballingarry stands 5 miles north-west of Callan, but is not situated on any great line of thoroughfare. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 530; in 1841, 643. Houses 111. A dispensary here is within the Callan Poor-law union, and serves for a district containing 8,165 inhabitants; and, in 1839, it received £141 16s., expended £120 10s., and had recommended to it 2,449 patients.—This parish is a vicarage, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Cashel. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £246 3s. 1d., and the rectorial for £492 6s. 2d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the re-representatives of the late Colonel Hardy. Gross income, £272 8s. 1d.; nett, £182 5s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built, in 1810, by means of private subscriptions, and of a donation of £443 16s. 11½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 150; attendance 60. The Roman Catholic chapel has 3 officiates, and an attendance of between 1,000 and 1,200. In 1834 the Protestants amounted to 136, and the Roman Catholics to 6,048; and 10 daily schools had on their books 520 boys and 292 girls. One of the schools was a classical boarding and day school; one was aided with a salary of £20, and a gratuity not exceeding £10 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, and with some other important advantages; and 3 others had various assistance, but not in money, from Lady Dysart, Mr. Rafter, and other persons.

BALLINGARRY, a castle or fortalice, on the coast of the barony of Clannaurice, 3½ miles east-north-east of Kerry Head, and 9 north by west of Ardara, co. Kerry, Munster. D. Crosbie built it in 1641; held it out, during a year, against the Irish; and eventually was betrayed, and carried to Ballybeggan, but was acquitted at the intercession of his nephews, Mac Elligot and Mac Gillicuddy, generals in the Irish army. This was the last garrison of which the cause of the English had possession in the civil war.

BALLINGEAL. See AMHROSETOWN.

BALLINGEARY, a village on the banks of the river Lee, and in the parish of Inchgeelagh, barony of West Muskerry, co. Cork, Munster. Here are the first or highest bridge across the Lee, a Roman Catholic chapel, and a National school. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLINGLEY. See BALLINGLEY.

BALLINLANDERS, BALLINLONDY, or BALLYLANDERS, a parish containing a village of the same name, on the southern border of the barony of Coshlea, and of the county of Limerick, Munster. Area, 7,717 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,999; in 1841, 4,000. Houses 604. The southern division runs up to the summit-line of the Galtee mountains; and the whole surface, excepting such portions as form the seat of population, is a mimic wilderness of upland, moorish, and boggy waste land. The village of Ballinlanders is situated 9¼ miles east-south-east of Kilmallock. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 281; in 1841, 340. Houses 60. A dispensary here is within the Kilmallock Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it received £153 6s., expended £150 16s., and made 5,543 dispensations of medicine.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DUNTRILEAGUE [which see], in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £250. The Roman Catholic chapel has two officiates, and an attendance of 1,300. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 32, and the Roman Catholics to 3,365; and 3 hedge-schools had on their books 112 boys and 50 girls.

BALLINLAW-FERRY, a small village near the confluence of the Suir and the Barrow, and in the barony of Ida, Igrin, and Ilercon, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. A square tower or castle, which still stands here, was built at an early period by the Floristall family, and passed by marriage into the possession of the family of Aylward. The surrounding scenery is extremely rich.

BALLINLESS, a village in the parish of Killavey, barony of Orlog, co. Armagh, Ulster. Post-town, Newry. A Roman Catholic chapel in the village serves also as a National school. Some curious evidence respecting this school occurs in pages 369, 404, and elsewhere of the 'Report from the Select Committee, on Plan of Education, Ireland,' published in 1837. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLINLEY (THE), a rivulet of the barony of Tyreagh, co. Sligo, Connaught. Near its margin stood an abbey, the history of which is not known.

BALLINLOUGHY, BALLINLOUGH, or BALLYLOUGH, a parish on the eastern border of the barony of Small County, and of the county of Limerick, and 5¼ miles east-south-east of Six-mile-bridge, Munster. Length, 14 mile; breadth, 1; area, 2,340 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,286; in 1841, 1,158. Houses 164. Though lying near the sources of some of the Maig's affluents, and on the outer edge of the basin of the Shannon, the land is in general good.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ANEY [which see], in the dio. of Emly. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £72 1s. 9½d., and the rectorial for £144 3s. 7d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to J. D. Freeman of Castletor, co. Cork. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLINLONDY. See BALLINLANDERS.

BALLINLOUGH, a village in the parish of Annahilt, barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down, Ulster. It stands at the confluence of two streams which are tributary to the Annahilt or Ballinabinech river. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLINLOUGH, a village in the parish of Kilsyre, barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 117.

BALLINLOUGH, a village in the parish of Kiltullagh, barony of Castlereagh, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands about half-a-mile south of Lough Aelwyn, and 4½ west of Castlereagh, on the road from that town to Castlebar. It consists of about 30 cabins, 2 school-houses, and a recently erected parish-church; and has a tranquil and almost deserted appearance. The cabins are dispersed in groups on uneven ground; and the church crowns a rising ground amid a cluster of young planted trees. See AELOWYN. Fairs are held on May 31, July 5, Sept. 26, and Oct. 31. Area of the village, 16 acres. Pop., in 1841, 191. Houses 32.

BALLINLOUGH, one of a series of bogs, in the vicinity of the village just noticed, and of Lough Aelwyn, barony of Castlereagh, co. Roscommon, Connaught. The other bogs of the series are those of Cloonchamber, Cloonelta, Cloonsuck, and Clooncan. Area, 6,248 acres, 18 perches, English. These bogs extend 7 miles westward from Annacashel near Castlereagh to Tully near Ballyhaunis; and lie between the road from Cloonallis to Cloonfower to Tully on the north, and the road from Castlereagh to Ballinlough on the south. "They are intersected," says Mr. Longfield, "by the streams from Loughs Cheyn and Clooncan, (two sources of the river Suck,) and by numerous other minor streams, veins, and rushes, all of which are so many ventages to their respective bogs, the great mass of which, being divided and broken by numerous large fertile islands, command an abundant supply of manuring gravels. However, the higher parts of this portion is [are] not so well circumstanced as the lower lands, in point of internal manures, as there is no limestone to be had from Cloonsuck to Ballinlough, or from Ballinlough to Churchborough, nor is there any considerable quantity of manuring gravels. The bogs between those points approach rather to a description of high shallow mountain bog, with an under-stratum composed of large granite stones and poor sandy gravel. The elevations of these particular parts are, however, very high, rising from 20 to 120 feet above the lake called Lough Aelwyn (which is the western boundary of this division, and the chief source of the river Suck); in consequence of which there is no difficulty in effecting their drainage, which very little more than the necessary divisions would accomplish. The lower parts, however, are well circumstanced both in regard to their ventages, and the favourable declinations of the surface, and also in respect to the quantity and quality of the limestone and manuring gravels which are to be had in all the adjoining lands, and the islands through the interior. There are also great tracts of the bogs, particularly at Taghmaia, Cloonelta, and Cloouchamber, that are very shallow and resting on good gravel, which the tenantry of Cloonelta have raised to the surface in many places, for purposes of improvement." Estimated cost of reclamation, £12,826 15s. 5½d. This series of bogs, large though it be, is but an artificially outlined and comparatively inconsiderable section of a sea of bog which expands hence toward almost every point of the compass.

BALLINOCKEN, a chapelry in the barony of West Idrome, about 2 miles south-south-west of Leighlin bridge, co. Carlow, Leinster. It lies along the left bank of the river Barrow; and is traversed by the road from Carlow to Carrick-on-Suir. This chapelry is now united to the rectory of Wells, in the dio. of Leighlin; it forms, jointly with that rectory, the corps of the deanery of Leighlin cathedral; and it contains the church of the benefice, and constitutes one of three mutually detached districts of which the benefice consists. See WELLS.

BALLINOCKEN, a village in the parish of Fermagh, barony of East Idrome, co. Carlow, Leinster. Pop., in 1831, 169.

BALLINODE, a village in the parish of Tydavnet, barony and co. of Monaghan, and 4 miles north-west of the town of Monaghan, Ulster. A rivulet cuts it into two sections, is spanned by a good bridge, and drives some grist mills. Though the village is meanly edificed as to its private houses or cabins, it has a neat church and steeple. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 215. Houses 39.

BALLINODE, a village in the parish of Calry, barony of Carbury, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands 2 miles east of the town of Sligo, on the road thence to Enniskillen. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLINOE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Kinnataloon, co. Cork. 5 miles west by south of Tallow, and 2 south of Knockmourne, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,716 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,692; in 1841, 2,566. Houses 384. Area of the village, 21 acres. Pop., in 1841, 365. Houses 60. The surface has a northern exposure, and lies in the basin of the Bride at a mean distance of 2½ miles from the river; and it consists, for the most part, of arable land. Near the site of the quondam parish-church "are some large ruins," remarks Dr. Smith, "said to have been a religious house, but of what order I cannot find either from tradition or record." In the vicinity of these ruins is a good chalybeate spa.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of KNOCKMOURNE [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Vicarial tithe composition, £305 1s. The rectorial tithes are double of the vicarial in value, and have, from time immemorial, been appropriated to the rectory of Ahern. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is clustered with the chapels of Knockmourne and Mogeely. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 48, and the Roman Catholics to 2,750; and a school, which was aided with £14 a-year from the National Board, and £7 from the Duke of Devonshire, had on its books 44 boys and 14 girls.

BALLINONTY, a hamlet in the parish of Kil-cooley, barony of Slievardagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Pop., in 1831, 71. In 1839-40, a dispensary here, within the Thurles Poor-law union, received £187 16s., expended £177 4s. 1d., and administered to 2,610 extern patients.

BALLINROBE, a parish, partly in the barony of Ross, co. Galway, but chiefly in the barony of Kilmain, co. Mayo, Connaught. The Mayo section contains the town of BALLINROBE: see next article. Length of the Mayo section, 6 miles; breadth, 5; area, 17,510 acres, 3 roods, 32 perches,—of which 3,125 acres, 1 rood, 12 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 8,933; in 1841, 10,115. Houses 1,815. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 6,329; in 1841, 7,437. Houses 1,327. The Galway section is separated by Lough Mask from the Mayo section, bears the name of Churchfield, and is not noticed in the census of 1831. Area, 9,362 acres, 8 perches; of which 2,772 acres, 3 roods, 3 perches, are water. Pop., in 1841, 1,035. Houses 190. About 1,000 acres of the Galway section are mountainous ground, coarse and impracticable; but nearly all the remainder of the parochial surface consists of good land. A summit in the extreme west, and one near the centre of the Galway section, have altitudes of respectively 1,697 and 1,201 feet. The main body, or the Mayo section, forms part of the rich champagne country which intervenes between Loughs Mask and Corrib; it is drained, and in a certain degree beautified, by the river Robe; and, over much the greater part of its area, it is rapidly undergoing georgical improvement. Its principal rural residences are Lakeview, Knocklass, Rathcarren, Creagh, Springvale, and Currymore. The total water-area of the parish consists of 5,244 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches, in part of Lough Mask; 454 acres, 2 roods, 34 perches, in part of Lough Carra; and 199 acres, 21 perches, in streams and small lakes. Other objects of particular interest will be noticed in connection with the town.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Tuam. Tithe composition, £480. Gross income, £610; nett, £500 17s. 7d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate, in addition to a salary of £90, receives £13 for visiting the military hospital. The church was built about a century ago, but at what cost is not known; and, in 1816, a tower was added at the cost of £276 18s. 5½d., borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 350; attendance 120. The Roman Catholic chapel has two officiates, and an attendance of about 2,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 372, and the Roman Catholics to 9,263; a Protestant Sunday school, held in the church, was attended by about 50 children; and 9 daily schools, 6 of which were in the town, 2 at Lakeview, and 1 at Rahard, had on their books 202 boys and 141 girls. One of the daily schools in the town was aided with £20 a-year from the National Board, £10 from C. N. Knox, Esq., and a free house and garden; and another with £10 and a free house from C. N. Knox, Esq. Some time previous to 1840, the National school was suspended.

BALLINROBE, a post and market town, and the capital of the southern district of the county of Mayo, stands on the river Robe, 4½ miles south-west by south of Hollymount, 5 north-north-east of Cong, 15½ south-east of Westport, and 109 west by north of Dublin. Much the larger section is situated on the left bank of the Robe, and consists principally of an airy, well-edificed, and partly straight street, along the line of thoroughfare between Cong and Hollymount,—an intersecting street, containing a few good houses, but lined chiefly with rows of cabins along the road between Kilmain and Westport,—and two shorter streets parallel respectively with these, and almost everywhere meanly edificed. The section on the right bank of the river consists almost solely of a short continuation of the rows of cabins along the road to Westport, and of the large tenements and spacious areas of the military barracks. The site of the main body is principally the table-summit and partly the river-ward slope of a gentle swell; and between a large portion of it and the stream is an unbragous and meadowy alluvial plain,—Scotticé, 'a haugh,'—along the edge of which the river trots and frolics in mirthful current. The site of the other section rises boldly but not loftily up from the margin of the stream, and sustains the suites of barracks in airiness and comparative conspicuousness of position. Owing to the flatness of the surrounding country, the height of a fair proportion of the town's private houses, the advantageous position of the public buildings, and the isolation of the swells in both portions of the site, the town, as seen from various points at $\frac{1}{4}$ or 2 miles' distance, looks much larger and more pretending than it really is, and even wears a prominently urban aspect. Though altogether inferior to Ballinasloe, Westport, and Ballina, it markedly excels the majority of Connaught towns in regularity, cleanliness, and amount of apparent comfort. Yet in real prosperity it has suffered serious reverses: it was once of some county importance, but now shares only such privileges as are common to it with various filthy little villages; and till very recently it was an important and well-garrisoned military station, but now it pines under the complete and final abandonment of both its cavalry and its infantry barracks. The market-house, fronting the main street, and occupying a corner at the intersection of the long cross street, is a plain yet neat building; its lower story open, or in piazza style, and its upper story used as court-house, school-house, and for miscellaneous public purposes. The cavalry barrack was originally a seat of Lord Tyrrawley; and, besides occupying a site of much beauty on the river, is graced with some venerable trees which belonged to the demesne of the mansion, and which now may almost rank as antiquities of the town. The bridewell, situated on the outskirts of the town toward Cong, was long in a discreditable condition, but, two or three years ago, was reformed and improved. In the Report of 1841, the inspector says regarding it: "I found this bridewell clean and regular; the diet is expensive, and made more so than is necessary by the average detention of prisoners being three times as long as in bridewells in general." The parish-church, situated in a recess or open area on the east side of the main street, has a tolerably good appearance; the Roman Catholic chapel draws attention only from its capaciousness; and a meeting-house, erected 10 or 11 years ago at the expense of J. Fynn, Esq., of Ballymacgibbon, as a place of worship for evangelical Protestant dissenters, has a mere dwelling-house aspect, and is not noticed in the Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction. At the base of the swell on which the main body of the town stands, and on the inner edge of the alluvial plain, are some remains of an ancient monastery. Archdall says it "was a monastery of Augustinian friars; and in the register of the Dominican friary of Athenry, the monastery de Roba is mentioned in the year 1337, but when or by whom founded is not recorded." Numerous remains of churches and castles in the circumjacent country, both in and beyond the parish, seem to indicate that the town anciently possessed considerable importance. Creagh, Currymore, and other mansions in the vicinity, and the stated or occasional residence of several wealthy and influential families in the town itself or its immediate outskirts, still relieve it from mere village or plodding character. The weekly market is well attended, and commands both the ingress of agricultural produce from an extensive circumjacent country, and the egress of the various wares of a miscellaneous retail trade. Fairs are held on Whit-Monday and Dec. 5. A tolerably good inn and posting-house is maintained partly by market-business, and in a small degree by the transit of tourists. In 1838, the only public conveyance was a car to Tuam.

The Ballinrobe Poor-law union ranks as the 81st, and was declared on Nov. 7, 1839. It lies partly in co. Galway, but chiefly in co. Mayo, and comprehends a territory of 190,635 acres, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 74,842. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop. in 1831, are, in co. Galway, Ballogholla, 2,028; and Ross, 4,361; and in co. Mayo, Ballinrobe, 9,415; Kilmolara, 3,053; Cong, 8,378; Shrule, 4,177; Kilmain, 5,555; Hollymount, 6,507; Ballindine, 7,600; Claremorris, 8,391; Mayo, 3,152; Borrisicarra, 2,356; Robeen, 5,754; and Partree, 4,025. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 8 and 26; and of the latter, 3 are returned by each of the divisions of Ballinrobe, Cong, Ballindine, and Claremorris; 2 by each of the divisions of Kilmain, Hollymount, Robeen, and Ross, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of property rated is £82,805 12s.; the total number of persons rated is 14,238; and of the latter, 2,030 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—3,229 not exceeding £2,—2,487 not exceeding £3,—1,800 not exceeding £4,—and 1,414 not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on May 2, 1840; to be completed in Sept. 1841; to cost £7,000 for building and completion, and £1,400 for fittings and contingencies; to occupy a site of 6 acres, 1 rood, 36 perches, gifted by Col. Nesbit Knox, and obtained for £33 18s. 7d. of compensation to occupying tenant; and to contain accommodation for 800 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was May 26, 1842; the total expenditure thence till Feb. 6, 1843, was £1,085 7s. 11d.; and the total previous expenditure was £1,590 9s. 6d. Six dispensary-districts comprehend an area of 227,794 acres, with a pop., in 1831, of 70,342; they have their seats at Ballinrobe, Claremorris, Fairhill, Hollymount, Partree, and Neale and Cong; and in 1840-41, their aggregate receipts and expenses amounted to respectively £773 19s. 1d., and £730 6s. The Ballinrobe dispensary has a district of 24,440 acres, with a pop. of 13,108; and in 1840-41, it received £212 13s. 6d., and expended £224 2s. 14d. Area of the town, 112 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,604; in 1841, 2,678. Houses 488.

BALLINSPIITTE, a village in the parish of Ringrove, barony of Courcy, and about $\frac{3}{4}$ miles south-west of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. Fairs are held on May 14 and 15, and Sept. 25, 26. A dispensary here is within the Kinsale Poor-law union, and has a district containing a pop. of 11,821; and in 1839-40, it received £113 16s., expended £111 5s. 7d., and administered to 1,479 patients. Area, 7 acres. Pop., in 1831, 105; in 1841, 126. Houses 20.

BALLINTAMPLE, a village in the parish of Ahamplish, barony of Carbury, about 8 miles north by west of Sligo, co. Sligo, Connaught. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 110; in 1841, 178. Houses 32.

BALLINTAYLOR, a demesne on the southern border of the parish of Whitechurch, and of the barony of Decies-without-Drum, about 6 miles west of Dungarvan, co. Waterford, Munster. "On the slopes of Slievegrain," says Mr. Fraser, "the plantations, regular enclosures, and handsome farm-houses, mark out Ballintaylor, the highly improved estate of John Musgrave, Esq." The property formerly belonged in succession to the families of Osborne and Usher. Dr. Smith, writing concerning it about 70 years ago, says, "Here are considerable plantations of timber trees (besides large adjacent woods), as oaks, elms, walnut, &c., as also the arbutus, a tree which grows naturally in this kingdom. This and the buckthorn thrive here, becoming considerable large trees; though accounted shrubs in most other places, which has been often known to happen through difference of soil, climate, and culture."

BALLINTEMPLE, a parish in the barony of Arklow, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of the town of Arklow, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,087 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,021; in 1841, 1,114. Houses 185. The surface extends along the lower part of the river Aughrim, and a small part of the river Ovoca; and both contribute and commands exquisite landscapes in the vales of these brilliant streams, and at "the meeting of the waters." The land in the bottom, and on the slopes of the valleys is fertile. The highest ground is in the south-west, and has an altitude of 1,399 feet.—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £103 16s. 11d. Gross income, £124 7s. 9d.; nett, £101 4s. 9d. Patron, William Bryan, Esq. The church was built, in 1815, at the cost of £784 12s. 3d., chiefly gifted and partly lent by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 80. The Roman Catholic chapel has two officiates, and an attendance of 800. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 73, and the Roman Catholics to 948; and two daily schools—one of which was originally established by the Kildare Place Society—had on their books 67 boys and 37 girls.

BALLINTEMPLE, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Lower Kilnemanagh, 4 miles north-east of Tipperary, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 4,208 acres. Pop., in 1831, 786; in 1841, 656. Houses 81. The surface is drained and separated from the barony of Clanwilliam on the south-west and south by a considerable affluent of the Suir; it is traversed north-eastward by the road from Tipperary to Holycross; and it contains some finely variegated and well-wooded landscape, and consists, for the most part, of good land. Within the parochial limits is Lord Hawarden's beautiful demesne of DUNDUM; which see.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £242. The rectories of Ballintemple, KILPATRICK, OGHTERLEAGUE, and RATHLYNAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Ballintemple. Length, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, from a few hundred yards to upwards of 2 miles. Gross income, £780 18s. 24d.; nett, £629 9s. 54d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in Ballintemple; but when it was built, or at whose cost, is unknown. Sittings 300; attendance, between 100 and 150. Two Roman Catholic chapels in Ballintemple and Oughterleague have 3 officiates, and an attendance of respectively 700 and 970. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 153, and the Roman Catholics to 661; the Protestants of the union to 232, and the Roman Catholics to 4,597; 3 daily schools in the parish were attended by 215 children; and these, with 4 other schools in the union, had on their books 317 boys and 192 girls. Two of the schools in the parish were respectively for boys and for girls, and were aided, the latter with £10 a-year, and the former with £30 and other advantages, from Lord Hawarden.

BALLINTEMPLE, a parish on the north-western border of the barony of Imokilly, 2 miles east-north-east of Middleton, co. Cork, Munster. Its name, as in other places called Ballintemple, means 'the town of the church'; but, in this case, the translation, or 'Churchtown,' is often popularly substituted for the original name. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,860 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,756; in 1841, 1,742. Houses 296. The surface touches the north-east corner of Cork Harbour, and is washed along the northern boundary and separated from the barony of Barrymore, by the Middleton river. Within the parish is the village of Churchtown. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 178; in 1841, 111. Houses 25.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LISGOOLD [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £500 5s. The parish being 6 miles distant from Lisgoold, in which is situated the church of the union, a licensed school-house, in the parish of Kilmahon, is used as the parochial place of worship, and has an attendance of 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Cloyne. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 42, and the Roman Catholics to 1,790; and two daily schools, supported by fees, had on their books 32 boys and 13 girls. In 1840, a National school in the village was aided with £6 a-year, and had on its books 71 boys and 29 girls.

BALLINTEMPLE, a village in the parish of St. Finbar's, barony and co. of Cork, Munster. It stands on the south side of the river Lee, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of Cork, on the road thence to Blackrock. A church was erected here by the Knights Templars in 1392, and was afterwards given to the prior and friars of Gill Abbey. Though the church long ago disappeared, its burying-ground is still in use. "The situation of this cemetery," says Mr. Croker, "is retired and romantic; and the few tombstones that rise above the large dock leaves and nettles with which it is overgrown, record the names of such villagers as have died in more opulent circumstances than their neighbours. The remains of the humble farmer and the poor fisherman occupy this secluded spot, with the exception of one grave, containing a pair whose melancholy fate and early death throw an interest over the simple tablet that marks their abode." He then narrates a pathetic tale which any curious reader may see on pages 213—215 of his "Researches in the South of Ireland." Area of the village, 24 acres. Pop., in 1841, 455. Houses 77.

BALLINTEMPLE, a parish in the barony of Clonmahon, 6 miles south-south-west of Cavan, co. Cavan, Ulster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $2\frac{1}{2}$; area, 10,658 acres. Pop., in 1831, 4,946; in 1841, 5,341. Houses 930. About one-ninth of the area consists of prime land; about three-fourths of second-rate land; and the remainder, of inferior land. The surface is drained north-westward by an affluent of the Erne, diversified by 54 acres of lakes, and traversed south-south-westward by the road from Cavan to Granard. Within the parochial limits is a small part of the village of BALINAGH; which see.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Kilmore, and corps of the deanery of Kilmore cathedral in the dio. of Kilmore. See KILMORE. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £155, and the rectorial for £104; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the Marquis of Westmeath. The church was built in 1821, by means of a loan of £1,107 13s. 104d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 120. The Roman Catholic chapel at Aghaloure has an attendance of 430; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is grouped with Pallahee and Bruska chapels in Kilmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 416, and the Roman Catholics to 4,778; and 6 daily schools—2 of which were connected with the Kildare Place Society, while another was aided with £2 from subscription, and £7 from the Society for Discourteanancing Vice—had on their books 353 boys and 106 girls.

BALLINTEMPLE, a beautiful and well-wooded demesne, in the barony of Forth, and on the banks of the Slaney, about 4 miles south of Tallow, co. Carlow, Leinster. It is the property of Sir Thomas Butler, Bart.

BALLINTEMPLE, co. Sligo. See BALLINTAMPLE.

BALLINTOBER, the most extensive subdivision or baronial district of co. Roscommon, Connaught. It exists in three mutually detached sections, which figure on the map like three of the nine integral parts or grand subdivisions of the county; and, though recently erected into three distinct baronies, named Castlereagh, North Ballintober, and South Ballintober, it formerly constituted only one barony. Mr. Weld, estimating the superficial extent of the whole at 162,822 acres, distributes it into 122,982 acres of arable land, 37,734 acres of bog, and 2,106 acres of water. The eastern section, now the barony of North Ballintober, has the form of a slender oblong, extends along the Shannon, from the demesne of Charleston, near Drumsna and Jamestown, to the mouth of the Feurish river below Tarmonbarry; and is, in consequence, zoned on one side by the river and its lacustrine expansions, and on the other by the barony of Roscommon. The southern section, now constituting the barony of South Ballintober, and containing the town of Roscommon, has proximately a square form; reaches, at the nearest point, to within 3 miles of the eastern section's extremity at the mouth of the Feurish; and is bounded on the north by the barony of Roscommon, on the east by the Shannon, on the south by the barony of Athlone, and on the west by the barony of Athlone and the half-barony of Ballymoe. The western section, now called the barony of Castlereagh, has a very irregular outline, approaches to within $\frac{1}{4}$ mile of the north-west corner of the southern section, and $\frac{6}{10}$ miles of the nearest part of the eastern section; sends out a long south-westward projection between co. Mayo and co. Galway; and is elsewhere bounded by the half-barony of Ballymoe, and the baronies of Roscommon and Boyle. The sections are not remarkably unequal in size, but the eastern is the smallest, and the western the largest.—The eastern section, or North Ballintober, comprises the parishes of Kilmore and Tarmonbarry, and the chief part of Kilglass; it contains, between the Shannon and the north end of the great sandstone ridge of Slievebawn, a large aggregate of bog; it consists, to the west of the Slievebawn ridge, of highly improvable land [see GILLSTOWN]; and, though it contains numerous hamlets, or clusters of cabins, especially on sound land in the vicinity of its bogs, it has only inconsiderable villages, and no towns except Tarmonbarry and Rooskey. Area, 34,123 acres. Pop., in 1841, 19,370. Houses 3,367. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 2,920; in manufactures and trade, 469; in other pursuits, 169. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,694; who could read but not write, 1,647; who could neither read nor write, 4,042. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 800; who could read but not write, 1,637; who could neither read nor write, 3,724.—The southern division, or barony of South Ballintober, contains no town but Roscommon, nor any considerable village except Ballyleague; it consists of insulated hills and ridges of limestone and limestone gravel, interspersed with bogs and occasionally alluvial or diluvial flats; and, in its northern district, toward the extremity of the sandstone ridge of Slievebawn, it shoots up to considerable altitudes, its heights now bare of both tree and hedge-row, and now showily embellished with country-seats and with woods. The parishes in this section are part of Clontuskert and Kilbride, and the whole of Kilgeffin, Kiltewan, and Roscommon. Area, 50,558 acres. Pop., in 1841, 26,369. Houses 4,429. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 3,615; in manufactures and trade, 754; in other pursuits, 435. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,066; who could read but not write, 1,731; who could neither read nor write, 6,585. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,320; who could read but not write, 1,606; who could neither read nor write, 8,636.—The western section, or barony of Castlereagh, contains the towns of Castlereagh and Ballinlough, and some considerable villages, such as Castle-Plunkett and Belanagare; its eastern district is a broad belt of fine grazing land, similar to that about Talsk, and studded with several well-wooded demesnes; and its western district is a wild and dismal expanse of bog, partially relieved with hilly and ridgy interspersions of good land. We reserve the statistics of this district for the word CASTLEREA: which see.—Pop. of the whole tri-baronial territory of Ballintober, in 1831, 70,597. Houses 11,871.

BALLINTOBER, a parish, containing a village of the same name, on the southern border of the barony of Castlereagh, co. Roscommon, Connaught. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 6,352 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,460; in 1841, 2,616. Houses 477. The surface is a series of undulations, or of steep ridges and intervening hollows, the former consisting of limestone and limestone gravel, the latter occasionally possessing considerable depth, and the two so alternated and mutually foiled as to form several pleasant close landscapes. The river Suck and the road from Castlereagh to Athleague and Roscommon traverse the interior south-eastward. The principal mansions are Cleabog, Bohagh, Willsgrove, Frenchlawn, and Enfield. An ancient castle, for which the parish is celebrated, will be noticed in connection with the village.—Ballintober is a rectory in the diocese of Elphin, and a prebend in Elphin cathedral. Tithe composition, £200. This rectory and the vicarages of KILKEEVAN and BALICK [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Ballintober or Kilkeevan. Length, 10 miles; breadth, 9. Gross income, £662 5s.; nett, £545 2s. 4d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a salary of £75. The church is situated in Kilkeevan, and was built in 1819 by means of a loan of £2,307 13s. 10½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 450 attendance 250. The Ballintober Roman Catholic chapel has an officiate for itself, and an attendance of 1,200. There are Roman Catholic chapels also in Kilkeevan and Ballick. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 48, and the Roman Catholics to 2,585; the Protestants of the union to 833, and the Roman Catholics to 17,063; 3 daily schools in the parish, two of which were aided jointly with £10 from Mr. Wells, and a graduated allowance from the London Hibernian Society, had on their books 174 boys and 77 girls; and 30 daily schools in the union had on their books 487 boys and 798 girls.

The village of BALLINTOBER stands on the road between Castlereagh and Roscommon, about 4 miles south-east of the former, and 9 north-west of the latter. It consisted, in 1832, of the Roman Catholic chapel, one slated two story house, 3 thatched two story houses, and 22 cabins. An ancient church stood near the site of the Roman Catholic chapel, and its cemetery still remains, and is crowded with tombs. The editor of Grose, apparently without feasible evidence, ascribes the origin of the village to an abbey erected, in 1216, by O'Conor, king of Connaught. A fair is held on Aug. 25. A little west of the village, on the extremity of a narrow and delivitous ridge, stand the ruins of the castle of Ballintobber. The road from Castlereagh runs along a parallel ridge on the opposite side of a deep hollow or ravine; and the castle, as seen from the road, has a singularly majestic and imposing aspect. A quadrangular enclosure of 270 by 237 feet, within walls, was defended by 4 strong towers at the angles, and 2 at the sides of the grand entrance, and was surrounded by a broad fosse. The grand towers are all polygonal, and though so deficient in symmetry that no two have the same number and length of sides, they bear a strong resemblance to some of the towers of Caernarvon-castle in Wales. "The south-west tower," says Mr. Weld, "is a superb piece of architecture, and, for its general effect, amongst the most imposing remains of antiquity which I can call to recollection in Ireland." The south-east tower is about 30 feet in breadth; but all the towers were elongated towards the interior of the great court. In the plan of the castle published in the volumes of Antiquities which bear the name of Grose, this latter tower is represented as round; but this is not the only blunder. The circumstance, however, is the more remarkable, because whoever had once looked at this tower with attention, could scarcely forget the extraordinary beautiful effect of the reflection of the sides, with their varied lights and shades in the waters of the fosse beneath, which generally present a smooth and glassy surface. During the few hours I remained at Ballintobber, I was tempted to look at it again and again, and scarcely every saw a more interesting morceau of the kind." The lower part of the towers had loopholes for defence, and the upper stories were perforated with windows, and apparently disposed in habitable apartments. The curtain walls between the towers were about 5 feet 8 inches thick at the height of the great inner court, and were provided with loopholes. Though serious dilapidation has occurred from violence, pillage, and the influence of time, a great part of the towers, most of the curtain walls, and several interior arches and features of beauty are in comparatively good preservation. Ballintobber-castle was the residence of the O'Conors, kings of Connaught, and figured, down to a comparatively recent date, in some stirring scenes both of their own history and of that of their descendants. But such notices of it, and its proprietors, and its attached landed possessions as our limits will admit, are so intimately connected, and in most instances identified, with the history of the province, that, excepting a hint as to its origin, we must reserve them for our article on CONNAUGHT: which see. In the manuscript records of the O'Conor family, "not only," says Mr. Weld, "is there an absence of information about the building of Ballintobber-castle, but it is stated distinctly that no records whatever are in existence to trace the history of its erection. The tradition of the country merely assigns to it a date about the middle of the 13th century; and Cathal Creudearag O'Conor, a natural brother of Roderic O'Conor, the last of the kings of the Irish race, has the reputation of having been the founder. He had supplanted the family of Roderic; was elected king of the Irish of Connaught, and carried on a successful warfare against the English, during a space of near 40 years. 'But it does not appear that he resided at Ballintobber-castle.' The name Ballintobber means 'the town of the well;' and the fountain whence the village, the castle, the parish, and the barony, derived it, bursts out at the foot of some trees below the cemetery of the ancient church, and sends away several shallow, but clear and pretty rills.

BALLINTOBBER, a parish, 7 miles north-west of Ballinrobe, and partly in the barony of Burrischoole, but chiefly in that of Carra, co. Mayo, Connaught. Length, 9 miles; breadth, 5. Area of the Carra section, 22,236 acres, 1 rood, 21 perches; of which 340 acres, 1 rood, 29 perches are in Lough Carra, and 425 acres, 1 rood, 35 perches, are in small lakes. Pop., in 1831, 6,212; in 1841, 6,753. Houses 1,248. The census of 1831 does not notice the Burrischoole section. Area of that section, 730 acres, 1 rood, 19 perches. Pop., in 1841, 446. Houses 83. The surface consists partly of prime land, and partly of inferior and waste ground; and is traversed by the road from Ballinrobe to Castlebar by way of Partree. Slieve-Bohannan, on the southern boundary, has an altitude of 1,294 feet; and the river Ayle, while connected with the parish, descends from an elevation of 282 feet to the level of Lough Carra. In 1216, an abbey for Augustinian canons regular was founded in the parish by Cathal O'Conor, King of Connaught; it received, from various persons, large endowments in land; and, in 1605, a lease of it in reversion for 50 years was granted to Sir John King. "It was originally a magnificent pile, the workmanship of superior excellence," says Dr. McParlan; "a good many parts of the ruins are still entire; the great steeple is down, but the grand arch upon which it rested is entire; I should suppose it upwards of 50 feet high, of equally curious and solid elegance. The great door is beautiful, being a pointed arch supported by five columns. It is altogether a masterpiece in its kind, and admired as such by the most refined judges,—judges even who saw the drawings and original of the Bathala."—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of DRUM [which see], in the dio. of Tuam. The tithes are wholly inappropriate, and belong to the vicars choral of Christ Church, Dublin; and, in 1832, they were let on lease of 21 years for £13 16s. 11½d., partly to George Clendinning, and partly to Mrs. Mary Spray. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is grouped with the chapels of Killeavalla and Burriscarra. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 11, and the Roman Catholics to 6,656; and 2 daily schools, held in the abbey and in the Roman Catholic chapel, had on their books 91 boys and 23 girls.

BALLINTOBBER, a village in the parish and barony of Ballyadams, Queen's co., and about 3 miles west-south-west of Athy, Leinster. It has a pleasant appearance, and contains the neat church of the benefice of Ballyadams. The two parishes of which that benefice consists, have the alias appellations of Ballyadams of Ballintobber, and Fonestown of Ballintobber. See BALLYADAMS and FONSTOWN. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLINTOBBER, a seat in the parish of Ballymartle, 3½ miles north of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. It belonged, in last century, to Sir John Meade, whose grandfather was raised to the baronetcy by Queen Anne, and who was himself created Viscount Clanwilliam in 1766.

BALLINTOGBER, a village in the parish of Killery, barony of Tiraghroll, co. Sligo, Connaught.

It stands 3½ miles south-west of Dromahaire. Fairs are held on June 8, July 30, Oct. 17, and Dec. 10. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 201; in 1841, 234. Houses 45.

BALLINTOY, a parish containing a village of the same name, on the north coast of the barony of Carey, and of the county of Antrim, Ulster. It extends 5 miles along the shore, and 3 into the interior. Area, 12,753 acres, 3 roads, 22 perches. Pop., in 1831, 4,682; in 1841, 4,816. Houses 901. The coast-district consists, for the most part, of good land; but the interior districts are, to a large extent, but decreasingly moorish and boggy. Knock-soghy hill rises behind the village; and though partly rocky, and generally coated with much furze and heath, is all fit for pasture. Croaghmore, or 'the large stack,' rises abruptly to the height of 471 feet above sea-level; is arable on its skirts, and verdant on its sides; consists solely of basalt, and has some basaltic columns near its summit; is crowned by a large sepulchral cairn; and figures conspicuously in a great expanse of landscape. Woods and thickets do not exist; and even single trees are scarce. The rivulets Dunseverick and Luover drain the surface, and drive 2 or 3 mills. Salmon fisheries exist at Port Braddon, Carrickarede, and Lanyban; and glashen, grey-gurnet, and cod, are caught in great plenty; and various other kinds of fish, in considerable quantity, along the coast. Basalt, capable of being as neatly dressed with the hammer as if cut with a chisel, is extensively quarried. Indurated chalk, used as limestone, abounds in the sea-board townlands of Ballintoy, Magheraboy, Clegnach, Lime-neagh, and Ballinastrail. In 1756, wood coal was discovered in the hill above the village, and worked with such effect as to supply the salt-works of Portrush and Coleraine; it resembles charred wood, has a smell resembling that of rotten timber, and usually occurs in veins of from 2 or 4 inches to 3 feet thick, alternating with beds of basalt; but though used freely for burning chalk, and occasionally for fuel, it is much depreciated on account of its disagreeable odour. In the townland of Templestragh an old church, supposed to have been that of the parishes of Ballintoy and Billy before they were divided, stands in ruin; and in its vicinity are two pieces of burying-ground. Rath, mounds, Druidical temples, caves, and other similar antiquities, exist. Mr. Atkinson, after observing that the parishioners, so far as appears from the account in Mason's Statistical Survey, had no lawyer, no physician, and only one minister, and yet were prosperous, remarks: "How it is that they have lived so long without priests, lawyers, and physicians, we beg them to explain for the good of their wretched country; for undoubtedly it is an anomaly in the history of Europe; indeed the record of this parish ought to be placed in the museums of that quarter of the world, as a philosophical curiosity. The antiquities of this parish are no less remarkable: among them, are hatchets of stone, flint, and brass, bracelets, fibulae, brass vases, and other articles of remote antiquity; as also urns filled with burned bones; but the most interesting to us, of all those antiquities, is that of a gold coin of Valentinian, which was brought to the minister, in perfect preservation, and was in his custody a few years since." The village of Ballintoy stands 4 miles north-west of Ballycastle, 6 east of Bushmills, and 44 north-west of Belfast. Area, 12 acres. Pop., in 1831, 278; in 1841, 310. Houses 65. The village occupies a bold and romantic site on an impressively barren and denuded shore; and the steeple of its church is a conspicuous object in so bleak a view, and has become a useful landmark to mariners. Fairs are held on June 3, Sept. 4, and

Oct. 14. The road from Ballycastle to Bushmills passes through the village; and an ample ramification of other roads traverses the interior—This parish is a rectory, and a separate benefice in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, exclusive of a portion assigned to the perpetual curate of Dunseverick parish, £389 19s. 5d. Gross income, £461 9s. 5d.; nett, £315 9s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate receives a stipend of £70. Some of the townlands of the parish are within the perpetual curacy of DUNSEVERICK: which see. The church was built in 1814, by means of £338 15s. 4½d., raised by the parish, and £738 9s. 2½d. granted by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 500; attendance, from 130 to 200 in winter, and from 300 to 400 in summer. A Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by from 250 to 300, and a Roman Catholic chapel by 250; and the latter is united, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, to the chapel of Armoy. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 9,122 Churchmen, 933 Presbyterians, and 1,064 Roman Catholics; and 6 daily schools, at Ballintoy, Croaghbeg, Lisbetnagrough, Drummagison, Prolisk, and Island-Macallen, had on their books 330 boys and 102 girls. The schools at Prolisk and Island-Macallen were wholly supported on an annual grant of £26 each from the Methodist Missionary Society, and that at Ballintoy was aided with £15 a-year, charged on lands by the will of a James Stewart.

BALLINTRAE, a village in the parish of Drumholm, barony of Tyrhugh, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands 4½ miles north-east of Ballyshannon, on the road thence to Donegal. A dispensary in the village is within the Poor-law union of Ballyshannon, and has a district of 35,433 acres, with 8,501 inhabitants; and, in 1839-40, it received £137 19s., expended £138 2s. 6d., and administered to 1,458 patients. Fairs are held on Feb. 1, March 23, May 20, July 31, Oct. 2, and Nov. 30. In 1842, the Ballintra Loan Fund had a capital of £2,659, circulated £10,003 in 2,929 loans, cleared a nett profit of £95 18s. 3d., and expended for charitable purposes £172 0s. 10d.; and from the date of its formation till the close of 1842, it circulated £48,919 in 16,903 loans, cleared a nett profit of £674 3s. 9d., and expended for charitable purposes, £630 3s. 7d. Area of the village, 23 acres. Pop., in 1831, 439; in 1841, 522. Houses 100. See DRUMHOLM.

BALLINTRAE, co. Leitrim. See BRALANTRA. BALLINTRAE, a small bay near the mouth of the Bush river, and in the bottom of the bay between Bengore and the Skerries, on the north coast of co. Antrim, Ulster. It has about 14 feet of depth of water, and experiences a rise of about 8 or 9 feet in spring tides. A small pier and dock, capable of containing 2 or three small vessels, was built by Mr. Spencer for the use of his salt works, is well executed, and admits vessels drawing 7 feet. "Mr. S." reports Mr. Nimmo, "has also begun a breakwater of rough stone on the west side of it, which he proposes extending 40 or 50 yards into 10 feet water. This place is likely to be of importance to the fishery or embayed vessels, &c., and is the only shelter or landing-place hereabouts. The work seems deserving of aid. The expense of the breakwater may be £500 or £600."

BALLINTUBBER. See BALLINTOBBER.

BALLINURE, a parish on the western border of the barony of Upper Talbotstown, co. Wicklow, and 5½ miles north by west of Baltinglass, Leinster. Length and breadth, each 3 miles; area, 7,404 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,042; in 1841, 1,718. Houses 256. The surface is drained south-westward by remote affluents of the Barrow, and traversed southward by the road from Killeullen to Tullow. The land averages in value 35s. per plantation acre. The highest ground has an altitude of 1,023 feet; and one of the largest indigenous hills descends from an elevation of upwards of 550 feet. Ballinure-house and Grange-Con are the principal mansions of the parish; the latter occupies a picturesque and romantic site amid beautifully varied rising grounds; and other residences are Griffinstown, Knockarrig, and Barons-town. Within the parochial limits is the hamlet of BUMBOA-HALL: which see.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice, but held, in 1837, by the incumbent of Baltinglass, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £300; nett, £279 2s. 4d. Patron, Henry Carroll, Esq., of Ballinure. A curate is employed at a stipend of £83 1s. 6d. The church was built, in 1815, by means of a grant of £738 9s. 2½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 50. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 950. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 210, and the Roman Catholics to 1,720; and a National school had on its books 84 boys and 50 girls.

BALLINURE, a parish on the northern border of the barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It contains the village of Ballinure, and part of the post-town of Ballyclare. See BALLYCLARE. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 8,540 acres, 3 roads, 11 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,549; in 1841, 3,469. Houses 615. Area of the rural districts, 8,514 acres. Pop., in 1841, 2,928. Houses 517. The surface is separated, along the north-west from the barony of Antrim, by the Six-mile-Water; it extends eastward to near the sources of that stream, or the water-shed on the tabular trap summit of the county; and it is traversed south-westward by the road from Larne to Antrim. Much of the land is good for tillage, and highly productive in pasture and meadow. The total water-area is 22 acres, 22 perches. The village of Ballinure stands on the road to Larne, 2½ miles north-east of Ballyclare, and about 7 south-west of Larne. Area, 21 acres. Pop., in 1831, 415; in 1841, 380. Houses 70. See BALLYCLARE.—Ballinure is a rectory in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £330. This rectory and the vicarages of KILROOT and TEMPLECORRAN [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Ballinure or Kilroot. Ballinure is about 6½ miles distant from both Kilroot and Templecorran. Gross income, £496 0s. 5d.; nett, £454 0s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church of the benefice is situated in Ballinure, and is so old that the date and cost of its erection are unknown. Sittings 100; attendance, from 30 to 40. A Presbyterian meeting-house is attended by 240 in winter, and 400 in summer; an Independent by 45; and a Methodist by 130. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 177 Churchmen, 3,155 Presbyterians, 266 other Protestant dissenters, and 177 Roman Catholics; and the inhabitants of the union consisted of 185 Churchmen, 3,003 Presbyterians, 275 other Protestant dissenters, and 256 Roman Catholics. In the same year, 7 daily schools in the parish had on their books 196 boys and 120 girls; and these, with 5 other daily schools, and 1 Sunday school in the union, had 316 boys and 217 girls. One of the schools in the parish was aided with £2 a-year from Mr. Dobbs, and 2 others with respectively £8 and £10 from the National Board. In 1840, there were National schools at Skilganaban, Ballygowan, and Ballynerry.

BALLINURE, a village on the Little Barrow, in the barony of Coolestown, 8 miles north-east of Portarlington, King's co., Leinster. Sir Charles Coote, in his Agricultural Survey of the county, calls it "a very mean village." Pop. not specially returned.

BALLINVANNA, a quondam parish in the barony of Coshlea, co. Limerick, Munster. The census of 1831 states its pop. at 2,697; but the census of 1841 totally omits it. The Report of the Commissioners of Public Instruction states its pop., in 1831, at 2,710, and says that all its inhabitants, in 1834, were Roman Catholics.—This parish consists of townlands which lie distributed among the members of the benefice of Kilmallock, in the dio. of Limerick. But it seems never to have been of itself an ecclesiastical parish, and may now be regarded as not even a civil one.

BALLINVARRY. See BALLYVARY.

BALLINVOHER, a parish on the north shore of Dingle bay, 10 miles east of Dingle, barony of Cork-aguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 16,681 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,924; in 1841, 3,579. Houses 589. About one-third of the area is mountainous, boggy, and unprofitable; and the remainder is land, partly of excellent, and partly of inferior, quality. See DINGLE.—This parish is a rectory, and forms the corps of the archdeaconry of Ardferit, in the dio. of Ardferit and Aghadoe. Tithe composition, £203 1s. 10d. Gross income, £207 14s. 1d.; nett, £188 11s. 6d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate, who performs occasional duties for the non-resident incumbent, has a stipend of £15. The church, in the neighbouring parish of Ballinacourty, serves for the accommodation of the Protestant inhabitants of Ballinvoher. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 200; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Ballinacourty. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 2, and the Roman Catholics to 3,125; and 8 hedge-schools had on their books 86 boys and 26 girls.

BALLON, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Forth, 3½ miles south by west of Tullow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,700 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,439; in 1841, 1,524. Houses 267. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 161; in 1841, 327. Houses 58. The townlands of Castlegrace and Drisage, which contained, in 1831, a pop. of 57, belonged then to the barony of Rathvilly, but were transferred, by act of 6 and 7 William IV., to the barony of Forth. The parochial surface impinges on the watershed between the river-systems of the Barrow and the Slaney; and consists in general of only middle-rate land. The chief residences are Sandbrook, Ballymogue, Kilmurphy, Laragh, and Cappagh. In 1842, the Ballon Loan Fund had a capital of £1,803, circulated £5,350 in 1,507 loans, cleared a nett profit of £20 7s. 6d., and expended for charitable purposes £13 11s.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of AGHADE [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £80, and the rectorial for £140; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Lord Cloncurry. In 1834, the Roman Catholics amounted to 1,406, and the Protestants jointly with those of Aghade parish, to 109; and 2 hedge-schools had on their books 193 boys and 129 girls. In 1840, two National schools at Ballon and Conaberry were aided with respectively £10 and £12 a-year, and attended by 269 children.

BALLRICHAN. See BALRICHAN.

BALL'S BRIDGE, a village in the parish of St. Mary, Donnybrook, barony and co. of Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the rivulet Dodder, and on the road from Dublin to Kingstown, a little south of the line of the Kingstown railway, and 1½ mile from Dublin.

castle. The place is more noted as the site of extensive calico-printing works, established by Messrs. Duffy, Byrne, and Hamill, than as the locale of any of those exquisite landscapes or objects of romantic and thrilling interest for which the environs of the metropolis are so justly famed. Area, 33 acres. Pop., in 1841, 484. Houses 59. See DOWNSBROOK.

BALLY, a large boggy district on the north side of the Kenmare river, comprehending most part of the parish of Kilerohane, barony of Dunkerron, co. Kerry, Munster. It extends from the stream of Castlecove to some rocky ground near the Blackwater; though, as seen from a low situation, it looks like a congeries of rocky heights, yet, as seen from a commanding point of view, it appears to be a continuous range of bog; and, according to the details of Mr. Nimmo's survey for its reclamation, it contained, in 1814, a boggy area requiring drainage of 8,997½ English acres. "The principal tract of bog," says Mr. Nimmo, "is a large basin lying at the foot of the mountains, around the head of the harbour of Sneem, and nearly embraced by the two lower ridges of Aska and Dirreenavurrig, which severally divide it from two other smaller basins. Down these hollows flow various clear quick-running streams, which have usually a little green land along their edges. The lower part of the basin is entirely occupied by bog: round the upper edge of it is a narrow zone of patches of cultivation; and above that, a boggy and rocky mountain. The bogs are traversed by numerous narrow ridges of hard rock, forming a succession of long narrow basins, which seem formerly to have been lakes, but are now mostly filled with deep masses of fibrous bog. These bogs subside greatly after drainage, and render it necessary sometimes to crosscut the rock in order to lay their level free. There is little other subsoil than the bare rock, and no calcareous manure of any kind in Bally bog. Shell sand is washed ashore in the western part of it, at the Green Isles and near Cove. It contains 40 per cent. carbonate of lime; and coralline sand, which is nearly pure carbonate, may be had in the bay by dredging." Estimated cost of reclamation, £8,223 18s. 4d.

BALLY, co. Down. See BALLEE.

BALLYADAMS, a barony on the eastern border of Queen's co., Leinster. It is bounded on the west and north-west by the barony of Stradbally; on the north-east and east by co. Kildare; and on the south by the barony of Slievemargy. Its length and breadth are each about 6½ miles; and its area is 24,081 acres. It comprehends the whole of the parishes of Grange and Tecolm, and part of the parishes of Ballyadams, Killabin, Rathaspeck, St. John's of Athy, Tankards-town, and Tullymoy. The barony of Maryborough, in the centre of the county, not only contains more than double its area, but excels it in fertility of soil, wealth of farmers, and beauty or improvement of demesnes. In 1801, the average price of land in Ballyadams was from 14s. to 30s. per acre. Ballylin is the only considerable village. From near Athy to Magency bridge, the river Barrow is the boundary-line with co. Kildare. Pop., in 1831, 8,954; in 1841, 9,172. Houses 1,615. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,218; in manufactures and trade, 215; in other pursuits, 264. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,502; who could read but not write, 824; who could neither read nor write, 1,613. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 806; who could read but not write, 1,193; who could neither read nor write, 1,962.

BALLYADAMS, a parish partly in the barony of Stradbally, but chiefly in that of Ballyadams, Queen's co., Leinster. Length 4 miles; breadth, 2½; area, 6,908 acres,—of which 395 acres are in Stradbally. Pop., in 1831, 2,165; in 1841, 2,051. Houses 374. Pop. of the Stradbally section, in 1831, 62; in 1841, 45. Houses 7. These are the measurements and population of the civil parish; but include those of the two ecclesiastical parishes of Ballyadams and Fonestown. Yet, as the two parishes are even ecclesiastically consolidated into one benefice, and are so blended in all their interests that their very mutual limits cannot be ascertained, they require to be treated, in the whole of their statistics, as if they were one. The village of BALLINTOBER [which see] is within the limits; and in consequence of its being the site of the church, the parishes sometimes associate its name with their own. An old castle, the history of which seems to be lost, gave both the parochial and the baronial name of Ballyadams, and has given it also to a modern mansion. The principal residences are Tallybo, Kellyville, Ballintober, Southfield, Rathgilbert, Popefield, and Heathfield. The water-area comprises 8 acres, 3 roods, 15 perches in the river Barrow, and 14 acres, 3 roods, 26 perches in Lough Kellyville.—Ballyadams and Fonestown are rectories, and jointly constitute the benefice of Ballyadams, in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition and gross income, £437; nett, £407 15s. 4d. Patrons, successively Miss Southwell, C. Maguire, Esq., and — Breerton, Esq. A curate has a stipend of £73. When, or at what cost, the church was built is not known. Sittings 150; attendance 70. The Roman Catholic chapel has 3 officiates, and an attendance of 750. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 139, and the Roman Catholics to 2,029; and 4 daily schools, one of which was aided with £15 a-year from the National Board, had on their books 138 boys and 105 girls.

BALLYAGHRON. See AGHERTON.

BALLYAGRAN, a village in the parish of Corcomohide, barony of Upper Connello, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 133. Houses 20.

BALLYALLY, a lacustrine expansion of the river Fergus, not far from Ennis, barony of Inchiquin, co. Clare, Munster. Area, about 100 acres. In its vicinity is Ballyally-house, the seat of A. Stackpoole, Esq.

BALLYANAN, the quondam residence of Viscount Middleton, near the north-east corner of Cork Harbour, and about 1½ mile from the town of Middleton, co. Cork, Munster. Only a few scattered birches, and some ruinous fragments of gate piers, now indicate, amidst a fine estate, the site of the extinct mansion.

BALLYANE, or BALLYANNE, a parish on the western border of the barony of Bantry and co. Wexford, and 2½ miles north-east of New Ross, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,578 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,096; in 1841, 1,292. Houses 192. The surface is washed on the west, and separated from the county of Kilkenny, by the river Barrow; it is traversed north-north-eastward by the road from New Ross to Dublin; and it consists of good tillage, pasturage, and meadow land. Ballyane-house is the seat of — O'Ferral, Esq. — This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. Mary's, New Ross, in the dio. of Ferns. See ROSS (New). Tithe composition, £243 3s. 6½d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 27, and the Roman Catholics to 1,090; and a school, which was aided with £8 from the National Board, £15 a-year by legacy from Mr. Haughton, and a free house, had on its books 71 boys and 31 girls.

BALLYARTHUR, a splendid demesne in the vale of the Ovoca, 4 miles north-west of Arklow, and a little above the second meeting of the waters, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Though the mansion of Ballyarthur, the seat of E. S. Bayley, Esq., has itself no better attractions than commodiousness and stability, the grounds around it comprehend several of the mountainous elevations which rise from the margin of the Ovoca, and both form and command some of the most superb scenery in Ireland. A terrace a mile in length, runs along the crest of heights behind the house, and reveals almost the whole of the magnificent and lively vale of the Ovoca, with a perspective of alpine country greater in extent and richer in composition than any other point of view brings into combination with the vale. "The Ovoca, increased in its progress by the tributary waters of the Derry," or the Aughrim, "winds round this demesne, in a circular sweep of prodigious boldness; its mountainous banks covered with the rich foliage of the oak. The devious course of the river is here traced through scenes of amazing variety, the valley along which it flows often extending to the width of more than a mile. At the point considered most favourable to a command of prospect, is constructed a small and rustic octangular building, from which nature stands displayed in a degree of beauty and magnificence that dazzles the eye and overpowers the feelings. In a direction towards its rise, the meanders of the Ovoca are enlivened by all the pastoral softness of verdant meadows, and their attendant objects of rural animation, screened by mountains which recede in an infinitude of wavy or broken outlines. Towards the sea, the river pursues a broad but unbroken course through shelving masses of wood which reach towards its brink, or retire from its current in majestic and graceful transitions. The views obtained from this favoured walk are not confined to the charms of the vale, transcendent as are those beauties, and varying at almost every step. Mountains, endless in shape, and sublime in character as the columnar masses of an autumnal sunset, form the distance in some directions; whilst other spreads of remote scenery are profound in apparently interminable ranges of matted wood. The wide sea rolls upon the eye towards the east, and completes this immense congress of the grandest and the softest objects which nature affords in any single display." [Brewer's Beauties of Ireland.]

BALLYBACON, a parish in the barony of West Iffa and Offa, 4 miles east by south of Clogheen, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 5 miles; breadth, 3½; area, 11,120 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,970; in 1841, 3,109. Houses 469. The surface extends northward from the summit of the Knockmeledown mountains to the Suir, and is bisected eastward by the rivulet Tar. The chief summits have altitudes of 1,718, 1,846, 2,101, and 2,609; and the highest of these is Knockmeledown-proper, on the southern boundary. The low grounds are excellent land. The chief seat is Kilgrovy-house. —This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of TURBID [which see], in the dio. of Lismore. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £179 11s. 7½d., and the rectorial for £285 7s. 5d.; and the latter are appropriated to the archdeaconry of Lismore. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 700 to 800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Tulloghmelan. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1 Protestant and 3,125 Roman Catholics; and 2 daily schools, supported by fees, had on their books 100 boys and 83 girls.

BALLYBARRACK, a parish in the barony of Upper Dundalk, 1½ mile south-south-west of the town of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Area, 1,018 acres. Pop., in 1831, 444; in 1841, 301. Houses 50. —This parish is an entirely inappropriate rectory in the dio. of Armagh; and has neither church, glebe-house, nor chapel. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a hedge-school had on its books 45 boys and 15 girls.

BALLYBAY, or BALLIBAY, a parish, partly in the barony of Monaghan, but chiefly in that of Cremourne, co. Monaghan, Ulster. The Cremourne section contains the town of BALLYBAY. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 8,741 acres,—of which 181 acres are in the barony of Monaghan, and 37 acres in the town of Ballybay. Pop., in 1831, 6,685; in 1841, 6,606. Houses 1,138. Pop. of the Monaghan section, in 1831, 114; in 1841, 138. Houses 25. Pop. of the rural districts of the Cremourne section, in 1831, 4,624; in 1841, 4,700. Houses 826. Though the land is cold, wet, and for the most part shallow, its appearance, as to both contour and culture, is greatly superior to that of many a richer district. "The country around Ballibay [town], though intersected with a good deal of bog and marsh," says Mr. Fraser, "is agreeably varied by the waving surface, the bold hills, and numerous small lakes which are scattered around. The bleached greens, with the villas of the proprietors, the neat farm-houses, better tillage, and the comfortable state of the cottagers, generally considered, as compared with other parts of the country, add much to the appearance of this interesting district." Much of the soil is what Sir Charles Cootes calls "gritty, with much red ochre, and great indications of copper and iron." "The country, at either side of the road toward Carrickmacross," says Sir Charles, "is happily situate for ornamental improvement, having picturesque streams and beautiful glens, and some partial spots of meadow in their banks which have a rich verdure; but those spots are but partial, as, for a considerable distance, the greater part has but a shallow soil, covering a flaggy rotten quarry, not 6 inches from the surface." A cordon of lakes and loughlets half surrounds the town; and on the banks of one of these, called Lough Major, stands, amidst extensive woods, the modern handsome mansion of Ballybay-house, the seat of A. French, Esq., the proprietor of the town and circumjacent estate. The parish is traversed southward by the road from Monaghan to Carrickmacross, and westward by that from Castleblaney to Cootehill. —This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Clogher. Tithe composition, £388 5s. Gross income, £431 5s.; nett, £356 13s. 9d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1798, at an unascertained cost, and enlarged in 1823 by means of a loan of £461 10s. 9½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings about 500; attendance 220. Three meeting-houses—two of which, we believe the third also, are Presbyterian—have attendances of respectively 200, 200, and 350. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Ballybay and Ballintraub, are included in one parochial division, and attended by respectively 230 and 600. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 1,426 Churchmen, 2,006 Presbyterians, and 3,163 Roman Catholics; 2 Sunday schools of the General Sunday School Society, had on their books 98 boys and 88 girls; and 10 daily schools, 3 of which were guaranteed salaries of respectively £20, £50, and £75, by a committee of management, while another was aided by the London Hibernian Society, had on their books 294 boys and 189 girls.

The town of BALLYBAY stands in the Cremourne section of the parish, at the intersection of the two principal roads which traverse the parish, 5 miles west by north of Castleblaney, 7½ south of Monaghan, 11 north-north-west of Carrickmacross, and 51 north-north-west of Dublin. Sir Charles Cootes, describing it in 1801, says, "The town of Ballibeg of late years, since the establishment of its linen market, is greatly improved; and several new houses are building, two stories high and slated. There is also a market-house; and the weekly market is held on Saturdays. * * Before these new houses were erected, this town must have had a very miserable appearance, as all the old houses are falling to pieces, and threaten destruction to passengers." As it now exists, the town, aggregately viewed, is comparatively well-built and laid out, and contains a fair proportion of good houses. Its progress in population, general trade, and provincial influence, has been both considerable and rapid. In its neighbourhood are the extensive bleach-works and mills of Crieve; and all around it, as well as within itself, are the numerous appliances of a large aggregate of linen manufacture. At its weekly markets are sold great numbers of linen webs, a large quantity of flax, and the surplus produce of the farm and the dairy over a wide extent of circumjacent country. Fairs are held on Jan. 1, Thursday before Easter, July 5, and Oct. 2; and are well attended for the sale and purchase of horses, horned cattle, and pigs. Yet, in spite of all its trade, the town does not seem to have either a banking-office, or a stated public conveyance. The streets are clean and orderly. The church and one of the Presbyterian meeting-houses are neat structures. A public library contains nearly 1,000 volumes. A dispensary in the town is within the Castleblaney Poor-law union, and has a district of 20,000 acres, with 12,500 inhabitants; and in 1839-40, it received £150, expended £128 18s., and administered to 1,600 patients. A presbytery of the General Assembly has its seat in the town; inspects 11 congregations; and meets on the 2d Tuesday of May, and the 1st Tuesday of Feb., Aug., and Oct. Pop., in 1831, 1,947; in 1841, 1,768. Houses 287.

BALLYBEG, the oldest and most extensive tree nursery in Ireland, in the neighbourhood of the hill of Allanstown, a few miles from Navan, on the road thence to Dublin. See ALLANSTOWN.

BALLYBEG, a village on the eastern border of the barony of Eliogurty, 3½ miles south-east of Thurles, on the road thence to Killenaule, co. Tipperary, Munster. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYBEG, an ecclesiastical parish in the barony of Orrery and Kilmore, about 1 mile south-east of Buttevant, and 4 miles west by south of Doneraile, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 2,085 acres. Pop. not specially returned. It seems to be included, by the civil arrangement, in the parish of Buttevant. The surface is ploughed, in one line, by a romantic rocky ravine, known as Ballybeg Glen; consists elsewhere of good tillage and pasture land; and is traversed southward by the road from Buttevant to Mallow. At the base of a rising ground which is crowned with a beautiful grove of fir, stands the neat mansion of Springfield, long the seat of the family of Norcot. At the opening of Ballybeg Glen, are the ruins of a priory of canons regular of the order of Augustine. The monastery was founded, in 1237, by Philip de Barry; it was endowed partly by him, and partly by his son David, the founder of the friary of Buttevant; and, at the dissolution, it was granted to Sir Daniel Norton, in trust for the lady of Sir Thomas Norris, Lord-president of Munster. Its lands comprised 2,060 Irish acres, yet were valued, in 1622, at only £60 a-year; and its additional tithes and glebes were, at the same time, valued at £200 a-year. Though the ruins indicate the edifice to have been a large and magnificent structure, they do not now present any feature of architectural beauty. In the church stood an equestrian brazen statue of the founder; and in the vicinity still stands the stump of an ancient round tower. "Adjoining Ballybeg Abbey," says Mr. Croker, "is a large field called the Pigeon Field; in digging which, some years since, a vault was discovered 'lined with images.' The person from whom I received the information added, that these images 'being handy to the road,' were broken up and thrown thereon to repair it. In 1815, the landlady of the inn at Buttevant gave me an account of a curious discovery made at Ballybeg Abbey, about 25 years back, by a blacksmith named Supple, who was induced, from a dream, to dig amongst the ruins, in search of money,—a superstition so prevalent with the lower order of the Irish, as to cause them, like the Arabs, to excavate near almost every ancient building, in expectation of finding concealed treasure. Supple, after some laborious days spent in disturbing the bones of the old fathers, came to a stone-coffin containing a skeleton adorned with a cross and chains of gold, and a thin plate of the same precious metal stamped with a representation of the crucifixion. These relics were carried by the finder to Cork, and disposed of to a goldsmith, by whom they were consigned to the crucible; and the stone-coffin converted to a pig-trough at the cabin of a farmer near the abbey. The accuracy of this narrative has been corroborated by a son of Supple's, whom I met accidentally, and entered into conversation with on the spot." If this story be otherwise correct, Supple very probably sought and found the treasure from sheer avaricious research, and afterwards invented 'the dream' by way of embellishment.—Ballybeg is a perpetual curacy, and part of the benefice of BUTTEVANT [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. The tithes, jointly with those of Buttevant, are compounded for £962 10s., are wholly inappropriate, and belong to — Oliver, Esq., who allows a trifling sum to the incumbent of Buttevant as perpetual curate. Other statistics are mixed up with those of Buttevant.

BALLYBEGGAN, a quondam castle of stately proportions, in the parish of Tralee, barony of Trughenackmy, co. Kerry, Munster. The castle was a strong post in the wars between William III. and James II., and was then reduced. Only a fragmentary ruin of it now remains.

BALLYBENNAN, a chapelry within the parish of Fennagh, dio. of Leighlin, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ¾. Yet, though nominally included in the parish, it has not, within the memory of any living person, been attached to the benefice. See FENNAGH.

BALLYBODIN, a village in the parish of Whitechurch, barony of Rathdown, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area, 2 acres. Pop., in 1841, 252. Houses 46.

BALLYBOFEY, or BALLYBOPHAY, a small market-town, in the parish of Stranorlar, barony of Raphoe, co. Donegal, Ulster. It stands on the river Finn, and on the road from Dublin to Glenties, half-a-mile west of Stranorlar, and 11½ west by south of Strabane. The town, though quite distinct from Stranorlar, and popularly regarded as subordinate to it, is virtually the seat of trade for both Stranorlar and itself, and actually the place where the nominal markets are held, and whence retail supplies of miscellaneous goods are sent athwart the surrounding mountain district. Though well suited for markets and retail trade, and the only towns which command the vast expanse of adjacent Highlands, both Ballybofey and Stranorlar—particularly the former—have been allowed to sink into a dilapidated condition, and seem to experience no encouragement from their proprietors. Fairs are held on May 21 and Dec. 24. Area of the town, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 874; in 1841, 782. Houses 134.

BALLYBOG, a morassy district on the Kenmare river in Kerry: see BALLY.

BALLYBOG, a Roman Catholic parish, taking name from the above district, and belonging to the dio. of Kerry. Post-town, Kenmare. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

BALLYBOGGAN, a parish in the barony of Upper Moyfenragh, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west of Clonard, co. Meath, Leinster. Area, 6,222 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,477; in 1841, 1,430. Houses 221. About three-fourths of the land are good, and one-fourth inferior. The surface is washed on the east, and separated from eo. Kildare by the river Boyne; and is traversed southward by the road from Clonard to Philipstown. In the 12th century, a priory for Augustinian canons was founded in the parish by Jordan Comin; in the 19th year of Henry VIII., it was surrendered by Thomas Bermingham, the last prior; and, in the following year, a crucifix which had belonged to it, and been held in great veneration, was publicly burnt. Some remains of the priory buildings still exist on the banks of the Boyne. A fair is held on Sept. 25.—This parish and that of Castlejordan, constitute the perpetual curacy and the benefice of Castlejordan, in the dio. of Meath. See CASTLEJORDAN. The tithes of Ballyboggan have been compounded for £220; and they are wholly inappropriate, and belong to five co-heiresses, daughters of the late Sir Duke Giffard. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 95, and the Roman Catholics to 1,431; and 2 hedge-schools at Knoekabrew and Killiskillen, had on their books 79 boys and 11 girls.

BALLYBOGHILL, a parish in the barony of West Balrothery, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Swords, co. Dublin, Leinster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,789 acres. Pop., in 1831, 664; in 1841, 595. Houses 94. The surface entirely consists of profitable land in either tillage or pasture, and is traversed northward by the road from Swords to Drogheda. Within the parish is a village of its own name. Pop., in 1831, 144. "The name," says Gorton, who however inserts the alias of Ballybachall, "is derived a boculo Sancti Patricii, and the townland was granted, together with the abbey, in 1180, to St. Mary's abbey in Dublin, by Gilbert O'Caran, primate of all Ireland. The ruins of the abbey still remain, and the cemetery is held in veneration." How we topographers require to rub our eyes in order to keep ourselves from dreaming!—Ballyboghill parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of CLONMETHAN [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £134 15s., and the rectorial for £141; and the latter are improriate, and belong to the Crown. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 750; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is grouped with two chapels in the benefice of Holywood. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 14, and the Roman Catholics to 651; and 2 small private schools had an average daily attendance of 31 children. In 1840, two schools, male and female, in the village, had on their books 61 boys and 71 girls, and were salaried with respectively £12 and £6 from the National Board.

BALLYBOR. See BALLYBUR.

BALLYBORRIS, parish of Clonagoose, barony of Idrone-East, co. Carlow, Leinster. See BORRIS.

BALLYBOT. See NEWRY.

BALLYBOUGH, or TOLKA (THE), a rivulet of the counties Meath and Dublin, Leinster. It issues from a loughlet about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-east of Dunshaughlin in the Meath barony of Ratoath; runs $5\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-eastward, through Ratoath and Dunboyne, to a point near the boundary between Meath and Dublin, and now assuming a direction of east by south, it soon passes into Dublin, and runs through Castleknock, and along the southern boundary of Coolock to Dublin bay at Clontarf. Its entire length of run is between 14 and 15 miles, and it possesses volume and current sufficient only to drive a few mills.

BALLYBOUGH, a village in the parish of Clontarf, barony of Coolock, co. Dublin, Leinster. It stands on the north side of the small estuary of the Ballybough rivulet, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north-east of Dublin-castle. The place is noticeable chiefly as the site of a vitriol manufactory, and of a Jewish cemetery. Area, 112 acres. Pop., in 1841, 1,074. Houses 159. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 55; in manufactures and trade, 49; in other pursuits, 116.

BALLYBOUGHT, a parish, formerly in the barony of Uppercross, co. Dublin, but now in the barony of South Naas, co. Kildare, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-west by south of Blessington, Leinster. The transference was made by Act of 6 and 7 William IV., c. 84, s. 51. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 9 furlongs; area, 1,441 acres. Pop., in 1831, 207; in 1841, 265. Houses 35. The land is of a light quality.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of BALLYMORE-EUSTACE [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £29 4s. 4d., and the rectorial for £11 18s. 9d.; and the latter are appropriated to the treasurerhip of St. Patrick's cathedral, Dublin. The Roman Catholics within the parish, in 1834, were 207, and appear to have been the only inhabitants. There is neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLYBOURKE, a village on the western frontier of the barony of Carra, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the river Ayle, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Westport. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYBOY, a barony on the south-eastern border of King's co., Leinster. It is bounded on the north by Ballycowen; on the east by Geshil; on the south by Queen's co., Ballybrit, and Fircol; and on the west by Fircol and Garrycastle. Its greatest length in the direction of west by north is $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 7 miles; and its area is 32,407 acres. Its only parishes are Ballyboy and Killough; and its chief towns and villages are Frankford, Ballyboy, and Mount-Bolus. Lough Annagh lies partly within the south-east corner; and the Silver river traces much of the southern and western boundary. See ANNAGH AND SILVER. Sir Charles Cootes, describing the barony in 1801, says, "This country has a wild uncultivated appearance; its miserable system of agriculture, exhausted soil, and every general subject relating to it, in a deplorably ruinous state; and its wretchedness can be easily accounted for by the enormous quantity of glebe-land it possesses,—that of one parish alone amounts to 1,800 acres." The cultivators of the soil, he adds, "use invariably a wretched two-horse plough, which rather scrapes than tills the soil; and their farms are but of inconsiderable extent; the poorer class have but two acres which they always divide between their oats and potatoes, and a constant succession of each is their only course of crops. Bog stuff is first spread on the surface, and afterwards thinly covered with scrapings of dung, clay, and road-stuff, and promises but very poorly." Pop., in 1831, 8,154; in 1841, 9,174. Houses 1,567. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,346; in manufactures and trade, 180; in other pursuits, 171. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,557; who could read but not write, 674; who could neither read nor write, 1,799. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 774; who could read but not write, 1,016; who could neither read nor write, 2,272.

BALLYBOY, a parish, constituting the southwestern division of the barony of Ballyboy, King's co., Leinster. It contains the villages of BALLYBOY and FRANKFORD. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 14,274 acres, 38 perches,—of which 89 acres, 3 roods, 38 perches, are in Lough Boora. Pop., in 1831, 4,135; in 1841, 4,753. Houses 811. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 2,650; in 1841, 3,000. Houses 515. The road from Dublin to Birr traverses the northern district. Mr. Fraser, speaking of the country on both sides of that road within the parish, but noticing some objects which lie beyond the parochial limits, says, "Passing through the dreary boggy tract, in which the remains of several square piles called Castles may be traced, we reach the small town of Frankford: a little to the left of which are the hill of Knock, village of Ballyboy, and Songstown, — Drought, Esq.; and on the right, Broughall-castle, the residence of N. Fitzsimmons, Esq., M.P. The stream called the Silver river runs through the village of Ballyboy and the town of Frankford, in its progress to the Bowna." The chief residences within the parish are Derrinboy, Lelagh, Laughill, Williamsfort, Annaghville, Temra, Spring-garden, Colinstown, Greenhill, Barnaby, Ridgemount, Ballywilliam, and Broughal. Ballyboy village stands 9½ miles north-east of Birr, and 56 west-south-west of Dublin. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 373; in 1841, 348. Houses 71. It has a patent for a weekly market on Saturday, and for a fair or market on the first day of each month, from May to Nov.; but its markets exist only on paper. The village has a poor and mean appearance.—Ballyboy parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of FIRCAL [which see], in the dio. of Meath. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £81 4s. 7½d., and the rectorial for £146 4s. 3½d., and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the Marquis of Downshire. The glebe lands comprise 54 acres, 2 roods, 14 perches, statute measure, or 367 acres, 0 roods, 11 perches, plantation measure, and are valued at 17s. 6d. per plantation acre. The church was built about 1815, by means of a loan of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance 140. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 2,000; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Killoughy. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 369, and the Roman Catholics to 3,970; 7 daily schools had on their books 117 boys and 105 girls; and 2 other daily schools were attended by from 86 to 108 children. Five of the schools were in Frankford, and supported wholly by fees; one at Ballyboy had £8 a-year from the National Board, and £6 from the Marquis of Lansdowne; one was parochial, and had £10 a-year from the vicar; and one at Castlewood was supported wholly by Mr. Fitzsimon for the benefit of his tenants. In 1840, the National Board aided not only the school at Ballyboy, but one at Broughal.

BALLYBOYS, a parish in the barony of Lower Dundalk, 3 miles east-north-east of the town of Dundalk, co. Louth, Leinster. Area, 1,436 acres. Pop., in 1841, 748. Houses 120. It lies on the north side and near the head of Dundalk bay, and is enriched with the plantations of Balluragan-park, the demesne of Mr. Topping. The ecclesiastical arrangement does not assign it a parochial status, but regards it as part of the parish of BALLYNASCANLAN: which see.

BALLYBRACK, a village in the parish of Rossmere, and on the northern frontier of the barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. Post-town, Kilmathoma. Pop., in 1831, 165.

BALLYBRACKEN. See KILBRACKEN.

BALLYBRAZIL, or BALLYBRASSIL, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Shelbourne, and ¼ miles south-east of New Ross, co. Wexford, Leinster. Area, 2,371 acres. Pop., in 1831, 384; in 1841, 567. Houses 84. The surface is drained by the stream which enters Banno harbour at Clonmines, and consists of good tillage and pasture land.—This parish is an inappropriate curacy in the benefice of St. Mary's, New Ross, and dio. of Ferns. See ROSS (NEW). The tithes are compounded for £100, and belong to the Marquis of Ely. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 21, and the Roman Catholics to 370; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLYBRENNAN, a parish in the barony of Forth, 5 miles south-south-east of Wexford, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 1 mile; breadth, ¾; area, 1,041 acres. Pop., in 1831, 260; in 1841, 260. Houses 40. The surface extends along the south shore of Wexford harbour, from a point within 1½ mile of the commencement of the long peninsula which projects between the southern expansion of the harbour and the sea; and it consists, for the most part, of land above average quality.—This parish is a rectory in the dio. of Ferns. It formerly constituted part of the benefice of Wexford; but, in 1832, it was made a separate benefice. Tithe composition and gross income, £71; nett, £65 12s. 5½d. Patron, the diocesan. Yet, though a separate benefice, it is held by the stipendiary curate of Wexford union. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 24, and the Roman Catholics to 227; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLYBRICKEN, or CAHIRELLY, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Clanwilliam, and ¾ of a mile north-east of Six-mile-Bridge, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 2,719 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,346; in 1841, 1,329. Houses 201. The surface consists of excellent land, and is drained westward, along the southern boundary, by a chief affluent of the Maig. Fairs are held on May 14, Aug. 26, and Nov. 6.—This parish is a vicarage and a separate benefice in the dio. of Emly. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £50, and the rectorial for £90; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Mr. Jephson of Limerick. Gross income, £72 1s. 10½d.; nett, £67 9s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The vicar is non-resident; and the rector of the adjoining parish of Cahircorney performs the occasional duties. There is no church. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of about 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Carigparson. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 12, and the Roman Catholics to 1,390; and a pay daily school had on its books 47 boys and 15 girls. In 1839, the National Board granted £79 10s. toward the building and fitting up of a boys' school and a girls' school.

BALLYBRIT, a barony in King's co., Leinster. It is bounded on the north by the barony of Fircl; on the east by Queen's co.; on the south by co. Tipperary and the barony of Clonlisk; and on the west by co. Tipperary. Its greatest length, in the direction of south-east by east, is 10½ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 9½ miles; and its area is 53,994 acres. It contains part of the parishes of Aghancon, Corbally, Ettagh, Killecoleman, and Roscrea, and the whole of the parishes of Birr, Kinnity, Litter, Roscomroe, and Seirkyran; and its chief towns and villages are Birr, Crinkle, and Kinnity. The summit-line of the Slievebloom mountains, forming the division between the river systems of the Shannon and the Nore, extends along the boundary with Queen's co. Much of the barony's surface is, in consequence, upland or pastoral; and all of it has a prevailingly westward declination. Most of the soil is either a light gravel or a stiff clay. The pasture, with the exception of improved parks in the vicinity of mansions, is every where light, and suitable chiefly to be disposed in sheep-walk. The farms are numerous more or less pastoral, and vary in extent from 10 acres to upwards of 100. Pop., in 1831, 18,779; in 1841, 19,460. Houses 3,188. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,733; in manufactures and trade, 730; in other pursuits, 1,193. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,740; who could read but not write, 1,273; who could neither read nor write, 3,155. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 2,389; who could read but not write, 2,356; who could neither read nor write, 4,132.

BALLYBRITTAS, a small post-village in the parish of Lea, barony of Portnebhinch, Queen's co., Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Limerick, 2 miles north-east of Emo, 3 south-west of Monastererev, and 33 south-west by west of Dublin. In a field contiguous to it stood a castle or large mansion, which belonged to the O'Dempseys, lords of Clanmalliere, and which was destroyed by Oliver Cromwell. In the vicinity are the mansions of Ballybrittas, the Rev. Dean Trench; Rath, Thomas Trench, Esq.; and Bellegrave, George Adair, Esq. A dispensary in the village is within the Mountmellick Poor-law union, and has a district containing 4,963 inhabitants; and, in 1839, it received £83 11s., expended £84 1s., and administered to 1,483 patients. Area of the village, 7 acres. Pop., in 1831, 168; in 1841, 136. Houses 24.

BALLYBRITTON, a hamlet in the barony of Coolestown, King's co., Leinster. It stands on the banks of the Grand Canal, not far from Edenderry. In its vicinity are the ruins of Ballybritton-castle.

BALLYBROMMELL, a village in the parish of Fennagh, barony of East Idrone, co. Carlow, Leinster. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 166. Houses 33.

BALLYBROOD, a parish in the south-east corner of the barony of Clanwilliam, and 4 miles north-east of Six-mile-Bridge, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,355 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,120; in 1841, 1,121. Houses 166. Excepting a small portion of bog, all the land is profitable, and is disposed in arable grounds and pasturage. The surface is drained westward, along the southern boundary, by one of the affluents of the Maig; and traversed southward by the road from Abington to Balcrooney. Fairs, toll free, are held on June 12, and Oct. 13.—Ballybrood is a rectory in the dio. of Emly. Tithe composition, £150. This rectory, the rectories of KILTEELY, AGLISHCORMICK, and RATH-JORDAN, and the vicarage of ISERTLAURENCE [see these articles], constitute the benefice of Ballybrood, and corps of the precentorship of Emly cathedral. Length, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$. Pop., in 1831, 4,973. Gross income, £870 7s. 7d.; nett, £641 6s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in Ballybrood, and was built in 1807, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, from 12 to 15. The Roman Catholic chapels within the union, are in Kiltelly and Isertlaurence. In 1834, the Protestants, both of the parish and of the union, amounted to 26, the Roman Catholics of the parish to 1,141, and the Roman Catholics of the union to 5,154; and 4 daily schools in Kiltelly, Isertlaurence, and Aglishcormick, had on their books 169 boys and 147 girls.

BALLYBUNIAN, a village and celebrated caves, in the sea-board parish of Killeheney, barony of Iraghticonnor, co. Kerry, Munster. The village stands on the coast of the estuary of the Shannon, about 2 miles north by east of the mouth of the Cashen river, $10\frac{1}{2}$ north-east by east of Kerry Head, 9 west-south-west of Tarbert, and 136 south-west by west of Dublin. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 271. Houses 35. Previous to the introduction of steamers on the Lower Shannon, the village, in spite of the splendid attractions of the scenery which it commands, and of the wondrous natural curiosities in its vicinity, was little known and rarely visited; but it has of late years become at once a considerable sea-bathing resort, a temporary retreat of virtuosi, and a favourite post of observation to tourists. In 1837, it numbered 96 very fine lodges, besides boarding-houses, and miscellaneous accommodations for both the native and the stranger; and in 1838, Mr. Fraser says respecting it, "The village of Ballybunian has of late been much improved. There is now a tolerably good inn, and the celebrity of the caves, together with the strong sea and smooth strand, induce bathers from all quarters during the summer season." Various vantage-grounds in its vicinity, and particularly the bluff points and headlands of the coast, command a minute and thrilling view of the debouch of the Shannon to the ocean, a long expanse of that monarch river's brilliant estuary, and the intricate and many-featured coast which flanks it in Clare, from Loop Head far into the interior. The caves of Ballybunian are the most curious and interesting of the various phenomena which challenge attention or inspire wonder and admiration in the wild and romantic districts of the island. "They are situated," says Mr. Fraser, "on the Kerry side of the mouth of the Shannon, between the small estuary of the Cashen and Kilcunly Point; and although there is nothing very striking in the cliffs, or in the vast accumulations of sand along the shores, there is, in the endlessly varied and labyrinthine forms of the caves of Ballybunian, apart from all scientific considerations which relate to the great formations of the inorganic world, what will amply repay those who, in addition to a love of marine scenery, can join in contemplating the wonderful and singular effects produced along the coast, according to the nature of the strata, against which the ceaseless ocean rolls its mighty waters." An old historian, who was not so blinded by the blood of battles and the dust of whirling events as to want an eye for the calmly silent but majestic and glorious works of the Creator, cursorily yet pithily remarks, "The whole shore here hath a variety of romantic caves and caverns, formed by the dashing of the waves; in some places are high open arches, and in others impending rocks, ready to tumble down upon the first storm." A description of the caves cannot be attempted in a necessarily very limited article,—it demands a volume,—and it has obtained one. The reader, if he would be acquainted with them, must consult this, published in 1834 by William Ainsworth, Esq.; and may accept one brief extract as a specimen of at once the book and its subject: "The cliffs of Ballybunian are even less remarkable for their dimensions, than they are for the singular form of rocks, which seem as if carved by the hand of man; and, independently of the lofty mural precipices, whose angular proportions present every variety of arrangement, as in Smuggler's bay, where they oftentimes are semicircularly arranged, like the grain-work of an arch, or the tablets or small strings running round a window, or are piled above one another in regular succession, presenting a geological phenomenon of great grandeur and magnificence; they have also other distinct beauties, which originate frequently in similar causes."

BALLYBUR, or BALLYBOR, a small parish in the barony of Shillelogher, and about $\frac{3}{4}$ miles from Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Munster. Area, 667 acres. Pop., in 1831, 237; in 1841, 200. Houses 35. It is a rectory in the dio. of Ossory; forms part of the benefice of St. Canice; and is appropriated to the dean and chapter of St. Canice's cathedral. Though ecclesiastically united to St. Canice, it is geographically separated from that parish, by the intervention of Óutrath, and St. Patrick, and part of Grange. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLYBURLEY, or PRIMULT and COOLCON, an united parish, partly in the barony of Warrenstown, and partly in that of Lower Philipstown, King's co., Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$; area, 7,868 acres,—of which 5,433 acres are in Warrenstown. Pop., in 1831, 1,672; in 1841, 1,621. Houses 251. Pop. of the Warrenstown section, in 1831, 886; in 1841, 861. Houses 128. Pop. of the Philipstown section, in 1831, 786; in 1841, 760. Houses 123. The land is in general good, fertile, and well-cultivated. Ballyburley-house is the seat of John Wakely, Esq. Within the Lower Philipstown section stands the hamlet of RHODE; which see. The post-town, Elenderry, is situated $\frac{3}{4}$ miles to the north-east.—The two parishes are so thoroughly consolidated that their ecclesiastical as well as their civil statistics cannot be separately stated. They are rectories, and jointly constitute the benefice of Ballyburley or Primult, in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition and gross income, £285; nett, £236 3s. 11d. Patron, John Wakely, Esq., of Ballyburley. The church was built, in 1680, by an ancestor of the Wakely family. Sittings 120; attendance 80. The Roman Catholic chapel has 3 officiates, and an attendance of 1,450. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 161 Churchmen, 2 Protestant dissenters, and 1,560 Roman Catholics; and a daily school, aided with £25 a-year of contributions from the parishioners, had on its books 18 boys and 18 girls.

BALLYCAHANE, a parish, partly in the barony of Small County, but chiefly in that of Pubblebrien, and 3 miles north by east of Croom, co. Limerick, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1; area, 3,738 acres,—of which 638 acres are in Small County. Pop., in 1831, 1,242; in 1841, 1,196. Houses 180. Pop. of the Small County section, in 1831, 252; in 1841, 225. Houses 32. It lies within the basin, and about $\frac{1}{2}$ miles east of the Maig. The land is in some parts somewhat wet and heavy; but in general it forms good arable and pasture ground. In the vicinity of Tory Hill are some remains of a church which belonged to the Knights Templars, and also a small lake, which figures in some curious local traditions; and in the neighbourhood of the parish-church are the ruins of Ballycahane-castle, which was built near the close of the 15th century by the O'Grady family.—This parish is a rectory, prebend, and separate benefice, in the dio. of Limerick. Tithe composition, £106 3s. 0½d. Gross income, £178 13s. 0½d.; nett, £138 7s. 9½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built, in 1827, by means of a gift of £830 15s. 4½d. from the late Baron of First Fruits. Sittings 100; attendance, about 12. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 26, and the Roman Catholics to 1,251; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 44 boys and 29 girls.

BALLYCAHILL, a parish 3 miles west of Thurles, and partly in the barony of Upper Kilmannagh, but chiefly in that of Eliogurty, co. Tipperary, Munster. Area, 3,844 acres,—of which 2,495 acres are in Eliogurty. Pop., in 1831, 1,818; in 1841, 1,903. Houses 279. Pop. of the Eliogurty section, in 1831, 1,245; in 1841, 1,413. Houses 209. The Eliogurty section contains the hamlet of Ballycahill. Pop., in 1831, 39. Houses 5. The chief object of interest is the splendid mansion of CASTLE-FOGARTY; which see. Two other residences are Ballycahill and Roskeen. The rivulet Clodagh flows on the western boundary.—This parish is in the dio. of Cashel, and is wholly inappropriate. The curate of Holycross receives a stipend for the performance of occasional duties; and the Protestant parishioners attend the churches of Holycross and Moyalliffe. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of between 600 and 700; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Holycross. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 9, and the Roman Catholics to 1,004; and 3 pay daily schools had on their books 155 children.

BALLYCALLEN, a parish on the southern border of the barony of Cranagh, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles west-south-west of Kilkenny, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,835 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,807; in 1841, 1,778. Houses 272. The land, with some few exceptions, is exceedingly good.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CALLAN [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Tithe composition, £413 3s. 1½d. The church was built about 75 years ago, chiefly by means of parochial assessment. Sittings 80; attendance 14. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 600 at each of two services; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilmanagh. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 38, and the Roman Catholics to 1,826; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 225 boys and 116 girls.

BALLYCAM, a small bay near Killough, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. Under a hill, at its extremity, is a beautiful stalactitic grotto, with a well at its bottom, 7 feet deep, intensely cold, of unvarying temperature, and perpetually fed by the oozing of water through a vein of limestone in the roof of the cave.

BALLYCANEW, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Gorey, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length and breadth, each $\frac{1}{2}$ mile; area, 3,628 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,168; in 1841, 1,275. Houses 209. The surface is traversed southward by the road from Gorey to Wexford bridge; drained northward, along the eastern boundary, by the Awin-Banna river; and consists partly of light and hilly soil, but chiefly of good land. The village stands on the principal road, 4 miles south of Gorey, and has a mean appearance. Fairs are held on April 23, July 25, Sept. 21, Oct. 2, and Nov. 30. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1831, 345; in 1841, 370. Houses 61.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LESKINFERE [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Tithe composition, £192. The church stands $\frac{1}{2}$ miles distant from that of Leskinfere; is served by a curate, who has a stipend of £69 4s. 7½d.; and is so old a building that the date and cost of its erection are unknown. Sittings 250; attendance 200. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 339, and the Roman Catholics to 851; and 2 daily schools, one of which was aided with £5 a-year from the rector, and £7 from the Association for Discountenancing Vice, had on their books 33 boys and 23 girls.

BALLYCARANEY, BALLYCARRANE, BALLYCURRANT, or BALLYCRANE, a parish in the barony of Barrymore, 8 miles south-south-east of Rathcor-muck, and about 3 north of the shore of Cork Har-bour, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,939 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,036; in 1841, 1,180. Houses 184. The surface is comparatively upland, and has a southward declination. A principal seat is Lemlara, the property of Garret S. Barry, Esq.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of Lisacool [which see], in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £184 12s. 3d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 19, and the Roman Catholics to 1,050; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLYCARBERG, an ancient castle on the river Tartin, 2½ miles north-west of Cabirciveen, and in the parish of Cahir, barony of Iveragh, co. Kerry, Munster. Who the founder was is not known. A large fleur-de-lis is carved on a stone in its interior.

BALLYCARNEY, a village and a parish in the barony of Scarawalsh, and on the banks of the Slaney, co. Wexford, Leinster. The village is situated 5 miles west by south of Ferns, and formerly belonged to Ferns parish. Pop. not specially returned. Fairs are held on March 16, and May 26.—The parish has the village for its centre; and was originally a mere ecclesiastical district, comprising portions of the parishes of Ferns, Templeshambo, and Newtownbarry. Area, 8,234 acres. Pop., in 1841, 2,045. Houses 339. It is a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Ferns. Gross income, £70; nett, £50. Patrons, the incumbents of the quoad civilia parishes, out of which it was formed. The church was built, in 1834, by means of a gift of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 140.

BALLYCAROGUE, or BALLYKEEROGE, a village in the parish of Kilrossanty, barony of Decies-without-Drum, co. Waterford, Munster. Pop. not specially returned. A fair is held on Oct. 2. "At Ballycarogue," says Dr. Smith, "are the remains of a castle, which formerly belonged to the family of the Walshes. In an adjacent brook to the west, the country people show a large rock, as big as an ordinary house, which they call Clough Lowrish, i. e., 'the speaking-house,' and relate a fabulous account of its speaking, at a certain time, in contradiction to a person who swore by it in a lie. The stone is remarkably split from top to bottom; which, they tell you, was done at the time of taking the above-mentioned oath."

BALLYCARRY, a village in the parish of Templecorran, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on the road from Carrickfergus to Larne, near the west shore of Lough Larne, opposite the south end of Island-Magee, 4½ miles north-north-east of Carrickfergus. Its site is on the estate of RED-HALL: which see. Its houses are arranged in a single street of no great length; and its position is too high, and too far from springs, to be advantageous. Fairs are held on June 1, second Friday of Aug. O. S., and Oct. 31. Area of the village, 22 acres. Pop., in 1831, 247; in 1841, 236. Houses 51. In the vicinity is the beautiful demesne of BELLA-HILL: which see.

BALLYCASHIN, a parish in the barony of Middlethird, about half-a-mile from the site of the old church at Kilburne, co. Waterford, Munster. Its statistics are all included in those of KILRONAN: which see. Its tithes belong to the chantership, and about 250 acres of its land to the deanery of Waterford cathedral.

BALLYCASHLAIN. See BALLYCASTLE,—the town.

BALLYCASSIDY (THE), a rivulet of the counties of Tyrone and Fermanagh, Ulster. It rises near Dromore, in the barony of Omagh; runs 7½ miles south-south-westward to the county boundary-line; and then runs 5 miles, partly between Tyrone and Fermanagh, partly across the barony of Tyrkenney, and partly between that barony and Lurg, to Lough Erne, at a point 5 miles north of Enniskillen. The stream, near its insculation with the lake, drives some extensive flour-mills, and is crossed by a bridge carrying over the road from Dublin and Enniskillen, to Donegal.

BALLYCASSIDY, a hamlet near the mouth of the above stream, 5 miles north of Enniskillen. A canal, projected some years ago from Lough Foyle to Lough Erne, has its western terminus at the village. Several curious and beautiful caves, called the Daughters, one of them 30 feet high at the entrance, occur in the limestone rock of the vicinity. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYCASTLE, a creek or small natural harbour, and a confluence of rivulets, at the town of Ballycastle, on the north coast of the barony of Carey, co. Antrim. The harbour will be noticed in connection with the town. The chief rivulets are one of 3 miles in length of run from the south-west; the Glenshesk, 5 miles long, from the south; and the Carey, 7½ miles long from the south-east. All these empty themselves by a common embouchure into Ballycastle; but they are not navigable, and are, to but an inconsiderable extent, tidal. Salmon swim up the rivulets to spawn; and the salmon fisheries are all private property, and understood to have been conferred by patent through the Antrim family from the Crown, and to extend coast-wise to the bays within headlands whose exact limits are not ascertained.

BALLYCASTLE, a chapelry round Ballycastle bay, and containing the town of Ballycastle, within the parish of Ramoan, barony of Carey, co. Antrim, Ulster. Though nominally a chapelry without cure, the chaplain has always had the sole charge of the congregation of the chapel. Most of its statistics are included in those of Ramoan, dio. of Connor. Gross income, £56 8s. 5d.; nett, £25 8s. 5d. Patron, Hugh Boyd, Esq., a ward in chancery. A portion of the income, amounting to £36 18s. 5d., and all charges for repairs on the chapel, communion elements, &c., are paid by the agent of the Boyd estate. The chapel was built, in 1754, by the late Col. Hugh Boyd, at a cost, all defrayed by himself, of £2,769 4s. 7d. Sittings 300; attendance 204. Ballycastle is also a Roman Catholic parish, containing two chapels, under the care of one officiate. For a notice of these chapels, of Protestant dissenters' meeting-houses, and of schools, see article RAMOAN.

BALLYCASTLE, a post, market, and sea-port town, in the chapelry just noticed, is picturesquely situated on the shore of the small bay of Ballycastle, and at the foot of the monarch-mountain of Knocklead, 3½ miles east of Fair Head, 5 south by west of Rathlin Island, 20 north of Ballymena, and 114½ north of Dublin. It consists of an upper and a lower town lying upwards of ¼ of a mile asunder, and connected by a straight umbrageous handsome avenue. The lower town is called the Quay, and contains, besides private buildings, a glass-house, breweries, tanneries, and other works, which have fallen to ruin since the decline of local trade, and a pile which was once used as a custom-house, but is now occupied as a barracks. The upper town is the larger and greatly more important section; and contains the neat spired church of the chapelry, a Roman Catholic chapel, Presbyterian, and Methodist meeting-houses, two good inns, and several neat villas and pretending private mansions. In 1823, three magistrates and six other families of respectability, attracted by the beauty of its situation, and its advantage for sea-bathing, had settled in Ballycastle as stated inhabitants. The scenery, from numerous spots in the environs, or even from the town itself, possesses a splendour and variety of tint, a richness of composition, and a combined force and beauty of character superior to that from almost any other town in Ireland. "North-east lies the island of Rathlin, above which, on a clear day, the dome-like mountains of Jura seem to rise,—

'As if some viewless hand had traced
An airy palace on the sky.'

To the east, the sea-view is terminated by the lofty mountains of Argyleshire, above whose summits the steep crags of Arran are faintly seen, softened by distance into a delicate and almost ethereal tinge of blue. South-east, the basaltic promontory of Fair Head projects its grave and impressive outline to the sea. Culfeightrin, dotted with white houses, and interspersed with the monastic ruins of Bona-Marga, Churchfield, &c., extends its beauties to the south. South-west, Knocklead rises in a graceful waving line on the horizon; while Danish raths, distant cottages, and the spire of Ballycastle church, glittering above the trees, give an admirable finish to the picture."—[Atkinson's Ireland Exhibited to England.]

Ballycastle was originally called Ballycashlain, or Castletown, and received its name from a castle erected on its site, in the 16th century, by Viscount Dunluce, one of the ancestors of the house of M'Donnell. Yet the place did not acquire importance, or become a town or seat of trade till about the year 1770; and it then sprang suddenly into bulk and strength, under the fostering care of its proprietor, the late Hugh Boyd, Esq. That gentleman held a lease in perpetuity from Alexander, Earl of Antrim, dated 1736, of all coals, pits, mines, &c., from Bona-Marga monastery on the west, to Fair Head cliff on the east; and from the whole line of intervening coast to a line 3 miles south in the interior; and, aided by the Irish parliament to the amount of £23,000, he constructed piers in the creek, with the view of facilitating the export of coal from his mines for the supply of Dublin. The coal is found under the basaltic cliffs, 2 miles to the east: the rent paid under the lease is every 12th ton of coal, delivered at the mouth of the pit; and charges for banking, shipping, &c., are deducted from the chief rent, and estimated at 2s. 6d. per ton. But the situation of the bay, in which the piers were erected, "is particularly exposed to the north-west winds, which, encountering the island of Raghery in their way, drive in a tremendous sea between that island and Ballycastle. While the shipping were without protection from these winds and turbulent waters, it was in vain to expect Ballycastle could become a place of commerce." The violence of the tides overthrew the piers; the harbour was choked up with drifted sand; and the trade, which had arisen with such suddenness, extent, and energy, was instantly flung prostrate, and, to all appearance, irretrievably destroyed. The works of the harbour, though not so constructed as to withstand the impetuous onsets of the sea, appear to have been very carefully executed. The west pier or quay, still mostly in order, and 600 feet long, is built of blue whin; the east pier, 150 feet of which is down, is partly of whin, and partly cased with brown sandstone, like the Dublin lighthouse wall, and has fir trees feathered into the ashlar; and a cross pier at the mouth of the harbour to resist the direct stroke of the sea, is entirely destroyed. An opening at the west end of the cross pier's ruins was made by the fishermen, admits boats, and is now the only entrance. "It appears to me," says Mr. Nimmo, "that the harbour of Ballycastle may be recovered and retained at no great expense. The mouth or entrance was originally laid too near the sands; and the river being turned off, the sand carried down thereby to the entrance was necessarily deposited by the sea in the still water within the harbour. To obviate this, we should build a breakwater, with paved face, from the head of the present east pier obliquely, to the rock at tail of West Head, finish that head, turn in the river, and make a pent of all above the Salmon-house, or even the lime-kiln; and, after some scouring, the sand will certainly lower greatly. I do not promise more than a bar harbour; though there is good reason to expect the same or greater depth than at first. The ledge on the north-west keeps off the ocean swell; and, under its lee, a safe entrance will be obtained. It will also afford a place for warping rings. The expense may be about £5,000 Irish. "It may not be amiss," says the Guide to the Giant's Causeway, "to mention why Ballycastle claimed the advantage of a pier, erected at the public charge, and therefore whether a second effort should be made to accomplish its construction. The exports of Ballycastle were coal; earth used in China manufactories, equivalent to kaolin; this was procured on Fair Head; granite from Ballypatrick Mountain, resembling petunse, also used in the composition of china; potters' clay, brick clay, and excellent fire stones; sand for glass making; kelp, and manganese. To these may be added freestone, limestone, and flints. From this enumeration it is obvious that the wealth of Ballycastle is of an inexhaustible, imperishable nature, and such as to render it a matter of public benefit to re-establish this harbour, upon such improved principles that the billows of the ocean shall roar against it in vain." The trade of the town was not quite extinguished by the ruin of the harbour; and, in 1835, amounted, in the estimated value of exports and imports, to respectively £1,791, and £2,030 13s. 3d. The exports consisted of 109 tons of kelp, 179 tons of corn and meal, 201 tons of potatoes, 35 head of cattle, and 96 untanned calf skins; and the imports consisted of coals, culm, cinders, iron, slates, oak-bark, salt, tinned plates, and other articles. The total estimated inland carriage from the town amounted to 700 tons,—and to the town, to 9,950 tons; and the latter consisted of 500 tons for exportation, 1,350 for local consumpt as food, 150 of excisable shop and imported articles not received by direct importation, and 7,950 of stone, lime, turf, &c. In 1838, the public conveyances were a mail car to Cushendall, and 2 caravans to Coleraine. Fairs are held on July 15, Aug. 29, Nov. 3, and Dec. 1.

The Ballycastle Poor-law union ranks as the 104th, and was declared on April 11th, 1840. It lies all in co. Antrim, and comprehends an area of 102,530 acres, whose pop., in 1831, amounted to 26,453. Its electoral divisions, with their respective pop., in 1831, are Ballycastle, 2,283; Ramoon, 2,084; Ballintoy, 2,255; Croag, 2,302; Dunseverick, 1,604; Drumtullagh, 2,800; Armoys, 2,139; Glenesk, 1,086; Fair Head, 1,835; Glenmakeeran, 1,396; Cushleake, 1,183; Glendun, 872; Cushendall, 2,396; Redbay, 1,388; and Rathlin, 1,040. The number of ex-officio and of elected guardians is respectively 5 and 18; and of the latter, 2 are returned by each of the divisions of Ballycastle, Cushendall, and Redbay, and 1 by each of the other divisions. The total nett annual value of the property rated is £39,054 5s.; the total number of persons rated is 3,675; of the latter, 163 are rated for a valuation not exceeding £1,—215 not exceeding £2,—169 not exceeding £3,—184 not exceeding £4,—and 233 not exceeding £5. The workhouse was contracted for on Oct. 3, 1840,—to be completed in April, 1842,—to cost for building and completion £3,875, and for fittings and contingencies £812 6s. 3d.,—to occupy a site of 5 acres, 3 roads, 28 perches, obtained for £612 13s. 9d.,—and to contain accommodation for 300 paupers. The date of the first admission of paupers was Jan. 3, 1843; the expenditure thence, till Feb. 6, 1843, was £59 6s. 5½d.; and the total previous expenditure was £975 15s. 5d. The dispensary districts are three in number, and have their seats at Ballycastle, Cushendall, and Cushendun; and they comprise an area of 99,080 acres, with a pop. of 22,708; and in 1839-40, they administered to 2,554 patients. Ballycastle dispensary has a district of 46,208 acres, with 14,460 inhabitants; and in 1839-40, it received £64 10s., expended £71 9s., and administered to 750 patients. In the same year, a small fever hospital in the town received £87 1s., and expended £89 2s. 11d.; but though then recently established, it was closed, in 1841, owing to the want of funds. In 1842, the Ballycastle Loan Fund had a capital of £2,143, circulated £10,154 in 2,242 loans, cleared a nett profit of £46 4s. 5d., and expended for charitable purposes £46 4s. 5d.; and from the date of its formation till the close of 1842, it circulated £39,936 in 9,136 loans, cleared a nett profit of £355 8s., and expended for charitable purposes £286 4s. 5d. In the vicinity of the town are two mineral springs; the one a chalybeate water, remarkably light, yet strongly impregnated with iron; and the other an aluminose vitriolic water. Area of the town, 47 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,683; in 1841, 1,697. Houses 274. For interesting objects connected with the town, or situated in its environs, see ARDCLINIE, CULFEGHTRIN, BONA-MARGA, KNOCKLEAD, FAIR HEAD, GIANT'S CAUSEWAY, and other articles.

BALLYCASTLE, a small bay and a fishing village in the parish of Dunfeeny, barony of Tyrawley, co. Mayo, Connaught. The bay opens about 1½ mile south-west of Downpatrick Head, and in its dimensions is merely a creek. A pier is required on its west side; as a heavy sea frequently invades it with such suddenness and power that fishing-boats which are out cannot effect a landing on their return. The inlet of Portnahalla, on its east side, has deep water, but a stony beach.—The village stands on the shore of the bay, 8 miles north-west of Killalla, and 140½ north-west by west of Dublin. It is a coast-guard station; and might, if properly encouraged, be a very eligible sea-bathing place. The coast, in its vicinity, is uniformly wild, frequently romantic, and occasionally grand. DOWNPATRICK HEAD [which see], is, in particular, an object of interest. The road to the village from Killalla traverses a wild and but partially reclaimed country; and a new road wends westward along the coast, traverses the skirt of the upland and thinly peopled barony of Erris, and connects Ballycastle with Belmullet. Area of the village, 18 acres. Pop., in 1841, 798. Houses 139.

BALLYCHROAN. See BALLYCROANE.

BALLYCLARE, a market and post town, partly in the parish of Ballinure, barony of Lower Belfast, but chiefly in that of Doagh Grange, barony of Upper Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. It stands on Six-mile-Water, and on the road from Antrim to Larne, 2½ miles south-west of Ballinure, about midway between Antrim and Larne, and 93½ by way of Ballinure, north by east of Dublin. It is the site of Presbyterian and Methodist meeting-houses. Markets for the sale of linen are held monthly; and general fairs are held in May, July, Aug., and Nov. Area of the town, 26 acres,—of which 6 acres are in the Ballinure section. Pop., in 1831, 824; in 1841, 847. Houses 160. Pop. of the Ballinure section, in 1831, 133; in 1841, 163. Houses 28. Pop. of the Doagh Grange section, in 1831, 691; in 1841, 684. Houses 132.

BALLYCLEARY, a hamlet in the parish of Ardahan, 4 or 5 miles north-north-east of Gort, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYCLERAHAN, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Iffa and Offa East, and 4 miles south-west of Fethard, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, ¾; area, 1,044 acres. Pop., in 1831, 568; in 1841, 728. Houses 118. Area of the village, 17 acres. Pop., in 1841, 339. Houses 62. It lies within the basin of the Suir, about 3½ miles north of the river; and is traversed north-westward by the road from Clonmel to Cashel. A fair is held on Sept. 30.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of St. John Baptist, and corps of the deanery of Cashel cathedral, in the dio. of Cashel. See JOHN'S (ST.). Tithe composition, £75. The Roman Catholic chapel has 2 officiates, and an attendance of 2,000. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 4, and the Roman Catholics to 593; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 62 boys and 20 girls.

BALLYCLOG, a parish in the barony of Dunganon, 2 miles north of Stewartstown, co. Tyrone, Ulster. Its form is so irregular, from indentations of adjoining parishes, that a tolerably accurate idea of its outline cannot be conveyed by words. Greatest length, 5 miles; greatest breadth, 2½; area, 7,796 acres, 3 roads, 2 perches,—of which 373 acres, 2 roads, 17 perches, form a detached district, and 3,092 acres, 1 road, 9 perches, are water, chiefly in Lough Neagh. Pop., in 1831, 2,786; in 1841, 2,697. Houses 480. The surface is low; declines to the west shore of Lough Neagh; consists of good land; and is traversed northward by the road from Armagh to Moneymore. The demesne of Bellemont, and part of the demesne of Stewart-hall, the latter the property of the Earl of Castle Stewart, are on the eastern border.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Armagh. Tithe composition, £184 12s. 4d. Gross income, £306 2s. 4d.; nett, £272 18s. 10½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is so old a building that the date and cost of its erection are not known. Sittings 150; attendance 100. A Presbyterian meeting-house has an attendance of 500. A Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 123; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to two chapels in the benefice of Donaghendry. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 330 Churchmen, 1,209 Presbyterians, 8 other Protestant dissenters, and 1,102 Roman Catholics. In the same year, a private school at Drumbanaway, a female school supported by Mrs. Caulfield, at Drunkern, 3 schools of the London Hibernian Society at Upper Back, Eirey, and Auchall, and a school aided with a salary of £20, and an annual gratuity of £10 from the Board of Erasmus Smith, had on their books 207 boys and 165 girls.

BALLYCLOUGHY. See MONEMOUNT.

BALLYCLOUGH, a parish, containing a small town of the same name, and lying partly in the barony of Duhallo, and partly in that of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 9,711 acres,—of which 4,636 acres are in Duhallo. Pop., in 1831, 3,852; in 1841, 3,971. Houses 598. Pop. of the Duhallo section, in 1831, 1,597; in 1841, 1,643. Houses 244. The surface, athwart the area which we have stated, consists chiefly of arable ground, has a southern exposure, and descends within about two miles of the north bank of the Blackwater. The village of Ballycough stands in the Orrery and Kilmore section of the parish, 3½ miles north-west of Mallow, on the road thence to Newmarket. Area, 35 acres. Pop., in 1831, 627; in 1841, 576. Houses 93. This village early shook off the filth and tawdriness of many places of its class, and put on a dress of cleanliness, neatness, and even beauty; for, about 80 years ago, when scarcely an Irish village or small town made any pretensions to order or comfort, Ballyclough was improved and beautified by its proprietor, Col. Purdon. In its vicinity stands Mount-North, the seat of Lord Lisle. See MOUNT-NORTH. On the south-east border of the parish, opposite the heights which are crowned with the ruins of Dromaneen-castle, is the fine demesne of Longueville, the property of Mr. Longfield. Near this demesne commences the Blackwater coal-field, which extends westward to Mill-street, and has for many years been somewhat successfully worked. The towers and the demesne of Loxhort-castle, the seat of the noble family of Perceval, Lords Arden in the peerage of the United Kingdom, contribute features of much interest to the landscape of the western border. See LOGHORT. Ballyclough-castle, situated in a pleasing demesne contiguous to the village, was the chief seat of the sept of MacRobert or MacRobert Barry. The Ballyclough estate now belongs to the Coote family, Robert Coote, Esq., having married the heiress of the Purdons, the former proprietors. Among monumental inscriptions in the church are memorials of the Purdon, Lysaght, and Coote families, of Henry Wrixon, Esq., of Blossomfort, who died in 1778, and of John Longfield, Esq., of Longueville, who died in 1765. A minute notice of some of the monuments may be seen in Dr. Smith's History of Cork. A chalybeate spring near the village was in some repute last century, but it became overgrown by a brook, and was neglected. A dispensary in the village is within the Mallow Poor-law union; and, in 1839-40, it received and expended £103 14s. 4d., and administered to 2,038 patients. In 1842, the Ballyclough Loan Fund had a capital of £458, circulated £2,014 in 897 loans, cleared £48 1s. 10d. of nett profit, and expended for charitable purposes £1 15s. 6d.—This parish is a vicarage in the dio. of Cloyne. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £400, and the rectorial for £381 10s.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to John Longfield, Esq. The vicarages of Ballyclough, and Drumdowney [see DRUMDOWNEY], constitute the benefice of Ballyclough. Length, 3½ miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 4,017. Gross income, £478 11s.; nett, £366 6s. 8½d. Patron, the diocesan. The church is situated in the village of Ballyclough; it was built, in 1829, at the cost of £1,030, of which £300 were raised by subscription, and £730 were borrowed from the late Board of First Fruits; and it was enlarged by the addition of a gallery, in 1831, at the cost of £63, provided for by Col. Longfield. Sittings 230; attendance 115. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,350; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Kilbrin. In 1834, the Protestants of both the parish and the union amounted to 226, and the Roman Catholics of the parish and the union to respectively 3,818, and 3,988; a Sunday school, the expenses of which were defrayed by the vicar, was averagely attended by 30 children; and 6 daily schools, all of which were in Ballyclough parish, and one was aided with £15 a-year from subscription, and £8 from the Society for Discourteasing Vice, had on their books 180 boys and 116 girls.

BALLYCLUG, a parish in the barony of Lower Antrim, including a suburb of Ballymena, but lying averagely 2 miles south-south-east of that town, co. Antrim, Ulster. See HENRYVILLE. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 8,268 acres, 3 roods, 18 perches. Pop., in 1831, 3,692; in 1841, 4,307. Houses 746. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 3,440; in 1841, 3,910. Houses 676. One-fourth of the land is boggy and heathy; and the remainder is light but productive. The surface declines to the north, lies within the basin of the Main river, and is traversed southward by the road from Ballymena to Antrim.—Ballyclug is a rectory in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition, £120 4s. 7d. This rectory and the impropriate curacy of KIRKINRIOLA [which see], constitute the benefice of Ballyclug. But the parishes are united only episcopally and pro hac vice. Length, 8 miles; breadth, 3. Pop., in 1831, 10,989. Gross income, £237 6s.; nett, £212 8s. 11d. Patron of Ballyclug, the diocesan; of Kirkinriola, the Earl of Mountcashel. The church is situated at the junction of the two parishes; it was built in 1707,—cost unknown; and it was enlarged in 1822, by means of a loan of £92 6s. 1½d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 300; attendance, from 200 to 240. The Roman Catholic chapels of Ballyclug and Kirkinriola are united in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, and have each an attendance of from 500 to 600. Four meeting-houses, 3 of them Presbyterian and 1 Wesleyan, are in Kirkinriola. In 1834, the parishioners of Ballyclug consisted of 157 Churchmen, 2,093 Presbyterians, and 1,627 Roman Catholics; and the inhabitants of the union consisted of 1,069 Churchmen, 7,697 Presbyterians, 103 other Protestant dissenters, and 3,011 Roman Catholics. In the same year, 3 Sabbath schools in Ballyclug were averagely attended by 355 children; 9 Sabbath schools in the union were averagely attended by from 957 to 1,071; 3 daily schools in Ballyclug, one of which was aided with £6 a-year from Mr. Geehan, and £10 from the National Board, and another with an assured salary of £20, had on their books 117 boys and 69 girls; and 23 daily schools in the union, had on their books 766 boys and 491 girls. The National school of Ballyclug is at Crebilly; and, in 1840, was aided with £15 from the Board.

BALLYCOLLA, a village in the parish of Aghaboe, barony of Clarmallagh, Queen's co., Leinster. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 168. Houses 27.

BALLYCOLLON, an alias appellation of the parish of Coolbanagher, in the barony of Portnevinch, Queen's co., Leinster. See COOLBANAGHER.

BALLYCOMMON, a parish in the north-west corner of the barony of Lower Philipstown, 3½ miles west of Philipstown, and on the northern border of King's co., Leinster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 6,641 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,226; in 1841, 1,066. Houses 177. The surface consists, to a large extent, of the bog to be noticed in our next article; but elsewhere it is good land, low and unpicturesque in feature, yet fertile in soil. The Grand Canal traverses the parish; and is spanned by Ballycommon bridge, and overlooked on the north by Ballycommon-house.—This parish is a rectory and separate benefice in the dio. of Kildare. Tithe composition, £139 5s. 9½d. Gross income, £144 5s. 9½d.; nett, £128 18s. 10½d. Patron, the Crown. When, at what cost, and from what funds, the church was built, are matters not known. Sittings 100; attendance 120. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 145, and the Roman Catholics to 1,097; and 2 daily schools, one of which was aided with £4 10s. a-year from the rector and two other persons, had on their books 42 boys and 39 girls. In 1840, a National school at Kilmurphy was salaried with £12, and had on its books 50 boys and 36 girls.

BALLYCOMMON, a bog chiefly in the parish just noticed, on the northern border of King's co., Leinster. Area, 1,750 Irish or 2,834 English acres.

It is bounded on the north, east, and west, by steep ridges of limestone gravel, extending north-north-westward from the vicinity of Philipstown, by Ballymullin and Lackin to Mountrath, and from thence in an opposite direction by Bracklin and Rathdown to Ballycommon, between Ballymullen and Ballycommon, it is crossed by the Philipstown level of the Grand Canal; and between the canal and Ballinagar, it is bounded on the west by the high land of Knock. Its area consists of 59 Irish acres of compact or black bog, where turf has been cut, and 1,691 Irish acres of fibrous red bog. The black or compact bog occurs near the south end, and is traversed by one of the head streams of the Philipstown river. The whole bog averages 20 feet in depth; and, compared with other bogs, it may be considered, especially in its northern parts, as very wet. Its summit lies 22 feet above the summit-level of the Grand Canal, and 286 feet above the level of high water-mark in Dublin bay; and its lowest point, which occurs near the Philipstown river opposite Philipstown, lies 20 feet below the summit-level of the Grand Canal, and 244 feet above the level of high water in Dublin bay. Estimated cost of reclamation, £5,089 12s. 7d.

BALLYCONNELL, a small market and post town in the parish of Tomregan, barony of Tulaghagh, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands on the Woodford river, and on the road from Killeshandra to Callowhill, about 5 miles west of Belturbet, 68 west-south-west of Belfast, and 74 north-west of Dublin. Its site is romantic and imposing. From its skirt rises the mountain of Slieve Russel, or, as it is called, in the ordnance survey, Lignavegra,—a height which attains an altitude of 1,300 feet above sea-level, and forms a conspicuous and remarkable feature in a considerable expanse of landscape. Immediately below the town, and on the banks of the river, stands Ballyconnell-house, the seat of W. H. Enery, Esq. A court-house in the town possesses a somewhat elegant appearance; and a district bride-well is now well kept—though but a brief period ago it was in a neglected and disorderly condition—and it offers, in 2 day-rooms, 2 yards, and 3 cells, sufficient accommodation for the few prisoners who are confined on their way to the county gaol. A dispensary in the town is within the Cavan Poor-law union; and, in 1839–40, it received £83 11s., expended £83 13s. 3d., and administered to 1,290 patients. A fever hospital was established 3 or 4 years ago; but it contained only 5 beds, and was soon discontinued from want of subscriptions. "The insufficiency of subscriptions for the Ballyconnell dispensary," says the Report of the Commissioners in 1841, "and the difficulty of obtaining fever hospital relief, induce a large proportion of the subscribers to advocate such legislation as would insure funds on the principle of the poor rate." Fairs are held on Feb. 13, March 17, May 16, June 24, July 20, Sept. 26, and Oct. 25. For schools, &c., see TOMREGAN. Area of the town, 75 acres. Pop., in 1831, 453; in 1841, 387. Houses 63.

BALLYCONNELL, a village in the parish of Dromeliffe, barony of Carbery, co. Sligo, Connaught. It stands on the coast near Gessigo Point, and about 9½ miles north-west of Sligo. Area, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, 533. Houses 100.

BALLYCONNELL, the site of a mansion and of the church and glebe-house of Raynmuaterdony, 4 miles south-west of Dunfaughy, on the road along the shore of the barony of Kilmacrean, co. Donegal, Ulster.

BALLYCONICK, a parish on the southern frontier of the barony of Bargie, 3½ miles south of Taghmon, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 2½ miles; breadth half-a-mile; area, 1,611 acres. Pop., in 1831, 501; in 1841, 525. Houses 85. The land is, for the most part, arable and good.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of TAGHMON [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. Title composition, £95 1s. 7d. Though lying apart from the other parishes of the benefice, by the intervention of the parishes of Cool-tuff and Ambrosetown, it has no place of worship within its own limits. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 501; and a daily school was aided with £10 a-year from local subscription, and had on its books 29 boys and 18 girls.

BALLYCONRA. See AHARNEY.

BALLYCONREE, a hamlet in the parish of Dromeliffe, barony of Burren, co. Clare, Munster. Pop., in 1831, 60.

BALLYCONRY, or BALLYCONRY-DERICO, a parish in the barony of Iraghticonnor, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 1,206 acres. Pop., in 1841, 417. Houses 69.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of Killeighney, and of the corps of the precentorship of Ardirt cathedral, in the dio. of Ardferit and Aghadoe. The vicarial and the rectorial tithes are each compounded for £18; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to the Earl of Cork.

BALLYCOOLANE, or CLOCHIRAN, or CLOCHIRAN-HIDART, a small parish in the barony of Castleknock, co. Dublin, Leinster. Area, 778 acres. Pop., in 1831, 72; in 1841, 111. Houses 15. Though tiny figuring as a parish in the civil divisions, it seems to be unacknowledged in the ecclesiastical arrangements.

BALLYCOPLAND, a townland on the seaboard of the barony of Ardes, opposite the Copeland Islands, co. Down, Ulster. Both it and the islands have their name from a family of Coplands who settled in them, in the 12th century in the time of John de Courcy. The family was long ago extinct. See COPELAND ISLANDS.

BALLYCOR, a parish in the barony of Upper Antrim, 1 mile north by east of Ballyclare, co. Antrim, Ulster. This parish and that of Rashee constitute the perpetual curacy of Ballyeaston; and most of their statistics, both civil and ecclesiastical, are united, and given under the word BALLYEASTON; which see. Both parishes are rectories appropriated to the prebend of CARNCASTLE; which also see. Ballycor contains the village of Ballyeaston. Area of the parish, 7,330 acres. Pop., in 1841, 2,611. Houses 469. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 2,346. Houses 417.

BALLYCORMACK, an alleged parish in the barony of Bargie, co. Wexford, Leinster. Dr. Beaufort places it apparently about 8 miles south-west of Wexford. Carlisle, Gorton, and other topographers, place it in the same position; and follow Dr. Beaufort, in calling it a rectory in the dio. of Ferns. As no trace of it exists in any of our authorities, civil or ecclesiastical, we conclude it either to be Ballyconnick, a parish which Dr. Beaufort omits, or to have been thoroughly consolidated with that parish, or some other adjoining one.

BALLYCORUS, a mining locality on the southern border of the half-barony of Rathdown, within half-a-mile of the Scalp, co. Dublin, Leinster. Smelting works, rolling and pipe mill and shot tower are worked with water power, employ 20 men, and annually produce from 800 to 2,400 tons of lead, worth £27 per ton. Supplies of timber, iron, &c., for the works are sent on cars from Dublin.

BALLYCOTTON, a bay, some islets, and a fishing-village, in the barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. The bay enters between Ring Point, or Cable Island, 5 miles south by west of the entrance of Youghal Harbour, and the Ballycotton Islands, which lie adjacent to a headland 5½ miles south-west of Ring Point. But though the bay is thus 5½ miles wide at the entrance, it penetrates the land to the extent of only about 2½ miles, nearly describing, by its interior outline, the segment of a circle. It is greatly exposed to south-east gales, and not a little dangerous to mariners unacquainted with its coast. Yet it is remarkable for its clean ground; it has from 2 to 9 fathoms of water; it affords a considerable supply of flat fish; and, were a small pier or harbour formed to afford a shelter from south-east winds, the fishermen, who are at present obliged to haul up their boats during the winter months, would be able to prosecute their industry throughout the year. The coast of the bay is flat and sandy, but skirted on the left by a low ridge of heights, and on the right by the swells and hills which pass away in an extensive tract of moorlands northward to the river Bride. Along the eastern shore are some uninteresting ruins; and at its west end, within about a mile of the Ballycotton Islands, are Ballycotton village and a coast-guard station. The largest of the islands is a high small spot, almost covered, at the proper season, with nests of various sea-fowls, and commanding a distant view of Kinsale Head, and the entrance to Cork Harbour. The village is in the parish of Cloyne, and stands at the mouth of a rivulet, about 7½ miles south of Castle-Martyr, and about 12 south-west of Youghal. It has a poor and utterly unpretending appearance. In 1834, both a private house in the village and the coast-guard station, were used as subordinate parochial places of worship, and had attendances of respectively 50 and 16. See CLOYNE. Area of the village, 36 acres. Pop., in 1831, 856; in 1841, 449. Houses 85.

BALLYCOWAN, a barony in King's co., Leinster. It is bounded on the north by Kilcoursey and the county of Westmeath; on the east by Philipstown and Geashil; on the south by Geashil and Ballyboy; and on the west by Garrycastle. Its greatest length, from east-north-east to west-south-west, is 9½ miles; its greatest breadth, in the opposite direction, is 5½; and its area is 38,652 acres. It contains part of the parish of Durrrow, and the whole of the parishes of Kilbride, Linally, and Bahan; and its only town is Tullamore. It is chiefly bounded on the west by the Brosna river; is drained through its centre, but in the segment of a circle, from south to west by that river's affluent, the Clodagh; and is traversed westward past Tullamore by the Grand Canal. The pastoral tracts consist of limestone hills and moorish bottoms; the former constituting good grazing ground and sheep-walk. Bog, though forming a considerable part of the area, has been extensively reclaimed, and partly planted. The moorish grounds are often sown with potatoes; and, when burned and gravelled, yield good returns. The arable lands are extensive, and produce fair crops of not only oats but wheat. Abundance and facile conveyance of limestone, and the plenteous prevalence of fuel for burning it, have both stimulated and powerfully aided geological improvement. The farms are averagely small; and the houses upon them, for the most part, poor and uncomfortable. The principal seat is that of CHARLEVILLE: which see. Pop., in 1831, 18,035; in 1841, 18,320. Houses 3,079. Families employed chiefly in agriculture, 1,710; in manufactures and trade, 830; in other pursuits, 934. Males at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 3,128; who could read but not write, 1,503; who could neither read nor write, 3,235. Females at and above 5 years of age who could read and write, 1,647; who could read but not write, 2,386; who could neither read nor write, 4,258.

BALLYCOWAN, a village on the Clodagh river, about 2 miles west of Tullamore, in the above barony, King's co., Leinster. Pop. not specially returned. Here are extensive ruins of an ancient, strong, and important castle, which gave name to both the village and the barony. Its ancient or uncorrupted name is Bally-Ecuan. "This structure, when in its pride of strength," says Brewer, "was taken from O'Melaghlin, A.D. 1536, by Leonard Lord Grey, then lord-deputy. Queen Elizabeth having confiscated the estate of Art O'Melaghlin, representative of the ancient kings of Meath, 'chief of the line of Heremon,' granted, in 1589, a portion of his property, including the castle of Bally-Ecuan and the district of Moyely, to Thomas Morres, Esq. This castle surrendered to Sir H. Dress Waller, the republican general, in 1650, and has since sunk progressively into decay. The extent of the ruins evince its former strength and importance."

BALLYCRAIGEY, a hamlet in the parish of Carnmoney, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. Pop. not specially returned. At the hamlet is an Independent meeting-house. See CARNMONEY.

BALLYCRAIGEY, a mansion and a bleaching establishment 1 mile south of Antrim, on the road to Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. Mr. Atkinson, in 1823, said, "This is one of the most extensive establishments in the linen bleaching department, that this county can boast of. Forty thousand pieces of linens are said to be annually prepared here for the markets of London and Glasgow." The mansion is a neat lodge, in the villa style; and stands on a pleasing elevation above the mills.

BALLYCRANE. See BALLYCRANEY.

BALLYCRENANE, an old castle at the east end of Ballycotton bay, barony of Imokilly, co. Cork, Munster. It was built by the Carews, became an old seat of the Tynte family, and afterwards passed into the possession of the family of Waller. Its architecture presents no feature of interest.

BALLYCROANE, or BALLYCHROAN, a creek and a fishing-village at the north-west extremity of Quolagh or Coulagh bay, 4½ miles east-north-east of Cod's Head, or of the south side of the entrance of the Kenmare river, barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. The village is on the estate of Robert Hedges Eyre, Esq. An artificial harbour on the creek, and contiguous to the village, consists of a landing quay 100 feet long, a jetty pier extending 52 feet from the quay, a boat slip, and a return to the end of the quay. The works were executed with the aid of a grant of £369 4s. 7d., in 1822, from the Fishery Board; and, being found ill-built and insecure, they were afterwards improved at the cost of about £150, by being raised 18 inches, and properly coped, filled, and paved. A considerable fishery on the coast is accommodated and promoted by the harbour. The creek affords good and safe shelter for small sloops.

BALLYCROGUE, a parish in the barony of Carlow, 3 miles south-east of the town of Carlow, co. Carlow, Leinster. Area, 370 acres. Pop., in 1831, 72; in 1841, 64. Houses 13. The land is all profitable for tillage or pasturage, and lies along the left bank of the river Burren.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of STAPLETON [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £21 2s. 6d. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics.

BALLYCROY (THE), a rivulet of the parish or district of Ballycroy, in the half-barony of Erris, co.

Mayo, Connaught. It issues from a lake, called sometimes Ballycro, but properly Icardane, receives the tribute of the Tarsachambev rivulet, and disembogues itself into Blacksod bay. It is affected by the tide for only about a mile, and is navigable no higher by boats, and not even at its mouth by sailing craft. Owing to continued storms in summer, the salmon-fishing in the river diminished progressively during the 6 or 7 years ending in 1836. The right of the fishery is held by Sir Richard A. O'Donnell, Bart.

BALLYCROY, a district, formerly a parish, of the half-barony of Erris, co. Mayo, Connaught. It forms the southern section of the mainland of Erris; lies within the large parish of Kilcommon; and extends along Achill Sound and Blacksod bay. Pop., in 1831, 2,925. See KILCOMMON. The surface of the whole district, with some very limited exceptions, is a continuous expanse of irksome moorish upland. "Even in summer and autumn," says Mr. Fraser, in reference to all Erris, in words which apply peculiarly to Ballycro, "the few spots of wretched cultivation appear as mere specks, and scarcely chequer the gloomy monotony of the heath-clad surface." * * * Except the tall heather and the marsh willows, not a bush waves over the surface; nor, in many places, does a house, fit for any civilized human being, gladden the scene. In the fastnesses of the mountains in the Ballycro district, a few of the red deer still find a cover." Mr. Nimmo says, in description of the coast of Ballycro: "Descending along the eastern side of Blacksod bay, we have little but low bare sandy shores and bog. There are two or three considerable inlets, but all dry at low water. At Kenfenalty Point, opposite to Tarmon, is a sandy cove, protected by a point of rock, in which there is some shelter. To the south of that, Tulloghaan bay, which is the estuary of the Owenmore river, forms a natural harbour, up which vessels may pass for several miles, and ride in safety. Were the road along the Ballycro shore perfected, a ferry pier at Tulloghaan would be of service to travellers, and also to the fishing craft; but the southern side being an extensive strand at low water, its value must always be limited. The remainder of Ballycro affords us nothing of interest, though the extensive shallow bay between it and Coraun Achil is sometimes a seat of the herring-fishery. Two little ferry piers at the narrow would be useful; they would connect that part of Ballycro with the new Achil road, and be frequently of great service to the fishery. I have opened a branch line of road down to this place." See ERRIS.

BALLYCULTER, a parish containing the town of Strangford, in the barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,177 acres, 1 rood, 24 perches,—of which 41 acres, 1 rood, 10 perches, are water. Pop., in 1831, 2,221; in 1841, 2,182. Houses 411. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1831, 1,638; in 1841, 1,611. Houses 300. It extends along the west side of the channel which forms the entrance to Lough Strangford, from a point within about 3 miles of the open sea. The surface is partly hilly and partly rocky, or covered with whins; but, in general, it consists of good land. Barley and oats are the principal crops raised on the arable grounds. The principal country houses are Castleward, Templemount, and Green-house. The parish is traversed south-westward by the road from Strangford to Downpatrick, and enjoys high advantages of communication from being washed by the great sea-lough of the county, and from containing the town and port of STRANGFORD: see that article. The channel opposite the parish is about a mile broad, and presents views which are interesting both from their natural features of landscape and from their artificial objects, and their associations with commerce. The demesne of Castle-Ward, the seat of Viscount Bangor, is beautiful in situation, and embellished in culture; and it so extends along the lake and around the town of Strangford, as to fling ornament over the most interesting and populous parts of the parish. The village of Ballyculter and the site of the parish-church are $\frac{1}{4}$ mile south-west of Strangford.—This parish is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Down. It was formerly a perpetual curacy, while its rectorial rights and status were appropriated and annexed to Down deanery; but by order in council of 31st Oct., 1834, the rectory was disappropriated from the deanery, and consolidated with the perpetual curacy into a separate benefice. The two townlands of Upper and Lower Killard, which lie detached from the main body of the parish, "with the tithe composition and cure of souls thereof, were, by said order, severed from Ballyculter parish, and annexed for ever to the adjoining parish of Kilclief; and the tithe composition arising from the townlands of Raholpe and Ballintleave in Ballyculter parish, severed from said rectory, and united for ever to the parish of Saul; providing, however, that the cure of souls within these townlands shall continue to belong to Ballyculter rectory; and in lieu of such severance, the three detached townlands of Whitehill, Ballinerry, and Ballingarrick, with the tithe composition arising therefrom, were, by order aforesaid, disunited from Saul parish, and united for ever to the adjoining parish of Ballyculter; annexing, however, at the same time, the cure of souls within these townlands to the adjoining parish of Kilclief." Tithe composition, after deducting the portions for Kilclief and Saul, and adding the portion from the annexed townlands in Saul, £383 3s. 3d. Gross income, £398 13s. 1d.; nett, £334 1s. 3d. Patron, the Crown. The church was built in 1723, at an unknown cost; and a steeple was added to it in 1770, at the private expense of Lord Bangor. Sittings 400; attendance, from 100 to 300. A chapel-of-ease, not subject to episcopal jurisdiction, is situated in Strangford; it was built in 1629, at the private expense of Valentine Payne, Esq., and is now the property of Lord de Roos; and it is under the care of the parochial incumbent, who receives from Lord de Roos a salary of £20 as chaplain. Sittings 150; attendance, from 50 to 100. One Methodist meeting-house has about 6 attendants; and another has from 100 to 120. Two Roman Catholic chapels have each an attendance of from 50 to 100; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to the chapel of Ballee. In 1834, the inhabitants of the parish, within its new ecclesiastical limits, consisted of 829 Churchmen, 65 Presbyterians, and 1,215 Roman Catholics; 4 Sunday schools were averagely attended by from 150 to 170 children; and an infant-school supported by the Hon. Mrs. Ward, a parochial school aided with £25 a-year from Lord Bangor and £2 from the rector; a boarding, commercial, and classical school, and a week-day pay-school, had on their books 176 boys and 132 girls.

BALLYCUMBER, a village in the parish of Lemanaghan, barony of Garrystown, King's co., Leinster. It stands on the river Brosna, and on the road from Dublin to Banagher, $\frac{1}{4}$ miles south-west of Clara, and $\frac{1}{2}$ north-east of Ferbane. It has a neat and pleasant appearance, and is accommodated with a good stone-bridge across the Brosna. Around it are the seats of Ballycumber-house, J. W. Armstrong, Esq.; Prospect, C. Holmes, Esq.; Moorock, G. A. Holmes, Esq.; and Bellair, T. H. Mullock, Esq. The vicinity of so many mansions, and the agreeable aspect of the village itself, are the more striking to a traveller on account of the whole being encircled with belts and expanses of the Bog of Allan. Two miles to the west are objects which fall to be noticed in the article LEMANAGHAN; which see. Fairs are held in the village on May 2, and Dec. 1. Area of the village, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 231. Houses 40.

BALLYCURRANY. See BALLYCARANY.

BALLYCUSLANE. See BALLINCUSLANE.

BALLYDAHAEN, a suburb of the town of Mal-low, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the right bank of the Blackwater; is connected with Mallow by a bridge; and lies within the new as well as the old borough boundaries. It chiefly consists of a street which runs 400 yards southward from the bridge; and of two short streets which continue the former along respectively the old and the new road to Cork. On its east side is Mr. De La Cour's demesne. See MALLOW.

BALLYDAIGH. See BALTEAGH.

BALLYDANGAN, a noted locality on the south coast of Connemara, co. Galway, Connaught. Its facilities for the accumulation of sea-weed, of peat fuel, and of the produce of fisheries for exportation to Galway and the markets of co. Clare, are so great that nothing but an extraordinary yet easily removable obstruction to boat navigation seems to prevent its becoming the site of a large village. The "Pass of Ballydangan" is a shallow and perilous strait in which many lives have been lost, and where almost every tide destroys some property of poor boatmen. At least 50 laden boats on the average pass through it every day of the year; while no fewer than about 500 are under the necessity of making a circuitous route, and exposing themselves to a full sea, in order to avoid the dangers of the "Pass." The current runs so rapidly that laden boats, designing to navigate the strait, endeavour to arrive by a slack tide, and to congregate above it; for if they are caught by the current, and have not a fair wind or a stiff breeze, they lose all power of steering, are swept helplessly along, and very often rush upon the rocks, to the damage of their timbers, the loss of their cargoes, and the imminent peril of their crews. Much was done by the late Mr. O'Flaherty of the Islands to effect improvements; the Board of Public Works made a bootless grant toward their completion; and, in 1835—the date to which our notice of the place applies—the sum of only £200, according to one estimate, or £400 or £500, according to another, was required to render the strait freely and safely navigable.

BALLYDANIEL, a seat on the west side of Youghal Harbour, and not far from the town of Youghal, co. Cork, Munster. It commands an extensive view of the coast and the ocean; and in its vicinity a rivulet runs about a mile under ground.

BALLYDAVID, a cape at the north-east side of the entrance of Smerwick Harbour, parish of Kilkquane, barony of Corkaguiney, co. Kerry, Munster. It is a signal station; and is situated 6½ miles north-west of Dingle.

BALLYDEHOB, a village in the parish of Skull, western division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the road from Skibbereen to Crookhaven, and on the shore of an inlet on the west side of the bay of Roaring Water; and is grandly overhung, at a brief distance, by the imposing height of Mount Gabriel. See articles GABRIEL and SKULL. In 1842, the Ballydehob Loan Fund had a capital of £179, and circulated £638 in 490 loans. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1831, 601; in 1841, 636. Houses 107.

BALLYDELAUGHY. See BALLYDELOUGHY. BALLYDELOHER, or KILROAN, a parish on the south-west frontier of the barony of Barrymore, 6 miles east-north-east of Cork, co. Cork, Munster. It contains the village of BROOKLODGE; which see. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 2,101 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,145; in 1841, 1,183. Houses 195. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 611. Houses 95. The stream of the beautiful vale of Glanmire traces the western boundary, and divides the parish from the barony of Cork. On this stream, and within Ballydehober, are the hamlet and the handsome villa of Riverstown. On the Riverstown grounds is a considerable expanse of the largest and finest trees in Munster; and elsewhere wood and a tamulated surface produce a pleasing landscape. In the parish are 3 paper-mills, a glass-house, and a woollen factory.—Ballydehober is a rectory, and part of the benefice and prebend of KILLASPIONGLANE (which see), in the dio. of Cork. Tithe composition, £177 10s.; glebe, £20. The church of the benefice is situated in this parish, and was built, in 1829, by means of a gift of £650 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 60. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 73, and the Roman Catholics to 1,120; and 5 daily schools were supported wholly by fees, and had on their books 124 boys and 105 girls.

BALLYDELOUGHY, BALLYDELAUGHY, or BALLYLOUGH, a parish on the north-east border of the barony of Fermoy, 3½ miles south-west of Mitchelstown, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 2,000 acres. Pop., in 1831, 718; in 1841, 793. Houses 123. The surface is drained southward by the river Funcheon; and consists, for the most part, of good land.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice and prebend of Glanworth, in the dio. of Cloyne. See GLANWORTH. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £89 16s. 6½d., and the rectorial for £69 19s. 5½d.; and the latter are inappropriate, and belong to Lord Donoughmore. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Glanworth. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 10, and the Roman Catholics to 745; and a hedge-school had on its books 36 boys and 18 girls.

BALLYDERNEY, one of a series of bogs principally in the north-west corner of the barony of Kilconnel, co. Galway, Connaught. The other bogs of the series are those of Killoran, Elnamore, and Tickooly. The series extends from a point about a mile south of Ballinamore, 3¼ miles west-north-westward to a point 1½ mile east of Mount Bellew, and comprises an area of 3,538 English acres. The bogs are traversed from end to end eastward by the rivulet Shívon; they decline sufficiently toward it for the purposes of drainage; and though naturally, and for the most part, very wet, they are not deep. Estimated cost of reclamation, £4,627 4s. 9d.

BALLYDEVELIN, a bay and the ruins of an old castle in the parish of Kilmann, west division of the barony of West Carbery, co. Cork, Munster. The bay is on the west side of Crookhaven Harbour, 1½ mile north of Crookhaven; and opens from a marine expanse, within headlands, where the stream of the tide is scarcely perceptible. The castle crowns a precipitous rock, and boldly overhangs the ocean. It was originally called Ballydeamond, and was anciently a seat of the Mahonys.

BALLYDONAGAN, a bay, and a fishing-village in the barony of Bere, co. Cork, Munster. The bay indents the western extremity of the large peninsula between the Kenmare river and Bantry bay; opens between Cod's Head on the north, and Dursey Island on the south; is 4 miles wide at the entrance; and, in a proximate view, describes a semicircle upon a radius of 2 miles. Its shore is partly rocky. The tidal current, when at the strongest in the bay, runs not more than a mile in an hour. The village of Ballydonagan stands on the shore of Ballydonagan bay, and within the parish of Kilmunaghan. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 340. Houses 64.

BALLYDONNELL, a village in the parish of Cahirdagban, barony of Fermoy, 4 miles south-west of Doneraile, co. Cork, Munster. It stands on the road from Mallow by way of Lisacartol to Newcastle. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLYDONNELL, an ecclesiastical parish nearly in the centre of the barony of Arklow, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Rathdrum, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Area, 3,073 acres. Pop., in 1831, 645. The surface is traversed southward by the west road from Wicklow to Arklow, and drained south-eastward by a rivulet which enters the sea at a point 2 miles south of Mizen Head. The land averages in value about 20s. per acre.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CASTLEMACADAM [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. The amount of tithe composition, and the ecclesiastical and educational statistics, are returned jointly with those of Castlemacadam.

BALLYDONNELLAN, a hamlet in the south-west corner of the barony of Clonmacnoo, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands 4 miles south-west of Aughrim, on the road from Dublin to Galway. In its vicinity, and east of the road, is Ballydonnellan-house, the old seat of the Donnellan family. Pop. of the village not specially returned.

BALLYDONNELLY, a townland in the parish of Donaghmore, barony of Dungannon, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It anciently contained a fortalice, which was called Fort O'Donnelly, and occupied as the principal strength of the chief of the sept of O'Donnelly, or O'Donnell. The townland, comprising probably 1,000 acres, was, with other lands, granted by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Toby Caulfield, first Lord Charlemont; and the site of Fort O'Donnelly was adopted, in 1614, as the site of the Charlemont erection of Castle-Caulfield. See CASTLE-CAULFIELD and DONAGHMORE.

BALLYDOURE, a glen on the western border of the barony of Coshbride and Coshmore, 3 miles west of Lismore, and on the western frontier of co. Waterford, Munster. The glen is wild and lonely, and opens near the road from Lismore to Fermoy. Mr. Croker tells his readers that he "explored" it, and adds, "A few miserable cabins (if I may speak paradoxically) stood in lonely association. An adequate idea of the wretchedness of these habitations can scarcely be formed from description. From these hovels the smoke of the turf fire has seldom the option of escape by a chimney, in default of which, it issues from the door. Sometimes they possess a window, but this is a luxury not general. The floor is bare earth, so uneven that the four legs of a chair are seldom of use at one time, and baskets and utensils lie around in an indiscriminate litter; a pig, the wealth of an Irish peasant, roams about with conscious importance, and chickens hop over every part like tame caudaries. Such is a picture of dwellings within 20 miles of the principal trading city in Ireland." If Mr. Croker had "explored" other glens of the south and west, or even the alleys and subordinate streets of not a few villages and considerable towns, he would have generalized his remarks on Ballydoure.

BALLYDOWGAN, or BALLYDOWGAN, a seat at the head of the south-west branch of Lough Strangford, and about $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Downpatrick, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. The original Ballydowgan was a large strong house, with a drawbridge and turrets for defence; but it was burned down by the treachery of Irish servants in the rebellion of 1641. Opposite is Swan Island, so called from having been the resort of large numbers of swans.

BALLYDRASHANE. See BALDRASHANE.

BALLYDRYHEAD, a village in the parish of Ballysodere, barony of Tiraghrill, co. Sligo, Connaught. Post-town, Coloneoy. Pop., in 1831, 126.

BALLYDUFF, a parish in the barony of Corkaguiney, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-east by north of Dingle, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 6,984 acres. Pop., in 1831, 420; in 1841, 488. Houses 73. The surface is part of the boldly tumulated and extensively moorish peninsula, which screens the north side of Dingle bay; but it has a northerly exposure, and is separated only by the parish of Stradbally from the shore of Brandon bay. Within the parochial limits stands the hamlet of Ballyduff. Pop., in 1831, 92.—This parish is in the dio. of Ardrett and Aghadoe; but is wholly inappropriate in the Earl of Cork, and has neither church, glebe-house, chapel, nor school. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 7 Protestants and 471 Roman Catholics.

BALLYDUFF, a village in the parish of Rattoo, barony of Clannaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 23 acres. Pop., in 1841, 331. Houses 60.

BALLYDUFF, a village in the parish of Lismore and Mocollop, barony of Coshmore and Coshbride, co. Waterford, Munster. Area, 11 acres. Pop., in 1841, 302. Houses 43.

BALLYDUFF, a hamlet in the parish of Carnmoney, barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLYEASTON, a quoad sacra parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Upper Antrim, co. Antrim, Ulster. Length and breadth, each upwards of 5 miles; area, 13,799 acres, 2 roads, 6 perches. Pop., in 1831, 5,892. The surface is drained south-westward by the Six-mile-Water; it consists of part of the vale of that stream, and a portion of the central division of the great tabular trappean upland of the county; and it is traversed north-eastward by the road from Antrim to Larne, and north-westward by that from Carnmoney to Broughshane. The land, except in the mountainous districts, is generally good. The village of Ballyeaston is situated within the quoad civilia parish of Ballyear, and on the road to Broughshane, $\frac{1}{4}$ mile north of Ballyclare. Area, 8 acres. Pop., in 1831, 301; in 1841, 265. Houses 52.—This parish is very nearly identical with the two quoad civilia parishes of BALLYCOR and RASHEE [which see]; and is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Connor. Tithe composition allotted to the curate, £69 4s. 8d. Gross income, £103 1s. 4d.; nett, £87 4s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. Both of the quoad civilia parishes are rectories appropriated to the prebend of Carncastle: see that article. The church is situated in Rashee, and is so old that the date and cost of its erection are unknown. Sittings 200; attendance, from 30 to 80. A meeting-house belonging to the General Assembly, and formerly to the Synod of Ulster, is attended by 500 in summer and 300 in winter; another belonging to the General Assembly, and formerly to the Secession Synod, by 400 in summer and 200 in winter; a Covenanters' meeting-house, by from 50 to 80; and an Arian meeting-house, belonging to the Presbytery of Antrim, by 20. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 183 Churchmen, 5,703 Presbyterians, 7 other Protestant dissenters, and 295 Roman Catholics; 3 Sunday schools were well attended; and 10 daily schools had on their books 303 boys and 203 girls. One of the daily schools was aided with about £15 a-year from the London Hibernian Society; one, with £10 from the National Board, and £2 2s. from the executors of Mr. Jones Agnew; and three others, with respectively £10, £8, and £8, from the National Board. The National schools are at Ballyeaston, Ballycor, Ballyboley, and Tildarg; and, in 1840, each of 3 of them was aided with £12.

BALLY-ECOUAN. See BALLYCOWAN.

BALLYEDMUND, a hamlet on the eastern frontier of the barony of Mullins and of co. Carlow, about 2 miles west of the village of Kiltely, and 7 south-south-west of Newtownbarry, Leinster. Pop. not specially returned. It stands on the road which connects the centre of co. Wexford, with the south of co. Carlow, through the glen or mountain valley, called Scollagh-Gap. Near the hamlet, in a secluded dell at the base of the western side of the highest part of Mount Leinster, stands the picturesque modern lodge of H. Newton, Esq., the proprietor of a large portion of the circumjacent Highland country.

BALLYEDMUND, a demesne in the south of the barony of Barrymore, about 3 miles west of Middleton, a little north of the road thence to Carrigtohill, co. Cork, Munster. The plantations are extensive, and embellish a considerable area of hilly ground. The proprietor is R. Courtenay, Esq.

BALLYELLA, a bay and a cape, the latter wholly, and the former chiefly, in the barony of Corcomroe, co. Clare, Munster. The cape is situated 6½ miles south-south-east of the most easterly of the Arran Islands; and forms the termination of a peninsula, by which the north side of the bay is screened. The bay is ¾ miles wide at the entrance; penetrates the land to the extent of 4 miles; and washes, over two-thirds of its south side, the shore of the barony of Ibricken. In one view, this bay is part of Malbay, or an inlet from its northern extremity; and not only in this inlet, but over the whole of Malbay, which forms the slender segment of a circle 27 miles long, from Ballyella Point to Loop Head, there is a total absence of safe anchorage during high winds from any point of the quarter of the compass between north-west and south-west. Ballyella bay is sometimes called Liscahor bay; and Ballyella Point, sometimes Hagg's Head. On the shore of the bay are the village and pier of LISCAHOR; see that article.

BALLYELLIN, a parish, 5 miles south-east by south of Goresbridge, and partly in the barony of Forth, partly in that of Lower St. Mullins, but chiefly in that of East Idrone, co. Carlow, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2. Area of the Forth section, 744 acres; of the St. Mullins section, 1,522 acres; of the Idrone section, 2,691 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 1,760; in 1841, 1,750. Houses 285. Pop. of the Forth section, in 1831, 218; in 1841, 213. Houses 40. Pop. of the St. Mullins section, in 1831, 549; in 1841, 584. Houses 94. Pop. of the Idrone section, in 1831, 993; in 1841, 953. Houses 151. The main body of the parish extends along the left bank of the Barrow; is separated by that river from co. Kilkenny, in the vicinity of Graigue and Goresbridge; and is traversed westward through its interior by a small affluent of the Barrow. The arable and pasture land averages in value 35s. per acre. Ballyellin-house is the seat of Walter Blackuey, Esq., and adjoins an old castle. The village of Ballyellin stands on the Barrow, within the Idrone section of the parish, and has extensive flour-mills and corn-stores. The road from New Ross to Leighlin Bridge passes along the banks of the river. Area of the village, 3 acres. Pop., in 1841, 119. Houses 22.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of LOMRA [which see], in the dio. of Leighlin. Tithe composition, £413 1s.

64d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 45, and the Roman Catholics to 1,712; and there was neither church, glebe-house, chapel, nor school.

BALLYELLIS, a demesne in the parish of Carnew, barony of Scarawalsh, co. Wexford, Leinster. It lies 1½ mile east of the town of Carnew, in co. Wicklow, on the south side of the road thence to Gorey. On this demesne, June 30, 1798, a party of insurgents, headed by Byrne of Ballymannus, Fitzgerald of Newpark, and Pery of Inch, encountered and totally defeated a considerable royalist force of regulars and yeomanry under the command of Col. Pilson, of the regiment of ancient Britons. Col. Pilson's horse was killed under him, a great many of his men were wounded, and 2 of the Ballaghean yeomanry, 6 of the Gorey yeomanry, 11 of the 5th dragoon guards, 28 rank and file of the regiment of ancient Britons, and one officer, a black trumpeter, were slain. Not a man of the victorious party is said to have been killed. Ballyellis-house was formerly the seat of Sir J. J. W. Jervis, Bart.; but, on occasion of the successful rebel fight, it was reduced to ashes.

BALLYELLIS, a seat of the Earl of Listowel, now occupied by Mr. Creagh, on the right bank of the Blackwater, in the vicinity of Mallow, co. Cork, Munster.

BALLYENESSY, one of a series of bogs, in the vicinity of Lixnaw, on the southern border of the barony of Clannaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. Area, 2,117 acres. The series is separated from other bogs by some low flat lands on both sides of the rivulet Brick; lies along an argillaceous upland; is well situated for drainage and irrigation; and is surrounded by abundant supplies of limestone. Estimated cost of reclamation, £2,358 4s.

BALLYEO, co. Meath, Leinster. "An ancient name," says our contemporary, Gorton, "for the town of Slane, derived from Bally, 'a town,' and Eo, 'a grave.' The same place is also called Fir Feic, derived from Farta-fir-bheitheach, or 'the graves of the herdsman,' from a number of herdsman who are said to have been slain and buried at this place; whence probably is derived the present name Slane. St. Patrick is supposed to have rested here the night previous to his arrival at the royal palace of Tarah, where he lighted up that flame which so much astonished the Arch-Druids and assembly of the states. St. Eire, or Ere, founded a bishopric and monastery in this place." See SLANE and TARAH.

BALLYFARNON, or BALLYFERNON, a village in the parish of Kilronan, barony of Boyle, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands on the north-west margin of the county, within half-a-mile of co. Sligo, within 1½ mile northward and north-westward of Lough Skeen, Castle-Tenison, and Lough Meelagh, 3½ miles west of the Arigna iron-works, and 4½ miles west of the post-town Keadue. Though utterly sequestered in position, and surrounded by mountains, it has a weekly market, and several annual fairs. Area of the village, 3 acres. Pop., in 1841, 243. Houses 44. See KILRONAN.

BALLYFEARD, a parish in the barony of Kinnalea, 4½ miles north-east of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 3,462 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,304; in 1841, 1,113. Houses 185. The Ecclesiastical Authorities state the population of 1831 at 1,337. The land is aggregately of indifferent quality, and is drained east-north-eastward by a rivulet which falls into the mouth of Cork Harbour.—This parish is in the dio. of Cork, and, previous to 1897, was a vicarage and separate benefice, whose vicar was appointed by the diocesan, received £130 of tithe composition, and respectively £136 and £123 4s. 7d. of gross and nett income, and paid £20 a-year to the curate of an adjoining parish for the discharge of occasional duties. In 1837, the vicarage became vacant, and was suspended; a curate was appointed to the parish, with an annual stipend of £75; and the remainder of the income of the benefice was directed to be set apart for building a parochial place of worship. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £100, are inappropriate, and are reputed to belong to the Earl of Shannon. A licensed parochial place of worship has an attendance of 25. A Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 330; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Clontead. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 78, and the Roman Catholics to 1,283; a Sunday school was attended by 12 children; and 2 pay daily schools had on their books 26 boys and 11 girls.

BALLYFERIS, a headland in the parish of St. Andrew's, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It is situated 4 miles south-south-east of Donaghadee, in N. lat. 55° 33', and W. long. 5° 23'. At the end of it a reef of rocks, called the Long Rock, stretches a good way into the sea, and has often proved fatal to sailors; and south of it lies another, called Scalmarin, which is smooth, flat, and overflowed by every tide.

BALLYFERMOT, a parish, 3½ miles west by south of Dublin, and formerly in the barony of Newcastle, but now in that of Uppercross, co. Dublin, Leinster. Its change of parochial connection was effected by Act of 5 and 6 Victoria, c. 96. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1½; area, 1,183 acres. Pop., in 1831, 402; in 1841, 346. Houses 64. The surface is part of the valley or dale of the Liffey, luxuriant, ornate, and powdered with villas; and it consists of prime land, and is traversed eastward and westward by the Grand canal. At Killeen is an extensive and well-arranged paper manufactory; and within the parish is a glue and parchment work. The antiquities are an old castle, and the ruins of an old church.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of CHAPELIZOD [which see], in the dio. of Dublin. Tithe composition, £130. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 70, and the Roman Catholics to 332; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLYFERNON. See BALLYFARNON.

BALLYFIN, a donative chapelry in the parish of Clonenagh, barony of Maryborough, 4 miles north-west of the town of Maryborough, Queen's co., Leinster. It has no defined limits; and is not subject to episcopal jurisdiction. The chapel was built in 1789, by means of a bequest of unknown amount, by the late Right Hon. W. Pole, ancestor of Lord Maryborough; and it was also endowed by that bequest with £100 a-year for the chaplain, and £26 for the clerk and schoolmaster. Lord Maryborough pays the endowments, and appoints the chaplain. Sittings in the chapel, 150; attendance 120. A Roman Catholic chapel in the vicinity has 2 officiates, and an attendance of 500; and is the only chapel in the Roman Catholic parish of Ballyfin.—The demesne of Ballyfin, in the vicinity of the chapels, is one of the most splendid in the central districts of Ireland, and is intimately associated with a name to which Irish topography, agriculture, and general improvement, owe much,—that of Sir Charles Coote, Bart. The estate was at one time the property of the Crosbie family, who became Earls of Glandore, but was forfeited in the 17th century by Sir John Crosbie, Bart. It was afterwards vested in the Pole family, and descended from them by will to the Hon. William Wellesley, who, on acceding to it, assumed the name and arms of Pole, and who subsequently was ennobled. Sir Charles Henry Coote, Bart., acquired the estate by purchase; and, previous to 1826, expended upwards of £20,000 in improving the house and grounds. The mansion, as it now stands, is a splendid specimen of Grecian architecture, and is interiorly arranged and fitted up in a style of corresponding elegance. The plantations stretch away to a considerable distance up the slopes of the Slieve Bloomer hills, and combine with those of Cappard, the handsome demesne of Joseph Pigott, Esq., to form a large and expressively featured expanse of forest scenery. Sir Charles Coote, at a time when probably not a thought of his name becoming eventually associated with Ballyfin had ever crossed his mind, thus described it: "Ballyfin, the seat of the Hon. W. W. Pole, is situate on the side of the mountain between Cappard and the gap of Glandine, from which latter place it is about 5 miles distant. This magnificent demesne contains above 1,200 acres, all walled in. There are two capital approaches from the Mountmellick and Maryborough roads, and a back approach from Mountrath. That from Maryborough is perhaps laid out with as much elegant taste and happy design as can be seen; 'tis certainly in the grandest style possible. The approach from Mountmellick is also very fine, but not so modern,—the former being but lately finished, after Mr. Pole's own design. The full-grown timber, and the view of an extensive lake, have a fine effect. This lake, which is above 30 acres in area, and appears to cover a much greater extent, is surrounded with the grandest screen of evergreens and forest trees; the plantations overtop each other, as the inequality of the ground favours the scene. The deer-park is perhaps the most extensive in the kingdom, and the deer as wild as nature." [General View of the Agriculture, &c. of Queen's co. Dublin, 1801.]

BALLYFOILE, BALLYFOYLE, or POLPICKE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Kinnalea, 3 miles south by west of the entrance of Cork Harbour, and 7½ east-north-east of Kinsale, co. Cork, Munster. Area, 2,882 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,291; in 1841, 1,311. Houses 216. The surface consists, for the most part, of tolerably good arable land. A cove or creek, called Robert's Cove, indents the bluff coast, affords occasional shelter to potato-boats, and is overlooked by a slate quarry, whence a large supply has long been obtained of good roofing slates. Near this inlet stands Britisfieldtown, the seat of Sir Thomas W. Roberts, Bart.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate curacy, and at the same time part of the benefice or perpetual curacy of Tracton, in the dio. of Cork. The tithes are compounded for £109 4s. 6d., and belong to the Earl of Shannon. In 1834 the Protestants amounted to 41, and the Roman Catholics to 1,310; and a hedge-school had on its books 13 boys and 8 girls.

BALLYFORAN, a village in the parish of Taughboy, barony of Athlone, co. Roscommon, Connaught. It stands on the river Suck, at the western verge of the county, and on the road between Ballinamore and Athlone; and is 5 miles east-south-east of the former town, and 10 west-north-west of the latter. Ballyforan bridge carries the highway across the Suck into co. Galway. Adjoining the village stands Clareville, the seat of the Hon. Gonville Ffrench. Fairs are held on Feb. 8, first Thursday of April O. S., May 19, July 6, Sept. 19, Oct. 21, and third Thursday of Dec. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLYFORAN, one of a chain of bogs, in the vicinity of the village just noticed, co. Roscommon, Connaught. The other links are the bogs of Breagh-Beg and Derry. The three bogs have jointly an area of 1,754 English acres; and extend 3¼ miles along the Suck from a point ¾ of a mile south of Ballyforan, to a point within half-a-mile of Mount-Talbot. They are very wet, and average 26 feet in depth. Estimated cost of reclamation, £2,173 8s. 2d.

BALLYGAR, a village in the parish of Killerran, barony of Killian, co. Galway, Connaught. It stands 3 miles north-east of Ballinamore, on the road thence to Roscommon, and near that stretch of the river Suck which is embellished with the demesnes of Castle-Kelly, Mount-Talbot, and Rookwood. A dispensary here is within the Ballinasloe Poor-law union, and has a district of 16,735 acres, with 4,711 inhabitants; and, in 1839-40, it received £133 2s., expended £127 3s. 8d., and administered to 1,572 patients. Area of the village, 20 acres. Pop., in 1841, 363. Houses 52.

BALLYGARRET, a Roman Catholic parish in the county of Wexford, and dio. of Ferns, Leinster. Post-town, Gorey. The statistics are given under the civil parochial divisions.

BALLYGARTH, a parish on the coast of the barony of Upper Duleek, co. Meath, 4 miles north-west by north of Balbriggan, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$ of a mile; area, 799 acres. Pop., in 1831, 96; in 1841, 165. Houses 20. One moiety of the land is good; and the other moiety is prime. Ballygarth-house, a handsome mansion, is the seat of Col. Pepper; and adjacent to it is Corballis, the seat of J. S. Taylor, Esq. The parish lies at the embouchure of Nanny Water.—Ballygarth is a rectory and separate benefice in the dio. of Meath. Tithe composition, £62. Gross income, £71 9s.; nett, £66 15s. 8d. Patron, the Crown. The rector resides in King's co.; and a curate resides in the contiguous parish of Julianstown. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 42, and the Roman Catholics to 73; and there was neither church, glebe-house, chapel, nor school.

BALLYGARUFF, a hamlet in the parish of Templetoher, half-barony of Ballymoe, co. Galway, Connaught. Pop., in 1831, 72.

BALLYGARVIN, the site of a Roman Catholic chapel, united to that of Douglas, in the parish of Carrigaline, co. Cork, Munster. See CARRIGALINE.

BALLYGAWELEY, a small market and post town, in the parish of Errigal-Keerogue, barony of Clogher, co. Tyrone, Ulster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Londonderry, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-north-west of Aughnacloy, $12\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Omagh, 36 west by south of Belfast, and $7\frac{1}{4}$ north-north-west of Dublin. It has an improving and a comparatively neat, clean, and prosperous appearance; and is the site of a neat new church, a Presbyterian meeting-house, some schools, a large distillery, and a brewery. The linen manufacture, as in most of the Ulster towns, engages attention; and a manufacture of gloves is in much repute, and of considerable extent. Fairs are held on June 5, Sept. 2, and Nov. 2. A dispensary here is within the Clogher Poor-law union, and has a district of 21,797 acres, with 10,692 inhabitants; and, in 1839-40, it received £121 12s., expended £123, and made 4,360 dispensations of medicine. The commencing or frontier range of the central tracts of mountain and moorland which occupy so large a portion of the counties of Tyrone and Londonderry, rises about 2 or 3 miles north of the town; extends from west to east, and bears the name of the Ballygawley Mountains. Starbog spa is about 5 miles distant. Area of the town, 33 acres. Pop., in 1831, 972; in 1841, 861. Houses 156. See ERRIGAL-KEEROGUE.

BALLYGEARY, a creek in the vicinity of New Quay, some distance south of Wexford Harbour, co. Wexford, Leinster. At 7 perches from high watermark, it has a depth of two fathoms, with good holding-ground, complete shelter, and scarcely any tidal current, and it possesses great capability of improvement. Though there is a pier at New Quay, where most of the ground is dry at low water, and the shelter is quite insufficient for the protection of boats in bad weather, no pier exists in Ballygeary creek.

BALLYGELLY, a basaltic cliff and headland in the parish of Carncastle, $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by west of Larne, barony of Upper Glenarn, co. Antrim, Ulster. It consists of basaltic strata, incipiently columnar. The rudely formed pillars which compose the strata measure from 8 to 10 feet between the joints; and, in common with kindred strata along the whole of the Antrim coast, they all dip towards the land. Upon the summit of a bold and periodically insulated rock at the base of the cliff stands the curious ruin of CARNCASTLE: see that article. A view from the highway, a little to the north, has the headland as a prominent feature, and is extremely grand. Ballygelly appears, in that view, to rise abruptly, or with an almost mural ascent from the sea; while the shore makes a large semicircular sweep from its base by Shaw's castle, and forms a magnificent estuary, and a continuous range of dark precipitous hills, called the Salagh Braes, constitute an imposing background.

BALLYGIBBON, a parish in the north-east corner of the barony of Upper Ormond, 4 miles north-east of Nenagh, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, 2 miles; breadth, 1 mile; area, 3,294 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,074; in 1841, 1,321. Houses 219. The surface lies on the eastern frontier of the county, declines to the west, and consists, for the most part, of inferior land. The seats are Ballygibbon, Buntis, and Ballycapple.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BALLYMACKET [which see], in the dio. of Killaloe. Tithe composition, £101 10s. 9½d. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLYGLASS, a village and post station on the east border of the barony of Carra, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the road from Dublin to West Port, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Hollymount, $8\frac{1}{2}$ south-east of Castlebar, and $11\frac{1}{4}$ west by north of Dublin. A dispensary, called that of Ballyglass and Balla, is within the Castlebar Poor-law union, and has a district of 37,154 acres, with 11,888 inhabitants; and, in 1840-41, it received £158 19s., expended £158 9s., and made 5,236 dispensations of medicine. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYGOREY, a village in the parish of Portnasally, barony of Iverk, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1841, 196. Houses 28.

BALLYGORMAN, a village in the parish of Cloncha, barony of Innishowen, co. Donegal, Ulster. Post-town, Carn. Pop. about 230. It stands near the extremity of the peninsula which terminates in Malin Head, and is the most northerly village in Ireland. Near it are a signal-tower and a small harbour and pier.

BALLYGORUM. See BALLYGOURM.

BALLYGOURNEY, an alleged parish on the coast of the barony of Imokilly, $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-east of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster. Dr. Beaufort places it in this position on his map; and Carlisle and Gorton copy him as to its position, and add that it is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne, valued in the King's books at £2 sterling; Gorton further stating that it is part of the corps of the chantry of Cloyne cathedral, valued by commutation at £500. But no trace whatever of it exists in any of our authorities, ecclesiastical, civil, or general.

BALLYGRANNY, a hamlet in the parish of Ballysadere, barony of Tiraghilla, 2 miles south-east of Colooney, co. Sligo, Connaught. Pop. returned with the parish.

BALLYGREGAN, or BALLYGRIGGAN, a particle or denomination of the benefice of Wallstown, and usually included in the parish of Wallstown, barony of Fermoy and dio. of Cloyne, co. Cork, Munster. See WALLSTOWN.

BALLYGRIFFIN, a parish in the barony of Clanwilliam, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles west by north of Cashel, co. Tipperary, Munster. Length, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 2,862 acres. Pop., in 1831, 1,383; in 1841, 1,406. Houses 230. The surface lies along the river Suir, and consists partly of good and partly of prime land. Lisheen Abbey is the seat of Sir J. J. Fitzgerald, Bart.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of ATHASSEL [which see], in the dio. of Cashel. Tithe composition, £191 8s. 7d. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 6, and the Roman Catholics to 1,448; and a pay daily school had on its books 50 boys and 30 girls.

BALLYGUB (NEW), a village in the parish of Clonamery, barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. Area, 34 acres. Pop., in 1841, 222. Houses 32.

BALLYGUNN, an alleged parish in the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny. It appears to be the parish of BALLYGURRUM [which see]; and seems, by mere mistake of several topographers, to be regarded as a different parish.

BALLYGUNNER, a parish in the north-east of the barony of Gualtier, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-west of Passage, co. Waterford, Munster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, 1; area, 2,266 acres. Pop., in 1831, 709; in 1841, 607. Houses 123. The north-eastern margin is washed by the river Suir, where it begins to form the estuary of Waterford Harbour; and the land throughout the interior is generally good, and three-fourths arable.—This parish is a vicarage, and forms part of the benefice of BALLINAKILL [which see], in the dio. of Waterford. The vicarial tithes are compounded for £64 8s. 1d., and the rectorial for £92 19s. 3d.; and the latter are appropriated to the dean and chapter of Waterford cathedral. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 17 Churehmen, 15 Protestant dissenters, and 707 Roman Catholics; and a daily school was aided with £20 a year from the National Board, and £21 from Mr. Fitzgerald, and had on its books 66 boys and 35 girls. In 1840, this school was conducted by 2 teachers, and had on its books 130 boys and 87 girls.

BALLYGURRUM, or BALLYGOORUM, a parish in the barony of Ida, co. Kilkenny, 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ miles west by south of New Ross, Leinster. Length, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile; breadth, $1\frac{1}{2}$; area, 1,924 acres. Pop., in 1831, 693; in 1841, 796. Houses 125. The surface consists of middle-rate land; and is traversed northward by the road from Waterford to Innistogue. Within the parish is a hamlet of its own name.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of ROSSBENCON [which see], in the dio. of Ossory. Vicarial tithe composition, £55; glebe, £8. The rectorial tithes, compounded for £110, are inappropriate, and belong to the corporation of the city of Waterford. In 1834, the parishioners were all Roman Catholics; and a pay daily school was attended by from 45 to 50 children.

BALLYHACK, a village in the parish of St. James and Dunbrody, barony of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It stands on the east shore of Waterford Harbour, opposite Passage, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north-west by north of Fethard, and 12 south-west of Taghmon. It occupies a romantic site amidst a line of bold rocky coast. The estuary at the line between it and Passage is about half-a-mile broad, forms a good and safe roadstead for vessels during a storm, and has long been crossed, between Ballyhack and Passage, by a regular ferry. Fairs are held on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday, March 25, July 25, Aug. 24, and Sept. 29. "Here," says Archdall, "we find a commandery which belonged to the grand priory of Kilmainham, and was subordinate to that of Kileloghan." Adjacent to the village is Dunbrody Park, the seat of Lord Templemore. The name, Ballyhack, is alleged by some writers to be "a corruption of Bally-hake, i. e. Hakes-town, from the quantity of that fish formerly brought for sale to this market." Area of the village, 11 acres. Pop., in 1831, 258; in 1841, 266. Houses 54.

BALLYHACKMORE, a village in the parish of Hollywood, barony of Lower Castlereagh, co. Down, Ulster. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1841, 126. Houses 28.

BALLYHAHILL, a village in the parish of Kilmoylan, barony of Shanid, co. Limerick, Munster. Area, 28 acres. Pop., in 1841, 196. Houses 39.

BALLYHAISE, or BALLYHAIS, a small market-town in the parish of Castleterry, barony of Upper Loughtee, co. Cavan, Ulster. It stands on the Annalee river, and on the road from Cavan to Clones, 3 miles north-north-east of Cavan, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile south-south-west of Clones. The town has an improving appearance, a considerable weekly market, and annual fairs on March 1, May 18, July 13, Aug. 30, Nov. 6, and Dec. 13. The market-house is an unique edifice of its class, constructed on arches. Near the town are extensive corn-mills. Ballyhaishouse stands amidst a large expanse of plantation, and is the seat of W. Humphreys, Esq. Near it is Lisnagowan-house. Area of the town, 52 acres. Pop., in 1831, 761; in 1841, 704. Houses 121. See CASTLETERRY.

BALLYHALBERT, a parish, containing a village of the same name, about the middle of the east coast of the barony of Ards, co. Down, Ulster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 2; area, 4,011 acres, 3 roods, 39 perches. Pop., in 1841, 2,656. Houses 502. The land is generally of good quality. The principal mansion is Echlinville. The village of Ballyhalbert is situated on the coast, 9 miles south by east of Donaghadee. Area, 16 acres. Pop., in 1831, 322; in 1841, 361. Houses 68. The villagers are actively engaged in the herring-fishery; and, several years ago, had 5 carrying sloops and bounty vessels, 14 smacks and wherries, and 12 yawls. A bay, of no great extent of indentation, sweeps from the alternately dry and submerged ledge of Wallace Rock on the north, round by the site of the village, to a headland and the small isle called Bur Island on the south. During summer, the fishing-vessels anchor in this bay, in front of the village; but during winter, they require to be hauled up. "Near the north end of the village," says Mr. Nimmo, "are some rocks on the shore, at a place called Ballyhemlan. A small boat harbour was attempted here lately by the inhabitants, but is now in total ruin. It might be replaced for about £250; or rather a better one, in my opinion, might be formed, with the opening on the south side of the rock, for about £300, and would be a harbour to leeward for a few boats, when the road of Ballyhalbert was unsafe." On the other side of the town, the point of Bur Isle running out makes a little bay, called Sandylam, which is rather more inviting; and here a tolerable pier may be made: the cost, in rough stone, will be about £2,000, to cover an extent of $1\frac{1}{2}$ acre." Near the village stood a Benedictine monastery, founded about the commencement of the 13th century, by Sir John de Courcy, and popularly called the Black Abbey. The property of the monastery, consisting of three townlands, besides tithes, &c., was seized by the O'Neils, passed at their rebellion to the crown, was granted by James I. to Viscount Claneboya, passed from the latter to Lord Ardes, and, in 1639, was awarded to the see of Armagh.—This parish is a vicarage, and part of the benefice of St. Andrew's, in the dio. of Down. See ANDREW'S (ST.). Vicarial title composition, £129 7s. 6d.; glebe, £77 10s. The rectorial tithes are compounded for £258 15s., and are appropriated to the see of Armagh. The other ecclesiastical and the school statistics are returned in cumulo with those of the other parishes of the benefice.

BALLYHALE, a village in the parish of Derrynabinch, barony of Knocktopher, co. Kilkenny, Leinster. It stands on the road from Dublin to Waterford, 4 miles south of Thomastown. The village gives name to a Roman Catholic parish in the diocese of Ossory, presided over by 3 officiates, and having chapels at Ballyhale, Kilkeasy, Newmarket, and Higginstown. See DERRYNABINCH, KILKEASY, and ACHAVILLER. Area of the village, 24 acres. Pop., in 1831, 369; in 1841, 807. Houses 59.

BALLYHANE, or BALLYHEAN, a parish in the barony of Carra, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-west of Castlebar, co. Mayo, Connought. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 3; area, 7,074 acres, 3 roods, 27 perches,—of which 162 acres, 1 rood, 2 perches are water. Pop., in 1831, 3,734; in 1841, 4,082. Houses 753. The land is partly bog, partly productive mountain, but chiefly good tillage and pasture ground; and is drained by the Clauran, a tributary of the Ayle. On the northern border is Kilboyne-house, the seat of Sir Samuel O'Malley, Bart. The hamlets are Ballyhane and Aghadrinagh. Fairs are held on July 4, and Aug. 20. The road from Westport to Ballinrobe passes through the interior.—This parish is a rectory, and part of the benefice of BERRISCARRA [see see], in the dio. of Tuam. Title composition, £105. The church of the benefice is situated in Ballyhane; was built in 1812, by means of a gift of £553 16s. 11d. from the late Board of First Fruits, and, having been nearly overthrown by a violent storm, was repaired in 1816, by means of a loan of £241 14s. 9d. from the Board. Sittings 100; attendance, about 20. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of from 1,000 to 1,500; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Castlebar. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 85, and the Roman Catholics to 3,922; and 3 daily schools at Drimnra-hill, Aghadrinagh, and Ballyhane chapel,—the first of which was aided with £80 a-year from the National Board, and £2 10s. from the parish priest,—were averagely attended by about 100 or 170 children.

BALLYHASSIG, an abbreviated name of BALINAHASSIG: see see.

BALLYHAUNIS, a village or small market-town in the parishes of Annagh and Began, barony of Costello, co. Mayo, and 9 miles west of Castlebar, Connought. It is a poor, small, mean-looking place. Fairs are held on June 1, July 2, Sept. 22, and Oct. 29. A dispensary in the village is within the Castlebar Poor-law union, and has a district of 68,474 acres, with 21,260 inhabitants; and, in 1839-40, it received £148, expended £148, and administered to 1,925 patients. An Augustinian friary was built in Ballyhaunis, and largely endowed with lands, by the family of De Angelo or Nangle. This family came to Ireland with Henry II.; and they afterwards took the name of Costello, and had large possessions both in Costello barony, and in co. Meath. The remains of the monastic buildings, as they stood 40 years ago, consisted only of the walls of the church, and two small wings separated from the church, and from each other by arches. Beneath the eastern window were the Dillon arms, under a crucifix; and in the vaults were interred the mortal remains of many of this noble family. The church, the wings, and the arches, are said by Dr. M'Parlan to have presented a miniature resemblance to the church of Moyné Abbey. A modern house was built some 50 or more years ago on the site of the ancient friary, and fitted up and occupied as a monastery. Area of the Annagh section of the town, 22 acres; of the Began section, 10 acres. Pop., in 1841, of the Annagh section, 209; of the Began section, 84. Houses in the respective sections, 35 and 16.

BALLYHAURA, a village on the western border of the barony of Fermoy, within the benefice of Lisgoold, and about 3 miles north of Buttevant, co. Cork, Munster. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYHAVEN, a roadstead above Portaferry in Lough Strangford, co. Down, Ulster. Immediately before it is a sunken rock, "to avoid which, the sailor must bring the saddle of two hills which are on the west shore, opposite to him, and then he may go in boldly; but let him take care to come no nearer than in four fathom water, the ground being everywhere foul and stony."

BALLYHAYS. See BALLYHAISE.

BALLYHEA, or BALLYHAT, a parish partly in the barony of Fermoy, and partly in that of Orrery and Kilmore, co. Cork, Munster. It is intersected by the parish of Charleville or Rathgoggan; and lies $\frac{1}{2}$ miles south-south-east of the town of Charleville. Length, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 4,836 acres,—of which 2,438 acres are in Fermoy. Pop., in 1831, 1,540; in 1841, 1,300. Houses 198. Pop. of the Fermoy section, in 1831, 772; in 1841, 769. Houses 117. The land in both sections is of excellent quality. The road from Charleville to Cork traverses the parish; and is overlooked by Castle Harrison, the seat of Henry Harrison, Esq.—Ballyhea is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne. Title composition, £400; glebe, £3 3s. This rectory and the vicarage of Charleville or Rathgoggan, constitute the benefice and prebend of Ballyhea. See CHARLEVILLE. Length, $\frac{1}{2}$ miles; breadth, $\frac{1}{2}$. Pop., in 1831, 7,400. Gross income, £630 7s. 11d.; nett, £565 16s. 1d. Patron, the diocesan. A curate has a stipend of £75. The church is situated in the town of Charleville; but when, or at what cost, it was built, cannot be ascertained. Sittings 400; attendance 200. Two Roman Catholic chapels in Charleville and Ardnageehy are mutually united in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, and attended by respectively 5,000 and 1,500. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 15, and the Roman Catholics to 1,573; the Protestants of the union to 340, and the Roman Catholics to 7,270; 2 hedge-schools in the parish were attended by from 40 to 105 children; and 17 daily schools in the union had on their books 316 boys and 185 girls.

BALLYHEAN. See BALLYHANE.

BALLYHEIGUE, a promontory and a bay on the coast of the barony of Clannaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. The promontory projects at the south side of the entrance of the Shannon; but is more commonly known under the name of KERRY HEAD: see see. Ballyheigue bay commences at this promontory on the north, and extends to Tralee bay on the south,—blending with that bay, or being very partially separated from it by a tiny peninsula and some islets. It may, in a general view, be regarded as 9 miles in length, and about $\frac{3}{4}$ in mean indentation. The strand along its head is $\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and forms an agreeable ride. The coast is a series of sand-hills, so overgrown with sedgy grass as to resist in a great degree the destructive action of the sea. As the beach is flat, and westerly winds send up tremendous billows and breakers from the whole sweep of the Atlantic, no vessel driven by stress of weather into the bay can live; yet the northern part of the bay is the deepest, and should be preferred by mariners who find themselves unable to steer north of Kerry Head. Shipwrecks almost necessarily occur in this perilous bay; but, previous to the erection of a lighthouse on Loop Head on the north side of the entrance of the Shannon, mariners were liable to mistake Kerry Head for Loop Head, and Ballyheigue bay for the Shannon, and shipwrecks, in consequence, were distressingly frequent.

BALLYHEIGUE, a parish on the coast of the barony of Clanmaurice, co. Kerry, Munster. It extends along the northern part of the bay described in the preceding article; and is about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-west of Ardfer, and 14 west-south-west of Listowel. It contains the villages of BALLYHEIGUE, DRUMGOWER, COUMDEHY, and TIERSHANAGHAN. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 4; area, 11,261 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,766; in 1841, 4,795. Houses 757. Pop. of the rural districts, in 1841, 4,138. Houses 654. The land is partly good tillage and pasture ground, and partly mountainous and waste. The village of Ballyheigue stands on the shore of the north-east corner of the bay, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles east by south of the extremity of Kerry Head. Its houses are scattered; and in its vicinity are some curious Danish raths. Area, 15 acres. Pop., in 1841, 282. Houses 44.—Ballyheigue is a rectory and a separate benefice in the dio. of Ardfer and Aghadoo. Tithe composition, £200 15s. 4d.; glebe, £40. Gross income, £330 15s. 4d.; nett, £204 5s. 8d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built in 1814, by means of a gift of £738 9s. 2d. from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 70; attendance 48. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 900; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Killurey, and Nattags. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 96, and the Roman Catholics to 3,984; and 4 daily schools, one of which received an annual grant from the Society for Discourteuing Vice, had on their books 324 boys and 198 girls. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school at Boulinsheare, had on their books 139 boys and 94 girls, and were salaried with respectively £15 and £12 from the National Board.

BALLYHEMICK, a seat on the river Awbeg, north of Castletown-Roche, co. Cork, Munster. Near the house were discovered, about the middle of last century, several quite gigantic human bones, and a singularly large human skull.

BALLYHENDON, an estate within 2 miles of Fermoy, co. Cork, Munster; remarkable for containing sets of curious ancient subterranean chambers, in which have been found charcoal, ox-bones, and fragments of querns. These chambers usually vary from 7 to 8 feet in diameter; have a form between the oval and the circle; occur in sets or series; and are popularly supposed to have been hiding-places of the Danes. As chambers of the same kind occur in rather more remarkable positions in Carrigtohill, we reserve further notice of them for our article on that parish. See CARRIGTOHILL.

BALLYHENRY, a roadstead on the east side of Lough Strangford, co. Down, Ulster. It is one of the few places in that large and singular marine inlet, where vessels escape the strong current which sweeps the Lough.

BALLYHEOGUE, or BALLYHOGUE, a parish in the baronies of Bantry and West Shelmallee, $\frac{5}{8}$ miles south by west of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 3 miles; breadth, 1. Area of the Bantry section, 2,780 acres; of the Shelmallee section, 1,490 acres. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 928; in 1841, 997. Houses 171. Pop. of the Bantry section, in 1831, 491; in 1841, 553. Houses 97. The surface extends along the right bank of the Slaney; is traversed northward by one of the roads from Wexford to Enniscorthy; and, with the exception of an unimportant area of bog and woodland, consists of good ground. Bellevue, the property of Anthony Cliffe, Esq., overlooks the Slaney, and is a highly improved seat.—This parish is an improprietor curacy, and part of the benefice of KILLURIN [which see], in the dio of Ferns. The rectorial tithes, though improprietor, have been conferred on the incumbent of the benefice, and are compounded for £135 13s. 10d. The Roman Catholic chapel at Galbally has an attendance of from 500 to 600; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Bree chapel in Clonmore. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 51, and the Roman Catholics to 897; and 3 hedge-schools at Galbally, Ballyheogue, and Ballynorris, were averagely attended by about 65 children. In 1840, a boys' school and a girls' school at Galbally, had on their books 68 boys and 62 girls, and were salaried with respectively £14 and £11 from the National Board.

BALLYHIGHLAND, a hamlet in the barony of Tullaghonohy, not far from Killeshandra, co. Cavan, Ulster. Fairs are held on the day before Trinity Sunday, and on May 21. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYHIGHLAND, a seat and a mining locality at or near the boundary between the baronies of Bantry and Scarawalsh, and 2 miles east of the village of Killane, co. Wexford, Leinster. The seat is the property of John Howlen, Esq.; and lead mines in its vicinity were worked, abandoned, and a few years ago re-opened.

BALLYHOE, a lake on the boundary between co. Meath, Leinster, and co. Monaghan, Ulster. It is situated $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north of Drumconila, close to the road from Dublin to Londonderry; and is formed by an expansion of the river Lagau. The country around, though prevalently hilly, is broken and varied with meadows, marshes, bogs, and loughlets. In 1539, a battle was fought here by the English under Lord Grey, and the Ulster Irish under O'Neill.

BALLYHOGUE. See BALLYHEOGUE.

BALLYHOLM, a bay on the south side of Belfast Lough, 1 mile east-north-east of Bangor, barony of Ardes, co. Down, Ulster. It is 1,000 yards wide, and 800 yards long. Its bottom is clean sand; and its sides are low slate rock. Though it has good anchorage, its shores are so shallow and so destitute of a place of shelter, that the only craft found upon it are 2 or 3 yawls. On the west side is a small landing-place for a boat which might be cleared, but could not afford shelter. "On the opposite side, near Ballycormick Point," reports Mr. Nimmo, "a boat harbour may be formed about 60 fathoms long, 10 wide, with 6 feet water, between two rocky ledges, by clearing the creek, and filling the gaps of the ledge to seaward with stone, so as to form a rough breakwater about 5 feet high and 20 feet wide, which, for 200 feet long in various portions, may cost £100. There will be only 7 feet water at high-water springs, and 5 feet at neaps in this creek."

BALLYHOOLEY, or AGHULTIE, a parish, containing a village of the same name, in the barony of Fermoy, co. Cork, Munster. Length, 4 miles; breadth, 2; area, 5,253 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,297; in 1841, 2,337. Houses 374. The village of Ballyhooley stands on the left bank of the Blackwater, 4 miles west by north of Fermoy, on the road thence to Doneraile. Area, 17 acres. Pop., in 1831, 533; in 1841, 418. Houses 67. A dispensary here is within the Fermoy Poor-law union; and is one of the very few of which the Commissioners obtained no statistic returns. The present parish-church, the remains of a former one, and the ruins of an ancient and extensive castle of the Roches, all crown a rock at the village; and, as seen from the adjacent demesne of the Earl of Listowel, they form an excellent subject for the pencil, and give a fine relief to the massive richness of surrounding woods which overhang the winding course of the river. A part of the Nagle mountains rises behind the village, extensively sheeted with wood, and anciently covered with still greater expanse of forest, called the forest of Ballyhooley, from the castellated mansion of the Roches. This castle, after the forfeiture of its original owners, passed into the possession of Sir Richard Aldworth. Convamore, the seat of the Earl of Listowel, stands on the Blackwater, flings embellishment over much of the parish, and reciprocates groupings of scenery with the hills, and lands, and woods, and sinuous vale around it. Excepting a small proportion of coarse mountain ground, the whole parochial area consists of good land; and it possesses so varied and expressive a contour as to be almost everywhere richly scenic. Mr. Brewer, speaking of Convamore, says, "This very handsome mansion is of recent erection, and is highly ornamental to the fine scenery amidst which it is placed. The view from the front of the house is truly admirable. Here the Blackwater is seen winding through noble masses of wood, and conducting the eye to the picturesque spectacle of a decayed castle seated on a lofty eminence upon the border of the waters. Whilst the views from the grounds are thus attractive to the lover of nature, the interior of the mansion abounds in objects calculated to gratify the admirer of the arts. The collection of paintings here repositised is, we believe, unrivalled in the county of Cork, and ranks among the best in Ireland."—Ballyhooley is a rectory in the dio. of Cloyne. Tithe composition, £468; glebe, £57 12s. 4d. This rectory and the vicarage of KILLATHY [which see] constitute the benefice of Ballyhooley, and the corps of the prebend of Agultvie. Length, 6 miles; breadth, 3½. Pop., in 1831, 3,699. Gross income, £675 12s. 4d.; nett, £556 14s. 5d. Patron, the diocesan. The church was built, in 1774, at the cost of £553 16s. 11d. Sittings 160; attendance 35. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,800; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapel of Castletown. In 1834, the Protestants of the parish amounted to 68, and the Roman Catholics to 2,346; the Protestants of the union to 81, and the Roman Catholics to 3,764; and 4 daily schools in the union, 3 of which were in Ballyhooley, and 1 in Killathy, had on their books 146 boys and 69 girls. Two of the Ballyhooley schools were nominally in connexion with the National Board, and in receipt of £20 each from local subscriptions. In 1840, these two schools were salaried with respectively £12 and £10 from the Board, and had on their books 217 boys and 150 girls.

BALLYTHORNAN, a small bay and a fishing village about a mile south-west of the western side of the entrance to Lough Strangford, barony of Lecale, co. Down, Ulster. The village stands on the shore of the bay. A small pier has been erected here by a corn merchant for his own accommodation, but is sufficient only for a vessel of small tonnage. The fishing-boats are drawn up on the beach. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYHOWARD, an alleged parish in the barony of Pubblebrien, and rectory in the dio. of Limerick, co. Limerick, Munster. Three topographical writers call it "one of the eight parishes which constitute the corps of the deanery of Limerick." As no trace of it exists in either the civil or the ecclesiastical authorities relative to parishes, it is probably a townland in one of the four parishes which constitute the corps of the deanery,—most probably of the parish of St. Mary.

BALLYHOWEL, a hamlet in the parish of Drumlac, 2½ miles north of Lough Clean, and 4½ south-west of Manor-Hamilton, barony of Dromahaire, co. Leitrim, Connaught. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYHUSKARD, a parish in the barony of Ballaghkeen, 2½ miles south-east by east of Enniscorthy, co. Wexford, Leinster. It contains the villages of BALLAGHKEEN and BALLINAMUDDAGH: which see. Length, 4½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 7,948 acres,—of which 25 acres are in the villages. Pop., in 1831, 2,487; in 1841, 2,874. Houses 516. The surface declines to the west; and consists in general of prime land. The highest ground is on the east border, and has an altitude of 293 feet. The principal residences are Annfield, Ballycoursey, and Cooladuff.—This parish is a rectory; and also a perpetual curacy in the dio. of Ferns. The rectory is part of the benefice of St. Mary's, Enniscorthy: see ENNISCORTHY. Tithe composition, £547 13s. 5d.; glebe, £40. The perpetual curacy is a separate benefice. Stipend payable by the incumbent of Enniscorthy, who also is patron, £75; nett income, £55. The church was built, in 1831, by means of a loan of £900 from the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 80. Two Roman Catholic chapels at Ballincarry and Glanbryan are attended by respectively 2,000 and 1,400; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, are united to a chapel in the parish of Edermine. In 1834, the parishioners consisted of 159 Churchmen, 14 Protestant dissenters, and 2,375 Roman Catholics; a Sunday school, superintended by the perpetual curate, was attended by 20 boys and 16 girls; and 5 daily schools were all supported wholly by fees, and were averagely attended in summer by 185 children.

BALLYINGLY, or BALLINGLY, a parish on the southern border of the barony of West Shelmallee, 6 miles south-west by south of Taghmon, co. Wexford, Leinster. Length, 1½ mile; breadth, 1; area, 765 acres. Pop., in 1831, 204; in 1841, 221. Houses 40. The surface consists of second-rate land, and is drained along the western boundary by the rivulet which enters the head of Bannow Harbour.—This parish is an appropriate curacy, and part of the benefice of HORETOWN [which see], in the dio. of Ferns. The tithes belonging to the curate are compounded for £10 12s. 3½d., and the rectorial tithes for £21 4s. 7½d.; and the latter are appropriated to the diocesan. In 1834, the parishioners, with only one exception, were all Roman Catholics; and there was neither church, chapel, nor school.

BALLYJAMESDUFF, a quoad sacra parish, containing a town of the same name, in the barony of Castleraghan, co. Cavan, Ulster. It comprehends portions of the quoad civilia parishes of Castleraghan, Kildrumferton, Denn, and Lurgan. Length, 2½ miles; breadth, 2½; area, 4,739 acres. Pop., in 1831, 3,227. The surface consists in general of light land; declines to the south; is drained by head-streams of the Shannon's affluent, the Inny; and is traversed north-north-westward by the road from Dublin to Cavan.—This parish is a perpetual curacy, and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kilmore. Gross income, £80; nett, £65. The incumbents of the 4 parishes, parts of which are included in the limits, nominate the curate in rotation, and pay his stipend in proportions. The church was built, in 1834, at the cost of £1,125; of which £900 were gifted by the late Board of First Fruits, and £225 raised by private subscription. Sittings 240; attendance 150. A Presbyterian meeting-house, and 2 Wesleyan meeting-houses, have each an attendance of 100. A Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,250; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to the chapels of Castleraghan and Munterconnaught. In 1834, the parishioners of the Lurgan section consisted of 252 Roman Catholics,—the Kildrumferton section, 483 Roman Catholics,—the Denn section, 88 Churchmen, 43 Presbyterians, and 759 Roman Catholics,—the Castleraghan section, 193 Churchmen, 144 Presbyterians, and 1,425 Roman Catholics,—the whole quoad sacra parish, 281 Churchmen, 187 Presbyterians, and 2,919 Roman Catholics; and a hedge-school at Ranson in Kildrumferton, 2 hedge-schools at Lackenmore and Lackenduff in Denn, and 2 daily schools at Ballyjamesduff and Remonan in Castleraghan, had on their books 316 boys and 243 girls. The Remonan school was salaried with £36 18s. 6d. a-year from Lord Farnham.

The town of BALLYJAMESDUFF stands in the Castleraghan section of the above parish, on the old road from Virginia to Cavan, 5 miles north-west of Virginia, 11 south-south-east of Cavan, 44 north-west of Dublin, and 92 south-west by south of Belfast. It is a post-town, and has a weekly market. Fairs are held on May 7, July 17, Oct. 26, and Dec. 24. A dispensary here is within the Oldcastle Poor-law union, and has a district comprising an area of 6,988 acres, with 4,444 inhabitants; and, in 1839-40, it received £74 15s. 6d., expended £72, and administered to 1,283 patients. In 1842, the Ballyjamesduff Loan Fund had a capital of £1,674, circulated £9,455 in 2,312 loans, and cleared a nett profit of £2 19s. 1d.; and from the date of its formation till the close of 1842, it circulated £37,493 in 9,781 loans, cleared a nett profit of £323 2s. 2d., and expended for charitable purposes £139. Adjacent to the town is a spacious lake. Coals were, some time ago, raised in the vicinity by Alderman Bevan. Area of the town, 28 acres. Pop., in 1831, 863; in 1841, 1,071. Houses 167.

BALLYKEAN, or KILLIGHT, a parish partly in the barony of Geashill, but chiefly in that of Upper Philipstown, $\frac{3}{4}$ miles north by west of Portarlington, King's co., Leinster. The Philipstown section contains the village of CLONEYGOWN: which see.—Length of that section, $\frac{5}{4}$ miles; breadth, $\frac{3}{4}$; area, 12,201 acres, 2 roods, 37 perches. The Geashill section lies detached 3 miles to the west. Length and breadth, each $\frac{1}{4}$ mile; area, 711 acres, 2 roods, 24 perches. Pop. of the whole, in 1831, 2,415; in 1841, 2,445. Houses 411. Pop. of the Geashill section, in 1831, 144; in 1841, 147. Houses 24. Pop. of the rural districts of the Philipstown section, in 1831, 2,113; in 1841, 2,116. Houses 358. The land is variously good, bad, and indifferent; and, to a large extent, consists of bog: see next article. Its declination is to the south-east. The chief residences are Cloneygown, Woodfield, Bloomville, Aghanvilla, Retreat, and Finter. There are ruins of two old castles.—This parish is a vicarage and a separate benefice, in the dio. of Kildare. Vicarial tithe composition, £132; glebe, £20. Gross income, £152; nett, £137 17s. 11d. Patron, the diocesan. The rectory of the parish, with £264 of tithe composition, is a sinecure in the possession of an ecclesiastical incumbent. The church was built, in 1827, at the cost of £1,107 13s. 10d., partly lent, but chiefly gifted by the late Board of First Fruits. Sittings 200; attendance 85. The Roman Catholic chapel has an attendance of 1,050; and, in the Roman Catholic parochial arrangement, is united to Killeigh and Ballinegan chapels in Geashill. In 1834, the Protestants amounted to 264, and the Roman Catholics to 2,029; 4 Sunday schools were attended, on the average, by 388 children; and 4 daily schools, one of which was aided with £5 a-year from subscription, had on their books 107 boys and 71 girls. In 1840, the National Board had a school of 45 boys and 43 girls at Cloneygown, and aided it with £12 a-year; and, in the same year, they granted £80 12s. 6d., toward the building and fitting up of a school at Raheen.

BALLYKEAN, a bog chiefly in the above parish, King's co., Leinster. Area, 1,822 English acres. It is bounded, on the north, by the limestone gravel ridge which extends from Rapheston to Ballinakill, and separates it from Mount Lucas bog; on the east, by the hills of Toren and Kylebeg, which separate it from Clonsast bog; on the south, by a patch of grassy bog which is traversed by Ennagh mill-race, and separates it from Moanvagh bog; and on the west, by the high grounds of Ballykean and Rapheston. It has an average depth of 20 feet; and contains but one quagmire. Its highest point lies 3 feet below the summit-level of the Grand Canal, and 261 feet above the level of high water in Dublin bay; and its lowest point lies 39 feet below the summit-level of the Grand Canal. Estimated cost of reclamation, £2,455.

BALLYKEERAN, a hamlet in the parish of St. Mary's, and on the north-west verge of the barony of Brawney, co. Westmeath, Leinster. It stands at the debouch of a rivulet into Lough Killymore, $\frac{2}{4}$ miles north-east by north of Athlone, on the road thence to Ballymahon. It is a poor place. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYKEEROGUE. See BALLYCAROGUE and BALLYKUROGUE.

BALLYKELLY, a village in the parish of Tamlaght-Finlagan, barony of Kenought, co. Londonderry, Ulster. It stands $\frac{2}{4}$ miles south-west of Newtown-Linavaddy, on the road thence to Londonderry. It has a handsome Presbyterian meeting-house; and a singularly well-supported school. "Here," says Carlisle, "is a charter school for 50 boys, founded by the Earl of Tyrone, in 1752. The farm consists of 29 Irish acres, and a considerable quantity of bog, which is holden under the Incorporated Society, who derive under the family of the Beresfords, tenants to the Worshipful Company of Fishmongers. According to the Report from the Commissioners of the Board of Education, Ballykelly charter school appears to be very well situated for a large establishment; the house might be easily added to, and £1,000 would give full accommodation to 150 boys. The country is plentiful, the linen trade flourishing, a wealthy yeomanry, and many resident clergymen very near it; the church is close to it; and the situation of the school is healthy." In 1834, the school was in operation, not for boys only, but also for girls; and taught reading, writing, arithmetic, book-keeping, and grammar to 112 boys; and reading, writing, arithmetic, and needlework to 100 girls. Its means and method of support are "a house from the Fishmongers' Company of London, and school rates of 3s. a-quarter for each of the children educated, one-half paid by the Company, and one-half by the parents if able, and the entire by the Company if not." Drummond, the residence of A. Sampson, Esq., agent to the Fishmongers' Company, stands at the village. Walworth Wood, part of the Company's estate, and having in its demesne the remains of a castle which the Company erected in

BALLYKENNEDY, a townland in the parish of Aboghill, 2 miles south-west of Ballymena, and 20 north-west of Belfast, co. Antrim, Ulster. Area, about 200 Irish acres. The soil is loose and improvable, very fit for the cultivation of potatoes, oats, barley, and all sorts of vegetables, but too light for raising wheat. The river Maine separates the north-east border from the townlands of Galgorm and Tuillaghgarly, and frequently overflows its banks. Ballykennedy extorts this separate notice on account of being the site of the Moravian settlement of Gracehill, and of having given name to the predecessor of Gracehill village, previous to the settlement being formed. See ANOGHILL and GRACEHILL.

BALLYKEOGUE, an alleged parish in co. Wexford, but in reality the misprinted name of the parish of BALLYNEOGUE: which see.

BALLYKETT, a village in the parish of Kilrush, barony of Moyarta, co. Clare, Munster. It stands 2 miles north of Kilrush town, on the road thence to Ennistymon. Fairs are held on Thursday before Whitsunday, July 4, Aug. 17, and Dec. 1. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYKILCASH, a village on the coast of the barony of Tíreragh, about 4 miles south-west of Aughris Head, co. Sligo, Connaught. It lies along a rivulet which falls into Slate Quarry harbour, and is straggling and very irregularly edificed. Pop. not specially returned. See BALLYMINNEY.

BALLYKILCAVIN, a demesne, about 3 miles south-south-west of Athy, near the boundary-line between co. Kildare and Queen's co., Leinster. The house, the seat of Sir Edward Walsh, Bart., is an old and ornamental edifice; but the grounds, from their extent and variety, their high culture, and the disposition of their plantations, render the demesne one of the most pleasing in the two counties.

BALLYKINE, a parish in the barony of South Ballinacor, co. Wicklow, Leinster. Area, 11,054 acres. Pop., in 1831, 2,634; in 1841, 2,755. Houses 433. "An abbey," says Archdall, "was founded here by a brother of St. Kievin,—probably St. Dagan; and the seat of Mr. Whaley, called Whaley Abbey, has been erected on the ancient site." This alleged abbey of "a brother of St. Kievin," had, in all likelihood, about the same claim to a really monastic character as Whaley Abbey. Even the latter is now in ruins; and the proprietor, Mr. Whaley, resides in a neat cottage in the vicinity. The site is near the village of Ballinaclesh. See BALLINACLEASH, RATHDRUM, and AUGHRIM. A large proportion of the parochial surface is moorish and waste. The highest ground has an altitude of 1,318 feet. The hamlets are Aughrim, Ballinaclesh, and Macreddin.—This parish is ecclesiastically treated as one of four denominations, which constitute the parish of RATHDRUM: see that article.

BALLYKINLER, a parish in the barony of Lecale, 2 miles south-east by south of Clough, co. Down, Ulster. Area, 2,039 acres. Pop., in 1841, 793. Houses 133. It lies on the east side of Dundrum Harbour, and is traversed by the road from Dundrum to Downpatrick. An extensive rabbit-warren occurs on the shore.—This parish is a wholly inappropriate rectory, in the dio. of Down.

BALLYKNOCKAN, or BALLYNOCKEN, a village in the parish of Fennagh, barony of East Idrome, co. Carlow, Leinster. Area, 9 acres. Pop., in 1831, 169; in 1841, 170. Houses 32.

BALLYKUROGUE, or BALLYKEKROGUE, an old castle, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile north of Dunbrody, barony of Shelbourne, co. Wexford, Leinster. It was built by one of the descendants of Roger de Sutton, a British knight, who, in 1169, followed Robert Fitzstephen and Hervey de Montmorency into Ireland. He obtained from Montmorency a grant of lands near Dunbrody, and was a subscribing witness to one of the charters of Dunbrody Abbey. His name still survives in his posterity, and was imposed on both the castle and the lands. The castle was built with flankers and a bawn, and its existing ruins are of considerable extent.

BALLYLAGHAN, a hamlet in the parish of Strade, barony of Gallen, co. Mayo, Connaught. It stands on the rivulet Guishden, $1\frac{1}{2}$ mile above that stream's debouch into Lough Conn, and 2 miles south of Foxford, on the road thence to Ballinrobe. Pop. not specially returned.

BALLYLANDERS. See BALLINLANDERS.
